With the recent dissolution of the French cabinet, the increasing reputation for political stability which the French government has enjoyed, because of the gradual lengthening out of the term of office of its cabinet ministries received a setback. The collapse of the ministry came almost without warning, after only about three and a half months of service. The overthrow was brought about on a vote on an insignificant matter which has no political significance at the present time—the question whether the president of the republic should be the commander-in-chief of its armies in time of war. The Socialists and Radicals cared little about this matter, but illogically united with the opposition party for the purpose of overthrowing the cabinet. Their bitter opposition was aroused because of the activity of the administration in advocating the "delimitation bill," a bill which, if passed, would provide for parliamentary representation for large minorities in the voting districts that elect members to the French chamber of deputies. Many of the constituencies returned Radical deputies by narrow majorities, and should that bill become law, the minorities would return minority deputies, offsetting the votes of many of the majority members. Such a result, of course, would greatly weaken the Radical wing of the chamber of deputies. When the delimitation bill was put to vote it passed by a large majority and the house declared its confidence in M. Monis and his associates. Notwithstanding this legislative triumph the ministry was defeated as we have said. Its overthrow is a piece of spitework. It was not representative of the attitude of the chamber, but was accomplished through the combination of minorities. M. Monis has been succeeded as prime minister by his friend and colleague, the minister of finance, M. Caillaux. Because of the determined attitude of the Radicals, the bill of delimitation was not published in the official organ within twenty-four hours and therefore does not become a law.

The Cunningham-Guggenheim Alaskan Claims

The interests of Alaska and the entire Pacific Northwest were given an impetus toward prosperity when the federal land office cancelled the Cunningham-Guggenheim coal claims in Alaska. The case between the government and the claimants was long and bitterly contested. It is charged that the interests fingered the controlling keys. Frequently the claims have been almost lost sight of in the political melee. There can be little doubt the resignation of Secretary Ballinger, of the Department of the Interior, was brought about through his connection with the land syndicate and his consequent attitude toward these claims. Their rejection apparently is a vindication of the opponents of the ex-secretary, who labored so long to defeat the engineers of this "grab." Natural progress, both in Alaska and in the north Pacific states, has been retarded by delay in the settlement of these claims. Thousands of people who had invested their money in Alaska suffered hardship, and then were obliged to wait for the settlement of this case. The title to these valuable lands is now undisputed. The government is free to exploit them in the interests of the people, instead of allowing them to fall into the control of a few millionaire corporations. The land belongs to the people and it is right that it should be used in their interest. But the responsibility of the government does not end here. It is the duty of the government to see that the title to the lands is withheld from other corporations, and thus the undesirable conditions of the Cunningham-Guggenheim controversy repeated. The foregoing must not be construed to mean that capital should be kept out of Alaska. Quite the contrary is true. Legitimate capital should be welcomed, but under reasonable control, to assist in the development of the territory. Honest and enterprising people should be welcomed to settle there and profit by its natural resources.

The high cost of living and other bug bears calculated to scare married folks have failed to frighten the annual crop of June brides in Chicago, and when the marriage license bureau in the county building was closed in June another record was smashed. During last month 3,846 permits to marry were issued. The nearest approach to this record was last year when 3,816 were issued. In 1909, 3,305 were issued. The number continues to grow smaller as the years are traced back.

Christian Endeavor

Judge Lindsey on Christian Endeavor.

The Christian Endeavorers of this state who have taken their stand on the side of good citizenship will be encouraged by the opinion Judge Ben B. Lindsey of Denver holds respecting Colorado Endeavorers. Judge Lindsey bases his remarks upon what Endeavorers have been doing, not upon what they ought to be doing. In a speech before the state convention of the Christian Endeavorers of Colorado he said:

I do not know of any organization that has been more courageous and active in its interests in modern political questions than have the Christian Endeavorers here in the State of Colorado.

The Christian Endeavorers of this state have encouraged the discussion of such political subjects as the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, the pure Australian ballot, the direct-nomination law, the local or county option laws, the employers' liability act, the public-service commission, the commission form of government, etc.

In the fight against the Beast and the machine the Christian Endeavorers of Colorado in their State conventions have frequently shown their activity by indorsing those that have been foremost in the fight.

The Christian Endeavorers have in conventions assembled often indorsed those measures that are designed to restore popular government, and thereby end the control of the boss and the corrupt machine.

They have pointed out in their resolutions the necessity for laws that are shaped to end the corrupt alliance between lawless wealth and protected vice.

They have lent their influence on the right side of every political struggle that has had for its purpose the relief of the downtrodden among the poor, and the end of the advantages taken by lawless wealth over the industrial classes.

Personally, I am under great obligations to the Christian Endeavorers of Colorado. They have been bold enough in their resolutions and in their meetings to hold up my hands and to give me their aid, comfort, and support in the fight against that vile, selfish, corrupting, political power that I have called the Beast.

Some of their leading officers, members, and active workers have been the chief source of assistance and comfort that have come not only to me but to others engaged in this fight. I am glad to pay this tribute to them, and make this acknowledgment of the practical Christian service in the solution of practical, political, social, and economic questions that have come directly from the Christian Endeavorers of Colorado.

This does not mean that the Christian Endeavorers have become politicians, or that they have unwisely mixed in questionable politics, or that they have sought office themselves, or endeavored to gain any advantage from political activity or wield any questionable influence in the scramble for political jobs.

On the contrary, they have set us a wholesome and helpful example, showing how such an organization can properly interest itself in great problems and principles, even though they be in a measure political, without in any manner jeopardizing its good influence through the smirch of politics.

The Church of Scotland

Apostolic Succession.

The Rev. J. A. D. MacDonald, who voluntarily withdrew from Wesleyan Methodism in 1901 and who has been a missionary in Calcutta under the auspices of the Church of Scotland, petitioned the General Assembly in 1910, asking that his ordination in Methodism be accepted as valid. The Assembly has refused such recognition. The arguments in favor of accepting Methodist ordination as valid, offered by two distinguished churchmen, are thus summarized in the British Weekly:

The venerable Dr. Mair moved that the petition should be granted, and told the Assembly that if they refused this request they would be entering into the spirit of other churches who said to Presbyterians, "Your ministers are not ministers of the Gospel." Dr. W. P. Paterson, the most brilliant man in the Scottish Church, seconded Dr. Mair, and said that it made his blood boil when they were asked to commit their old Presbyterian Church of Scotland to the decision that they were to welcome with open arms a Roman Catholic priest as a true minister of Jesus Christ, but that they were forbidden to look upon a Wesleyan Methodist minister as other than an unaccredited worker in the household of God. On all crucial points the Wesleyan Methodist Church in the matter of orders stood exactly where they did. Apostolic Succession was not, and never has been, a doctrine of the Church of Scotland, and the real difficulty in the minds of a certain group in the Assembly was that the Wesleyan Methodist Church had not the Apostolic Succession. Professor Paterson pointed out that the Roman Catholics would not recognize the Anglicans, the Anglicans would not recognize the Presbyterians, and it was now proposed that the Presbyterians should not recognize the Wesleyans. Their Church was to take up the attitude of a poor relation of an ecclesiastical aristocracy, hanging on to the skirts of those who would not own them, and trying to make up for it by ignoring others.

The British Weekly has this advice to Nonconformists and non-Episcopalians:

Dr. Cooper (of the Church of Scotland) and his friends may rest assured that their only path to the ministry of the Church of England is by confirmation and re-ordination, and, many Anglicans would add, by re-baptism. Their only path, even to membership, or even to an occasional communion, is by confirmation. Those who know the conditions are well aware that on these points the prevailing clerical mind in the Church of England is hardening rather than softening. There is far more social intercourse between ministers of different communions in England than there ever was before, and the highest of the High Churchmen take their full part in that. It would be gross injustice not to recognize that this friendliness is due in part to the sense of a common share in Christ. But less than ever is there any disposition to lower the terms on which admission is granted, or by which union is attained. We have never known the High Church prelates and leaders so unyielding as now. We have never known the Evangelical bishops half so timorous, not to say cowardly. What catholic courage there is resides in the Broad Church bishops like Dr. Stubbs and Dr. Percival. We say this with sincere regret, and with the firm conviction that Christian self-respect does not allow of Nonconformists and non-Episcopalians crawling at the feet of High Church bishops in humble demand for recognition. Arise, stand on thy feet, is the word spoken to us today. Let Christian Churches seek union with Churches which recognize and rejoice in their equally divinely granted rights.

Presbyterian

Evolution and Religion.

It used to be the fashion for ministers to declaim against the theory of evolution. Many thought Charles Darwin was Satan's ambassador plenipotentiary. The theory was shown to be unscientific and absurd. One who gets his information from certain defenders of the faith is apt to think no one nowadays believes in evolution. It is evident that these defenders of the faith are not well informed. Not only do men of science still believe in evolution, it has come to pass that men of faith find support for this faith in the theory of evolution. The editor of the Presbyterian Banner has been reading the new Encyclopaedia Brittanica, and he states his discoveries with respect to present-day opinion of evolution in the following paragraph:

From time to time we shall give the general position of the new Britannica on important questions in science and other departments of knowledge. As this work issues from the University of Cambridge and its articles are written by the highest authorities it may be taken as giving us the latest work of scholarship on all subjects, though of course it does not presume to speak dogmatically and always gives reasons for its results. What does it say on the subject of evolution, or the theory that existing animals and plants have descended by genetic connection and modification from earlier forms? We sometimes hear it said and may see the statement in print that this theory has lost ground and has even been abandoned. This view is not borne out by the article in the Britannica. The first part of the article sketches the history of the idea in philosophic thought, and the latter part treats of the evolution of living beings. It summarizes the evidence for belief in such descent under the following heads: the scientific conception of the physical universe as a mechanism, the gradations of structure exhibited by living things so that they can be arranged in the form of a genealogical tree, the analogy to these gradations presented by the embryonic development of the higher species, the existence of rudimentary organs, the effects of varying conditions in modifying living organisms, the facts of geographical distribution, and the facts of the geological succession of the forms of life. The writer sums up his argument by saying: "The vast bulk of botanical and zoological work on living and extinct forms published during the last quarter of the 19th century increased almost beyond all expectation the evidence for the fact of evolution. The discovery of a single fossil creature in a geological stratum of a wrong period, the detection of a single anatomical or physiological fact irreconcilable with origin by descent with modification, would have been destructive of the theory and would have made the reputation of an observer. But in the prodigious number of supporting discoveries that have been made no single negative factor has appeared, and the evolution from their predecessors of the forms of life existing now or at any other period, must be taken as proved." Of course the theory of evolution has nothing to say about the cause that is back of and in this process: that is a question for philosophy and religion. Most evolutionists are theists and many of them are Christians, and they find in evolution only the method by which God works in his creation.

The Growth of Jesus into Manhood

We have this week the first of a series of eight studies on "The human life of Jesus as an example." The theological Christ has taken possession of our minds so completely that it will be difficult for us to study the man Jesus as he actually lived among men. His revelation of God is in terms of human life. We must know the human in order to appreciate the divine. The attempt to ignore the human has given us the spectral Christ of theological imagination.

The fact of the growth of Jesus is to be emphasized. His growth was physical, mental, moral, and religious. The infant Jesus needed the care and protection of his mother as other infants need such care and protection. The boy Jesus was taught by his parents the fundamental truths of the religion of Israel. He learned to read as other boys of his day learned to read. The apocryphal gospels present a monstrous child who works miracles and brutally tyrannizes over his playmates. Our gospels tell us little about the childhood of Jesus; what is told shows that the Master of us all passed through the experiences common to childhood and youth. We do not believe that he grew out of sin, but that he did grow in goodness and wisdom.

The local synagogue doubtless had its influence upon the growth of Jesus. There the law and the prophets were read and explained. Copies of the sacred writings were expensive. Few could afford to own them. It is possible that the synagogue of Nazareth possessed the copy from which Jesus learned to read. The history of Israel could not fail to make a marked impression on the mind of every thoughtful Jewish youth. The promises of God fed his hope. The preaching of the prophets nourished his social faith and fanned into flame the passion for righteousness. That is, these results appeared where scribal ingenuity did not fix attention upon technicalities. Whatever may have been the defects of the teaching at Nazareth, the import of the history of Israel was not hidden from Jesus. He saw the essential part of the prophetic teaching and his soul grew upon the food of the ancient word.

The book of nature was open to Jesus. He studied its sympathetically. What he learned from nature is partly expressed by Gilbert: "To him, nature was full of spiritual meaning. It spoke to him of the goodness of God and the minuteness of his tender care. He admired the beauty of the lilies, but the thought that especially impressed him was that God had clothed them, God had given them raiment which surpassed in glory the raiment of Solomon. He watched the birds of the air, and thought how the heavenly Father fed them, and how not one of the least of them could fall to the ground without his notice. When the sun arose and shined on the evil and the good, and when the rain came down upon the just and the unjust, it was to him a parable of the divine love. The tares in the wheat were like children of the evil one, and the birds catching away the seed before it sprouted were like Satan who takes away the good word from the heart."

The temple at Jerusalem, the place of national worship and the center of racial and religious sentiment, entered into the education of Jesus. Its glories were recounted to him from earliest childhood. To the temple came faithful Jews from all parts of the world. Those who lived nearby went three times a year to the feasts. Others went once a year. Those who lived far away were happy if once in their lives they were permitted to meet with their brethren in the courts of the Lord's house. At the Passover, at Pentecost, and the feast of Tabernacles, the most sacred events connected with the history of the nation were symbolized. The people talked of the things that God had wrought in the former days. "Then the enthusiastic multitude surged in the wide forecourts of the temple, the flame leaped high upon the altar of burnt-offering, and the people waiting without engaged in prayer, while the priest brought the incense before God within the sanctuary. How rich and fruitful must have been the stimulus given to their religious life, which the pilgrims brought back with them to their homes!"

To Jesus the temple was the house of his Father. In that house he was at home. He did not go to the desert to find God, but where the people were. His growth in favor with man indicates that he gladly took his place among men and accepted his share of the common labor. In work, in study, and in worship he was with his people. That he saw what they could not see and had a mission which they understood but dimly or not at all does empty of meaning the life he shared with them; it glorified the work and the companionship through which all men learn what God is. The Portland Convention and the Lorimer Case

The following dispatch and comment was in type before Mr. Perkins' report of the convention was received. We can do no better than to allow it to stand just as it is, with but a word of additional comment below:

Portland, Ore., July 6.—R. A. Long, the Kansas City millionaire lumberman, who is a delegate to the big Christian church convention here, yesterday extolled Edward Hines, Lorimer's ally, as an honest man. The assembly adopted a resolution endorsing Mr. Long's opinion.

That this is an error is ten times easier to believe than that it is the truth. It is impossible that a convention of Disciples would take the Lorimer case out of the hands of the senate committee and decide it in advance of a full inquiry. It is inconceivable that Mr. Long, whom Disciples love for his works' and character's sake as they love few men, would use his great influence in the Portland convention to commit his brethren to the wrong side of this great public moral question, and without their possessing anything like adequate knowledge.

No doubt by next week we will be able to say positively that the dispatch is erroneous.

Much as a defense of Mr. Lorimer's ally in our national convention is to be deplored, we are glad to know that it was Mr. Long himself and not Mr. Long's opinion of Mr. Hines that the Portland convention endorsed. If it is not too late, The Christian Century wishes to add a ringing voice to the unanimous vote of confidence in the President of the Brotherhood.

Real Versus Technical Membership

As Disciples come more and more explicitly to recognize Presbyterians, Methodists and other paedo-baptists as Christians, it becomes increasingly perplexing to our churches to decide how to deal with them when they associate themselves with our organizations.

No longer are any of us willing to say, "You are not Christians." Some say, "You may be considered members of the congregation, but not of the church;" while others welcome them as "Associates."

The Christian Evangelist plan is perhaps the most common custom among us. We think we are not doing our contemporary an injustice when we say its plan is to regard these Christian brethren as real members, but not technical or formal members.

This plan will ultimately satisfy neither the logic nor the vigor of our robust brotherhood. Indeed we believe it will not long satisfy our high sense of honor and honesty.

As a splendid illustration of the distinction between real and formal membership we submit a communication to the editor of the Christian Evangelist, from Frank Garrett, missionary in China, whose statement the editor calls a "contribution to the subject under consideration," Mr. Garrett says:

"In China we do just what you suggest in your letter. We receive them to worship, the Lord's table and all rights and privileges except formally placing their names on the roll. I known that there are these on the field in other communions and in our own who insist that this is to be the mark of recognition of others as Christians.

But this cannot be insisted upon. If we do our part in the other ways I believe we will not be pressed on this point. The other recognition which we give is quite ample to establish the fact that we recognize them as Christians. Other communions are going beyond their rights when they insist that we shall enroll them in our membership.

"I have in my Drum Tower Church here in Nankin a Presbyterian who waits on the congregation at every communion service. He is also church treasurer. His name remains on the roll of the Presbyterian church on the other side of the city. He has been a teacher in our school about fifteen years and hence his connection with our church.

In a personal letter to one of the editors of The Christian Century just received, Mr. Garrett describes this practice in much the same terms as above and adds:

"I have never heard of a single case of one growing cold or being lost to the church because we did not enroll his name on our book. If all the rest we do for him would not hold him, I fail to see what good it would do to write his name on the roll."

This suggests the question: Why have a roll at all? We read about no such human device in the New Testament. Why have any technical or formal membership in the Church of Christ? Why not have just real members like they had in the New Testament times?

If it would do no good to write the name of a sprinkled Christian on the roll what good does it do to write the name of an immersed Christian there?

Editorial Table Talk

Great Growth of Salvation Army Work

In an old building in Philadelphia, where previously chairs had been mended, the Salvation Army had its beginning in the United States in March, 1880. Its report of the last year, just issued, shows the tremendous growth which it has attained in the thirty years. Outdoors last year it is stated that 173,000 meetings were held, attended by 15,000,000 persons. In halls the meetings numbered 215,000 and 8,000,000 adults and 1,500,000 children came to them. The number of converts claimed to have been made by the Army last year was 46,554. A few years ago Army hotels were started to take the place of the mean and poor ones often maintained for private profit. Last year no fewer than 1,961,677 lodgings were provided. The poverty problem was entered upon by the Army, not with investigations as to worthiness, but with work to do for which wages are paid. Last year the Army gave 2,156,155 meals to poor men in return for work, and gave them in wages $325,000. Employment was found for more than 70,000 persons, of whom more than 60,000 were men. In the training colleges, of which there are four, 200 to 300 young men and women are graduated each year, all of whom engage in Army work in the large cities. During the last five years property held by the army is claimed to have increased in amount by $2,500,000.

Pushing Social Service by Churches

The Social Service Commission of the Federal Council has set on foot a plan for a Social Service Convention, to be held early in the autumn, the purpose of which is to secure the inauguration of social service work in all religious bodies represented in the Council. It is stated that of these bodies, some thirty in number and representing 16,000,000 to 18,000,000 members, only two bodies, the Presbyterian and Congregational, have now Commissions with organized work and salaried secretaries to push it. A third, the Episcopal, has taken steps to start such. At least a dozen more Commissions will be urged by the new secretary of the Council, the Rev. Dr. Chas. T. Macfarland. The theory of the Council is that social service can only be adequately rendered by the churches through federation, and that such service ought to be placed upon the same level of efficiency and financial support as are Christian missions and education. The new secretary, the Rev. Dr. Macfarland, is chairman of arrangements for the holding of the social conference next fall.

Catholics Co-operating for World Peace

Catholic bishops, clergy and federations of laymen are gratified with the letter of Pope Pius X to Mgr. Falconio, apostolic delegate at Washington, upon the subject of world peace. Most federations of Catholic laymen had already acted as such, but the national one, meeting next month in Columbus will, it is said, recognize in its resolutions the recommendations of the Pope, and pledge co-operation with President Taft. Through the initiative of Cardinal Moran of Sydney the promotion of peace already forms part of the Catholic movement in Australia. Protestants who are furthering co-operation between ministers and prominent laymen of Germany, England and the United States are also expressing gratification at the stand taken by the Pope, and looking to it to help their plans materially this fall, when further cementing of Christian world forces will be continued. In his letter to Mgr. Falconio the Pope points out the leadership of many of his predecessors in such peace movements of the past as have made the present one possible.

The Newest National Campaign

The Men and Religion Forward Movement has already registered more than one hundred men for its conference at Silver Bay on Lake George August 22 to 30, and expects that almost all cities in which conventions are to be held the coming year will have men there. The conference is to make final plans for what promises to be, it is said, the greatest campaign yet held. This campaign is to be inaugurated in simultaneous meetings to be held in St. Paul and Minneapolis during the first week in October. All members of all three teams of instructors will be present, and from these cities the teams will radiate for a continuous tour that is to last until the following May. A fourth team chiefly for work in the east, will start with the new year. Committees have been formed in most states, and these are now planning teams of speakers for conventions in cities in their respective fields not visited by the principal teams. The aim of the whole Movement, as has been published, is to increase in the heads and hearts of men and boys of the United States and Canada the amount of old-fashioned religion and its expression in personal work.

Appeal to Avert a Deficit

The American Board, the foreign mission organization of Congregationalists, is compelled, it says, to issue a personal appeal to its supporters if it would avert a threatened deficit for the year of $50,000 at least. It states that its contributions for nine months from churches have increased by $31,000, due it believes to a larger interest in missions and the steadily growing gifts of Congregationalists, but that there is a falling off in legacies of $32,000. Its year ends in September. Congregationalists are putting into operation an apportionment plan which they and the officers of its oldest Board hope may make appeals in future years unnecessary. The Board has work in twenty foreign fields. In its appeal, and to prove the value of missions as a Christian investment, the Board states the following: "In the fifty years from 1860 to 1910 Congregational Church membership grew 2,330 per cent. The number of pupils in schools on mission fields increased 780 per cent, native workers on the same fields 637 per cent, and churches 538 per cent."

Sunday Schools Forging Ahead

The Sunday-school Convention, held in San Francisco, proved successful beyond expectations. There were no epoch-making speeches, but there was much of the institute and conference, with freedom from differences and practically every religious and educational interest in America represented. At all of the principal meetings audiences averaged six thousand, and the conferences crowded the largest churches. The adult Bible class procession through the streets was 10,000 men strong, each man carrying a Bible. Banners were in the procession representing Canada, Mexico and South America, and the whole affair amounted to a big religious reception in the streets, men singing, shouting, and giving San Francisco such an exhibition of religious enthusiasm by men as it never saw before. The differences over the introduction of explanatory matter into the advanced lessons other than passages from the Bible were adjusted to suit the progressives, a wide latitude being allowed. The secretary's report showed that in the territory of the International Committee for three years past 53,330 conventions were held, or 48 per day. Adult Bible classes enrolled with the general office have a total membership of 1,000,000. Prominence was given at the Convention to the subject of teacher training. In 1902 there were enrolled in classes for such training one in 111 of all officers and teachers in schools of North America. Today one in twelve is so enrolled. The actual achievement of the Sunday-school in getting persons into church membership was put at 1,193,432 for the three years since 1906, or a gain of 290,000 over the preceeding three years.

A Pile of Books and a Hot Day

A pile of books unopened before me—and the thermometer over 100! What did I do? Opened them and got interested and forgot about the heat. Good books, not too heavy, are a splendid antidote to heat-worry. Thus the three books referred to below helped me to get through a most exhausting day.

THE CAMPBELLS, BY McLEAN.

Archibald McLean's brochure on Thomas and Alexander Campbell is more than an outline sketch. It is a thoughtful appreciation of these two reformers. Mr. McLean has had excellent opportunity to know the atmosphere and tradition of the Campbells. Perhaps, too, no one is able to measure their influence through the years better than he. The little volume considers their preparation for their mission; the program they outlined for themselves; the methods they employed; the effects of their work and the men themselves. The author is disposed to emphasize the work of Thomas Campbell more than the past has done. Our irenic age will certainly agree with the author.

Mr. McLean has done a valuable piece of work. Its brevity will gain for it a wide reading. It is, however, as we would expect an appreciation rather than a searching interpretation. Mr. McLean is too near the reformers and too much a part of the officialism though a noble part, of the reformation to give other than the accustomed valuation of the Campbells. There are hints in the brochure that the author regards these reformers are more catholic and universal souls than their biographers have yet revealed. It is easy to lose great men among the petty things of their time. The intellectual strength of the Campbells is known to all. Their passion to bring the sects of their day together is common knowledge. Their platform for union has been widely proclaimed. The growth of their followers is known to number hundreds of thousands. What we now need is a search in their writings of the real catholic in them. We need a separation of the local, provincial, and universal. The author touches upon this difference, but only touches upon it.

The knowledge of the past is only helpful as it becomes a guide to the future.

The age of the Campbells was radically different from ours. It did not feel the strain of the social conditions as does ours. God has created an atmosphere of today in which we must do our thinking and adjusting.

How would Alexander Campbell, coming to us not as an old man with opinions crystallized by rancor and debate, but coming fresh with the enthusiasm of God adjust himself amid the multiplicity of denominations? What would he say today of faith and opinion? Would he say his interpretation of the Scriptures was a matter of faith and the other man's a matter of opinion which must give away before his faith? No, he would be a champion of freedom. What universal note would he sound to our age? Walter Scott in his later years saw our age with its social and intricate problems. He felt the stress of human life and believed that the supreme duty of the church was to sink dogma if necessary to minister to life. That was a catholic, universal, divine note. This passion must have possessed Thomas Campbell when he held his neighborhood communion.

It is the spirit of the Campbells we must project. We should not bury them beneath the rural, provincial and sectarian conditions of their day. Succeeding ages often use reformers to hold them back from progress. Loyalty to great men and great writings is loyalty to their spirit and not to their letter. We know the letter of The Campbells. Let our wise men tell us of their spirit, their catholicity, their humanity. Let them apply their teachings of far vision to our day so that they will give us an impulse forward. For there are always legions that need the impulse of an authoritative near-past.

A GOVERNOR'S VIEW OF CHRIST.

The address on "My Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" that Ex-Governor J. Frank Hanly has been delivering at popular gatherings is now put in book form by The Bobbs Merrill Co. It is indeed a popular treatise of the influence of Christ. I can do no better than give the summary of the lecture..

"And so we have Him a Galilean Carpenter:

"Not a physician, but the master of all human ills;

"Not a lawyer, but the expounder of the elemental principles of law;

"Not an author, but the inspirer of the living literature of the world:

"Not an orator; but the interpreter of the universal human heart.

"Not a poet or musician, but the soul and inspiration of all song and all music;

Not an artist, but the unfailing light of the great masters, old and new;

"Not an architect, but the soul-transformer and character-builder of all time;

"Not a statesman, but the state and institution founder of the race:

"And, more wonderful than all, a man—blameless and unscared by sin or taint or worry."

Mr. Hanly is one of the Christian statesmen of our country. This address on Christ deserves a wide reading.

GROW OLD ALONG WITH ME.

I had not thought of James M. Campbell as even approaching old age till his last book "Grow Old Along With Me" came to my table from Revell's. We are so in the habit of judging the age of the body by the temper of the mind that I had always thought of Mr. Campbell as young. Yet I remember that when I first met him sixteen years ago he was then gray, so he must be at the age when he can write in full sympathy with those whose earthly years are mostly behind them. I am glad Mr. Campbell has written this book. I have a dozen friends that I would like to have read it. It would sweeten and brighten them. The author belongs to that eclectic group known as middle-of-the-road men. He never ventures far; and for this reason his is the book for our aged friends.

Mr. Campbell never shocks. His voice is always conversational, sometimes monotonously regular; but his mind is well stored with literature and hence his book has liberal and happy quotations.

The book consists of twenty-eight short chapters on subjects closely related to old-age, as for instance, The Reminiscent Habit, Going Down the Hill Together and The Dread of Growing Old.

It is a great achievement to grow old confidently; many ought to be helped by this book whose title is Browning's familiar words "Grow Old Along With Me." The panacea of the book is a reasonable use of our Christian faith.

Dance Halls and Liquor

"At a dance hall in Chicago a cash prize of $100 was offered to the girl who at the end of the month had the largest number of drinks placed to her credit." Miss Louise De Koven Bowen, of the Chicago Juvenile Protective Association, is authority for this appalling story.

"Most of the halls exist for the sale of liquor, not for the purpose of dancing, which is of the only secondary importance. A saloon opened into 190 halls, and liquor was sold in 240 out of 328. In the others except in rare instances—return checks were given to facilitate the use of neighboring saloons. At the halls where liquor was sold, practically all the boys showed signs of intoxication by 1 o'clock, possibly because it was almost impossible to get a drink of water in these halls.

"The dances are short—four to five minutes; the intermissions are long—fifteen to twenty minutes; thus ample opportunity is given for drinking. In halls where liquor is not sold intermissions are short and dances long. Is this not an argument for divorcing the sale of liquor from the dance hall?" Miss Bowen pertinently asks in the Survey.

There is no finer chemistry than that by which the element of suffering is so compounded with spiritual forces that it issues to the world as gentleness and strength. —George S. Merriman.

The Year's Progress Toward Unity

Address Delivered at Portland Convention

BY PETER AINSLIE.
Chairman Commission on Christian Union.

Above all other issues in Christendom today is the union of the divided church of God, for it has to do fundamentally with both the product of the highest type of Christianity and the world wide witnessing of Jesus as the Christ. Those conditions that made divisions in former years are either no longer living issues or they are no longer issues of such character as to separate brethren of the common faith. Their leaders were true, brave, conscientious men in the house of God, before whose memories we stand with unsandaled feet, but we are facing new issues and are ourselves parts of new conditions, so that we are now seeking more for our agreements than our disagreements and for those things that make for union rather than for those things that make for division.

Origin of Christianity.

Christianity started neither from theological ideas nor from ethical principles, but from the personality of Jesus Christ. To be in possession of its original power, it must go back to that personality. Great responsibility is resting upon all believers at this time, especially that missionary activities are greater now than in any period of the history of the church and, at the same time, our divisions are the greatest hindrances to the achievements of missions, both in the home land and on the foreign field.

The embarrassment on the foreign field, rivalry instead of comity in the home land, the increasing sensitiveness of the public scandal of a divided house and the growing consciousness of dishonor to the great Head of the church are forming a tide, whose advance no obstructions shall hinder.

Moved by the Holy Spirit a hundred years ago, Thomas Campbell made an earnest appeal to Christendom for the union of all believers and hosts of devout souls stood with him. They did not desire to be a separate communion then as we do not desire to be a separate communion now. But unripe Christendom forced those who took the name Christian only and the New Testament as their only authority into a separate communion and, while Christian fellowship has broadened with the years, that fellowship has not broadened enough to unstintedly practice brotherhood with all those who confess our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour.

Churches Move Toward Unity.

To make this call more emphatic, at the National Convention of the Disciples of Christ in Topeka last October, a counsel on Christian Union was organized and a commission of nine brethren was elected to execute the wishes of the counsel. It is significent that on the same day and at the same hour the Episcopalians in their National Convention in Cincinnati were appointing their commission for a World Conference on Faith and Order, which was suggested by the World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh. The Presbyterians already had a standing committee on church co-operation and union, as had also the Congregationalists. In July, 1910, an unofficial organization among the Episcopalians was formed under the title of the Christian Unity Foundation, with headquarters in New York City, and the purpose of this organization is to gather data relative to the various communions of Christendom—their origin, history and message—and this data is to be at the disposal of some future conference on Christian union. This is most valuable research work and the personnel of the Foundation includes some of the most distinguished men of the Episcopal church.

Various Conferences.

Later the committee on church co-operation and union of the Presbyterian church, through its chairman, Dr. W. H. Roberts, of Philadelphia, opened correspondence with our commission and later our commission opened correspondence with the Episcopal committee on Plan and Scope of the World's Conference on Faith and Order, through its chairman, Dr. Wm. T. Manning, of New York. We also opened correspondence with the committee on Comity, Federation and Unity of the Congregational church through its chairman, Dr. W. H. Ward, of New York. After considerable correspondence, and at the instance of our commission, a date was set for a personal conference with the Christian Unity Foundation in New York City, and, on the day following in the same city, for a conference with representatives from the official committees of the Episcopal, Presbyterian and Congregational communions. Among those who sat in the conference with our commission were Bishop Greer of the diocese of New York City, Bishop Lines, of the diocese of New Jersey, Bishop Courtney, of New York, Canon Douglas, of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, Dr. Manning of Trinity Church, Dr. W. H. Roberts, stated clerk of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, Dr. McKenzie, of New York, Dr. Ward, editor of the Independent, Dr. Newman Smyth, of New Haven, and others equally prominent in religious affairs, including a number of leading laymen whose names are well known in the commercial and political world. Out of these conferences, we are glad to announce that we have joined hands with our brethren of other communions for the call of a World Conference on Christian Union to be held five or six years hence, either in this country or Europe. Already nine separate American communions have officially accepted the invitation to meet with us in this World Conference, and have responded so graciously to this appeal that the day for the union of God's church appears to be nearer than many think.

Idle to Deny Differences.

It is idle to deny it, but there have been differences among us and there still are differences and to approach each other with confidence in the other and sincere courtesy is one of the most delicate problems before us. Many old time traditions are deeply rooted in the lives of believers and only patience with each other and fidelity to the spirit of Christ can keep the way open for the healing of this ugly sore of discord. The world is weary of religious controversies. It is asking that the church quit its ecclesiastical quarrels and go and live for Christ. Unfailing courtesy and sincere tactfulness must characterize our attitude to other communions. If we do not want to be called "Campbellites" then let us not call other communions "the sects." If the use of one term is ill-bred so is the use of the other. In God's eyes, we may all be members of sects and ourselves sectarians, so far as I know, but the thing is so painful whether it be in reference to my brother or to me, that it does not help the cause for which we plead to hurl at each other those terms that sting and wound. Call them what you please, but those of other communions are my brothers and it is left to me to send into the meaning of that term the warm blood of genuine affection.

Religious Convictions Deep-seated.

Said Dr. Henry C. Vedder: "The tendency of sectarian divisions is to perpetuate themselves long after the occasion for them has passed. Vested interests form themselves about a creed and a denominational organization, which have a powerful tendency to make permanent schisms that might otherwise be easily healed. The tremendous power of religious conservatism tends to eternalize the estrangement of those who once became estranged. Parents educate their children in the traditions of their sect. It is so notorious as to be matter of common complaint in every denomination, that the majority of members are not such because of any strong conviction, but because of birth and education; and the rest have been determined in their choice of a church by accident or residence or mere convenience. And yet, though sectarian conviction may no longer be strong, sectarian prejudice has lost little of its power. Nothing is more intractable, nothing is less amenable to reason, than inherited attitude towards religious truth, for, as we often remark, you cannot reason out of a man what was never reasoned into him."

Growth of Kindly Spirit.

The right understanding of each other presents a problem that cannot be solved at the wave of the hand.

Our commission is able to report that out of the conference held there has come a kinder spirit on our part towards others and on the part of others towards us. Not in a single instance was a discourteous word dropped, but the recognition of brotherhood has dominated the conferences and the one burden has been to find the way to remove the barriers to a permanent fellowship, where each soul will be untrammeled and free to love both our Lord and all those in fellowship with Him.

No one among us can afford to hurl stones

The Story of the Convention

How Events Happened at Portland

BY J. R. PERKINS.

EDITORS' NOTE:—Quite as interesting as the subject matter of this account of the Portland convention is the self-revelation of the writer of the story. Mr. Perkins, without intending to do so, discloses frankly a point of view quite characteristic not of himself alone but of a host of his brothers of the younger generation of Disciples. He has broken away from the hard dogmatism of an earlier generation, and perhaps of his own youth. The social interest is uppermost in his soul. He cannot help interpreting the convention in the light of those vaster, more real and more significant interests which modern men feel. On this fact we felicitate our readers. The account as written by Mr. Perkins leaves unsaid much, no doubt, that another type of mind might have dwelt upon, but it throws into relief those incidents and utterances which take on meaning in the world today. He was called to Portland by a Christian Century wire on the day the convention opened to take the place of one of the editors whose plans for attending the convention were upset at the last moment. The excellence of his report is the one compensation for our disappointment in being detained from the great gathering.

The unexpected always happens, especially in things ecclesiastical. Thus, certain things came to pass in the Portland convention that caused considerable surprise, and gave rise to some pretty warm discussions, though not on the convention floor. But this is ahead of the story.

The Woman's Session

That women perform their public duties with the utmost dispatch, and then retire gracefully, was never more fully demonstrated than in their missionary sessions. From the time Mrs. Atwater made her address on Wednesday morning, July 5, until the close of the C. W. B. M. program a day later, there was unusual interest and the high-water mark of enthusiasm. Mrs. Atwater is irresistible; so much so that you agree with her when you don't. The women of the church, who just happened to be present when she spoke—those women who have no particular interest in missionary work—either remained to pray, converts to this cause, or went away hopelessly lost to it.

A Salutary Disturber.

It has been said that the C. W. B. M. may at sometime prove itself to be a rather disturbing element in the male affairs of the church. Doubtless this is true in a certain sort of way. There is no controlling a woman, nor a woman's organization, and the best thing some of our leaders can do is to get out of the way, and let this work run its course. Really, if the C. W. B. M. programs are always as superior to some other sessions of the convention as they were at Portland, this is just the sort of disturbing element needed among the Disciples.

However, it required a man to make the best woman's address. W. P. Bentley was that man. Frankly he didn't look as if he were going to make much of a speech. But some of us forgot the work we were supposed to do in making notes, so intent were we in following him. His subject was, "Our Own Chinese." What he doesn't know about the Chinese problem on the Pacific Coast, with San Francisco as its center, wouldn't fill a leaflet; but what he does know, when half told, would make a book. He laid down the proposition that there are two men—a white man and a yellow man—and he came very near making us actually believe it in-so-far as the tremendous issues of tomorrow are concerned.

The Battle-water of the Future.

Anyhow, he made us feel that the Pacific Ocean is the battle-water of the future. Of course Mr. Roosevelt has said this also, but even then he quoted somebody; and he did not perhaps think of it just as Mr. Bentley made us think of it. His vision, confessedly, was a far reach, no mere time-serving pulpiteer nor pewpiteer (may we coin?) could see what he saw. For it was the eye of the prophet, and alas! there are not many eyes like it in church circles; leastwise we aren't troubling ourselves very much about the Chinese at our own door—15,000 in San Francisco alone.

Brotherhood Session

The Brotherhood Session, on the afternoon of July 5, was characterized by a sort of defensive spirit, as if expecting a blow from a hidden enemy. But nobody struck anybody! The session moved along peacefully, and everyone thought the afternoon was to be spent most amicably. The large auditorium of the First Presbyterian Church was crowded with men when R. A. Long, the president, arose to make his address. It revealed that he has been brooding deeply over brotherhood problems, and he clarified not a few things which hitherto have confused us. He closed; there was a moment's hesitation after the applause died out, then in somewhat anxious tones he asked for permission to make a statement.

A Tense Moment.

There was a little stir in the audience, like leaves on the trees when the first warning wind of an approaching storm sweeps through them; then there was a dead calm. Mr. Long's face seemed whiter than usual, and more tense. Evidently he was feeling something deeply. In his hand he held a copy of a paper which he said was one of the Disciples' religious journals. This paper, he said, contained an editorial entitled "A Regrettable Incident," which editorial he began to read amidst deep silence. The article was a comment on the position taken by Mr. Long in acquiting Edward Hines, charged with corruption in connection with the election of Senator Lorimer. Mr. Long, it seems, had been in Chicago attending a lumbermen's convention and at a session of the convention had pledged his faith in Mr. Hines by giving him his right hand in a dramatic and affecting way. The article expressed regret that Mr. Long had put himself on the wrong side of a great moral issue, and condoned the error by pointing out that his part on the program was impromptu and that therefore his genial impulses had probably led him to greater lengths than cool judgment would have allowed. When Mr. Long had done reading he looked up, stared for a moment toward the galleries, and said:

Not Personally Concerned.

"I don't speak of this because I am personally in the least concerned about it," said Mr. Long. "I have in days gone by heard men say, 'I care naught for public sentiment regarding what I may have done.' In numerous instances I have said when such a statement was made to me. 'You don't mean what you say,' because we are always concerned about public sentiment. But this is one time in all my life, and only one time, when I feel exactly that way.

"So conclusively was I then convinced of the fairness and manliness of my course that so far as I am concerned personally it matters not to me. But I am at the head, through your appointment, of one of your great organizations. There are some of you who are my personal friends, and without understanding the situation you might feel hurt to think I had, as this paper has said, taken the wrong side of a great moral issue.

Hines' Denial Recalled.

"The National Lumber Manufacturers' Association is a great clearing house, so to speak, of all the local manufacturing associations in lumber throughout the United States. That association is governed by a board of managers, selected from each of these manufacturing associations, throughout the country. Mr. Hines was elected president of the National Association two years ago, and I am satisfied that at that time he did not know one-third of the men who constituted this board of governors. So far as I know no one of them was a close personal friend of his. I do not mention that as derogatory to Mr. Hines, but for a reason that will appear later.

"The night before the meeting to which this paper refers, the board of governors was called together by Mr. Hines, and he spent an hour and a half in explaining in detail his connection with this Lorimer affair. In closing he said, 'I gave not a cent, raised not a cent, distributed not a cent, to Lorimer's election, and if there was money used I had nothing to do with it.' He said, 'This is a personal matter to you, and you have a right to know all about it.' I never looked into the face of a man which was more sincere than the face of Mr. Hines that night."

Embarrassment of Audience.

By this time you could have heard the proverbial pin drop. Some men were looking up toward the pipe organ, others were looking at the back of the seats in front of them, a few were searching the face of the speaker. After a moments pause he spoke again.

"While I was sitting there, I glanced over the program, and saw I was down to deliver the address the next day in response to the governor's speech. I had not been notified. I thought over the Hines case from that time until next morning. I did not make the statement hastily, as this article intimates I did. Neither did I make it from weakness, mentally or otherwise.

"Here was a man struggling under a false charge, and had I done differently than I did I would have regarded myself a moral coward. As Dr. Hinson spoke last night of the Good Samaritan on the Jericho road I thought if I had not extended my hand at that time I would have been like the man who passed by on the other side and refused to help the man who was innocent.

"As I closed my address I turned to Mr. Hines, and extended my hand, saying. 'Here's my hand. My sympathy and support shall be yours until, if ever, you are found guilty of the crime alleged.'"

Mr. Hines in the Samaritan Parable.

The great audience of men seemed to move unsteadily at this statement which likened Mr. Hines, the man under indictment, to the man who fell among thieves on the Jericho road. The audience took a deep breath, the speaker took a deep breath, and then he said, concluding.

"It was only a night's ride from Kansas City to where this paper is printed, and if the publisher wanted to do me a friendly act why didn't he submit this article to me instead of following what was said in the daily press, for good men sometimes make mistakes.

"Gentlemen, I would not that any of us individually or collectively, should ever condone a wrong, especially the wrong of which this man is charged. But I believe Almighty God expects us to wait until the testimony is in before we condemn a fellow man.

The silence that followed was positively painful. Then a man rose. "Bro. Long," said he, "won't you please tell us what paper you refer to?" The naivete of the interrogation caused some to smile out loud and the extreme tension was partly relieved. Mr. Long refused.

Confidence in Mr. Long.

Then another man rose. He seemed to think that Mr. Long was on trial instead of Mr. Hines. He offered a resolution expressing confidence in the president of the brotherhood. It was carried unanimously. More silence!

Then P. C. Macfarlane rose to speak. Perhaps he never made a more able address. Ethically, it cut the ground from under any in national life who seemed disposed to plunder the public treasury, raise slush funds, and buy up legislatures for private purposes. Perhaps this was but an incident in his rapid fire speech. It was practical for the most part.

A New Issue Born.

Conventions take turns that we dream not of. All of us had felt that the tense situations of the Portland Convention would be over the policy of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, which has recently been called in question by a religious publication. Not so; the tense situations of the national gathering which has just closed grew out of the incident at the brotherhood session, which only goes to show that ethical, and not theological, questions are much to the fore in the thought of the Disciples.

The Pacific North-west has set opinions on the ethics of a certain kind of lumber business and politics, and the temper of a large majority of the people is against not only those who have been proved guilty, but also against those who are on trial. Therefore it is not surprising that the Western press made much of the incident—much, too, that may never be satisfactorily explained. In the public eye the Disciples of Christ in convention assembled have, more or less, expressed disapproval of the heroic fight which all too few men in the nation are making against selfish interests.

Daily Press Representation.

Of course those of us who were there know better. The faces of most of our ministers are set like flint against just this sort of unrighteousness, sin worse than personal vice. It might have been expected that the press would overlook the fact of the confidence we all have in Mr. Long or give it scant notice. Upon the other hand most any one should have known that to inject this controversy into a brotherhood gathering of the convention would be to create diversity of opinion. And that is exactly what has been created. The press takes it that the head of the brotherhood movement has sided with Mr. Hines before the evidence is all in. The Disciples have been made to appear as having gone on record as giving a clear bill to a man under indictment whose chances for being proved guilty are at least equal with his opportunities of being proved innocent.

General Regret Over Incident.

The sentiment of the men at the convention apropos of the subject makes an interesting history at this time. Doubtless every man present had a voice in carrying the resolution which expressed confidence in Mr. Long. But to them he is not the issue. The issue is Mr. Hines. No doubt nearly as many of our men believe Mr. Hines to be guilty as believe Mr. Long to be innocent. At any rate expressions of regret were heard on every hand from the men who today are preaching the higher ethics of social righteousness.

It is a most hopeful sign: it is really indicative of the temper of the Disciples towards great social problems, and proves conclusively that in company with all Christian people we have advanced far, broadened our conception of the message of Christianity and deepened our conviction of the necessity of running the ethics of Christ to the very heart of social and commercial life. Portland and this incident of which we have written at length make up the line of demarcation between our theological controversy of yesterday and our sociological struggle of today. The knowledge of the pitiful inadequacy of a message of individual salvation alone, and for another world, to the neglect of social redemption in this life, has come to our people, not in a day to be sure, but has come nevertheless so overwhelmingly that we are positively amazed that we had not seen long ago.

The Resignation of Mr. Macfarlane.

Mr. Macfarlane retires as general secretary of the brotherhood, and the work henceforward will be carried on by a Board of Directors and two secretaries. Resolutions were adopted highly commending the work of the first secretary, and in token of the esteem in which he is held a beautiful solid gold watch was presented to him. He knows best his own affairs, but for the channel in which the brotherhood ship has moved since its making there is scarcely any pilot to take his place. The work is in debt, according to the reports, and will require the best efforts of the men who are to carry it on.

FOREIGN CHRISTIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY

With much anticipation an unusually large audience greeted the opening session of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society on Thursday morning. The air was not as electric as might have been supposed, for a great many battles had been fought and won before the opening meeting of this society. The fight which had been made on it had failed; the men who have guided its destiny for years had been re-elected, and later when the nominating committee brought in its report, and A. McLean, F. M. Rains, Stephen J. Corey and other officers and directors' names were placed before the convention there was a remarkable demonstration of approval, the significance of which surely created a ripple on the Pacific Ocean that ran around to the Gulf of Mexico, up the Mississippi, and thence into the Ohio, where it may have been served in drinking water the next morning at Cincinnati. The attack on the Foreign Society had broken down at every point. What more need be said?

Many will recall how Dr. Dye electrified our National Convention when he came home from Africa. He was the missionary of the hour among us then. This year that honor falls to Dr. Shelton of Tibet. The first thing that impresses you about the man is his sincerity—a trite word with a great deal in it these days. He said that it was harder for him to speak to us than it would be for him to operate on us, and he meant it. But we didn't think so, for some of us had never listened to so intensely human a message as leaped from this man's soul.

Inimitable Story Teller.

He proved to be an inimitable story-teller; the pathos and the whimsicalities of his own stories were lost on himself. When the people roared with laughter it seemed to startle him, and only when they cried, though no emotion showed in his own face, did he seem conscious that he was playing on such chords, and with deft, sure touches he would turn tears into laughter again. One of the most dramatic stories ever told in a National Convention was Mr. Shelton's story of the methods he had to employ to catch the ear of the natives and impel them to listen to the name of Christ. Following a series of cures and operations the people brought to him a leper, for so successful had he been that they had come to believe that he had power even over this. Then he told them of the Great Physician who had cured the leprosy, and who even now would cleanse the soul."

Secretary F. M. Rains closed a 42,000 mile journey over the mission fields in time to reach the convention. On Thursday he made his first address, and we were all pained to note that he appeared not so well as we were accustomed to see him. Just how great he is to our cause was perhaps never more fully realized than when he stood before us on the morning of July 6 and told of the long voyage and the work on the fields. One could not help thinking of Paul visiting the churches in the first century of the Christian era.

Praises for Australian Disciples.

"The Disciples in Australia are second to none," said Mr. Rains, and then he gave us a new vision of the possibilities in that field. He declared that there are no anti-missionary churches there, nor even omissionary churches. The gifts for missions have doubled in five years. While there he made arrangements with the brethren to have a delegate representing the churches of Australia to visit the churches of the United States every five years, while we in turn will send a delegate to that country.

Mr. Rains told of the cordial relations existing between the Baptists and Disciples in Australia. He said: "The difference between the Baptists and the Disciples is nothing more than tweddledee and tweddledum." The people applauded this statement vigorously, and if there was any one in the audience who would have liked to point out the doctrinal difference as to whether one is forgiven of his sins just before or just after his nose disappears under the baptismal waters he kept silent.

Especial Interest in China.

When Mr. Rains came to discuss the situation in China everybody was on tiptoe, so to speak. He said that there had been a great big fuss since he had been gone that was occasioned by those who fussed not knowing the facts. He declared that a union work on the foreign fields, especially the educational work is imperative. He had something to say on the baptismal question as relaed to the controversy. He really gave us about a five minute sermon on baptism. He declared that any one who talks about giving up the doctrine is on dangerous ground. "If the Foreign Society should get to wabbling on this question I'd leave it," he said.

In re-stating the Disciples' position on the question of baptism doubtless he said what most of us believe. But the significant thing was this—the applause was somewhat less than half what it had been when he spoke of other things. It was not that the audience was not convinced; it was convinced beforehand; we have not heard of any true Disciple "wabbling" on the question of baptism, but it was as if the people were not so much interested in the subject. They have evidently taken it for granted that baptism is obligatory upon the Disciples, even as Mr. Rains stated. But a thing may be obligatory and be less vital than certain other questions which are in the teaching of Christ. The very moment Mr. Rains left the controversial subject and returned to his narrative there was a quickening of interest.

Deeping Interest in Great Matters.

We are more convinced than ever that he who does not know that the present generation of Disciples is not concerned with polemics has not sensed their temper. It has dawned on us all at this Portland Convention, when we had every reason to expect doctrinal controversy, that the rank and file of Disciples are pondering the weightier matters of the law. Doubtless most of our leaders have become aware that the thinking of our people has been revolutionized almost within a single decade.

Dr. H. H. Guy, who spent several years in Japan, but who is now Dean of Berkeley Bible Seminary, made one of the strong addresses of this session on the Japanese situation. Speaking out of a rich and varied experience he asserted that union among the missionaries on the foreign field is a first imperative. Mr. Rains had already told us about the absolute necessity of educational union. Dr. Guy went a step further, and said that union evangelism is also necessary. He spoke from the standpoint of the Christian scholar. He has grasped the fact, which he clarified for us, that the forces of heathenism are resetting themselves to resist institutional religion, and that if the church ever succeeds in Christianizing Japan according to the ideal it has set before it union must first come.

AMERICAN SOCIETY'S SESSIONS.

Friday morning found the auditorium of the White Temple crowded for the opening session of the American Christian Missionary Society.

Dr. I. N. McCash is a pastmaster in the art of presiding, and he was in the chair. The address of President Harry D. Smith was regarded by many as one of the best ever given upon a like occasion.

It requires time to develop great personalities around which the work of a missionary society can be built. The men who are at the head of the Foreign Society have been made by, none the less than they have made that institution. Time has been required. Such is as essential to our missionary societies as it is to a pastor in some church. Great missionary secretaries are not made in a day, are not necessarily born, but are developed by a trusting, patient people. When shall we remove the danger that threatens our missionary secretaries from year to year—the danger that they may have to step down and out?

Secretaries Re-elected.

The re-election of Doctor McCash and of Grant K. Lewis, therefore, was heard with satisfaction, for these men are just beginning to get hold of the great missionary problem in America. And that such a problem exists, graver perhaps than any problem on the foreign field, more than one speaker significantly emphasized. Chief among these addresses was that of William Bayard Craig, of New York. Doctor Craig is inimitable. The night he spoke at White Temple there was a tremendous throng that moved sympathetically with him. He said some strong things—things that at first were not applauded because he dealt very frankly with the folly of our denominational boasting—something sometimes indulged in by some convention speakers. He said:

Great Note Struck by Dr. Craig.

"There is a bigger question before the churches of America than any mere question of polity. The fate and future of Christianity is to be decided in America. It is the most critical period in the history of the church. I am not a pessimist; I am an optimist facing facts. The spirit of sectarianism is dead in New York. Being a Presbyterian or a Methodist or a Disciple has nothing to do with church attendance there; the people go where there is some man who can reveal the heart of God to them. Sin is whipping the churches in the great cities. Union alone can save the church in America."

Beyond the shadow of a doubt Doctor Craig struck one of the highest notes for federation and co-operation that was ever sounded in any of our conventions. The people cheered him to the echo. We wonder if all the leaders in our religious body accepted his conclusion. He left us no ground—no boasting ground—on which we could stand and shout our own sectarian shibboleths to the churches. It was a clarion call for the Disciples to lose themselves together with other religious bodies in co-operation, and, at last, actual service to human kind in the congested centers of America.

Church Extension Program.

C. R. Hudson, of Frankfort, Ky., in giving a church extension address, very pertinently said that too much of our evangelism runs to numbers, and too often leaves a great crowd of people without an adequate church building. "Growth in numbers is rarely attended by growth in reverence," he declared. He pointed out a very grave defect in much of our ministry—the building up of a church around a preacher instead of around Christ, with our missionary interests to the fore rather than our local reputation.

Secretary George W. Muckley said indications are that the best offering in the history of church extension will be taken in September. Definite pledges from 735 churches have already been received; the offering thus far shows an increase of 101 contributing churches over last year.

A speaker from Manitoba warned us in his home missionary address against placing too much confidence in some of the land advertisements appearing in our religious journals. Happily the day of the so-called "Christian Colony" has passed. The sad experiences the Disciples have had, the reputations that have gone glimmering the real estate route—all have combined to teach us the lesson that it is better to attend to the things of the Lord than to barter in lands for the brethren in the name of the Lord.

H. J. Loken of Berkeley, Cal., described his state as the "New Italy." Really, his eight minutes' address was one of the strong speeches of the convention, limited as it was. The opening up of the Panama Canal, the transfer of commerce from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the awakening of the Orient, make the Pacific Coast the strategic shore line of the nation.

M. M. Ryan, of Canada, significantly said: "Canada has taken advanced ground on the question of Christian union. The churches are federating, for the country cannot sustain competing denominations; Canada is advancing too fast for them."

Christian Teachers and Public Schools.

Several timely resolutions were adopted at the sessions of the American Christian Missionary Society. One of the most significant was, "Resolved that we memorialize the president of the United States, the president of the Senate and the speaker of the House of Representatives to use their influence in removing the ban now forbidding Protestant teachers in the public schools from teaching in Sunday-schools." "Apropos of this Mr. Rains had told of an incident where one of our own Sunday-school teachers in the Phillipines was requested to refrain from teaching under the penalty of losing her position as a public school teacher. "We should tell Champ Clark about it," he cried in characteristic fashion, and the audience roared its approval.

Louisville Gets Next Convention.

The report of the committee on the unification of the Missionary Societies and other organizations was deferred until the next convention, which goes to Louisville, Ky. It was decided to send a fraternal delegate to the Baptist convention in Canada. The society has set the million dollar mark before it by 1915, and as the churches of the Pacific Coast have asked for the National Convention that year—the year the Panama Pacific Exposition will be held—it is most likely that the West will hear of the fulfilment of this aim.

Growth in Benevolence.

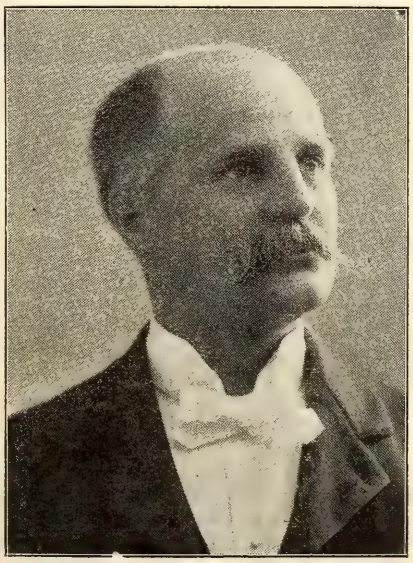
The convention was delighted with the report given by J. H. Mohorter, secretary of the National Benevolent Association. There has been a $5,000 gain over the best previous record. This year has also seen the largest individual gift; and even while this session was being held a telegram came to Mr. Mohorter announcing a $16,000 annuity. Everything points to the fact that there has been a great awakening among Disciples as to this charity. And if it is possible for us to substitute charity for social and economic reconstruction, which should come first, then, in performing the lesser, it behooves us to do our utmost by this method.

It dawned on us at this session that the Disciples have become a rich people, and our men of wealth, adopting the methods of rich men in other religious bodies, are seeking avenues through which they can pour their means into larger channels of benevolence.

Great Hospital Plans.

Nothing created more enthusiasm in the convention, and at the same time touched a more tender chord, than the recital of the plans for the great hospital in Kansas City.

Secretary Grant K. Lewis.



Rev. Wm. Bayard Craig D. D.

Rev. C. R. Hudson.

In all probability, according to the enlarged scheme, it will be one of the dozen great hospitals of the world. Mr. Long said that if he lived, within the next ten years he would give a million dollars to this enterprise, provided the churches raised a like amount in the same period which would be only $100,000 a year for nearly a million and a half people. This hospital will be complete in every respect, and perhaps is the best expression of the thought of the men who are building it as to what can be done today to relieve suffering humanity.

Charity and Social Reconstruction.

In all probability this expression of charity on the part of the wealthy men of the brotherhood is evidence that they hold that the economic conditions are not apt to undergo any change; that millionaires are not expecting any change, and that men of fortunes do not believe that any change could be made for the better except by a service of charity to the world's indigent. In a mild way, it is the method of opportune socialism; it cures a great many immediate ills, but it does not remove causes.

There is a great company of Disciples who believe in removing causes; the social message is paramount both in their preaching and living; they see the great gulf already fixed between the church and a certain world of which the church heretofore has scarcely been cognizant of. There were many such Disciples in the convention; they represent the opposite in thinking to those who build hospitals, and seek to better the world as opportunity may give money the power. There is not any necessary antagonism between these seeming polar ideas as to the function of Christianity, but that each needs a little of what the other has is very patent to those who have studied the subject through.

Marvelous Sunday-school Development.

It was a great joy to us all to learn of what is being accomplished by Robert Hopkins and assistants in the National Sunday-school work. The interest was attested by the great audience that crowded the White Temple to its doors on Saturday afternoon of July 8. Robert Hopkins impresses us as a leader who has already arrived. His grasp of the work, despite the short time he has been in it, was a revelation. If he remains free (and we believe that he would remain in the work under no other conditions) our organized Sunday-school work will take first rank in every respect in the Christianity of America. Already have we won first place in the International Association reports as regards adult Bible classes, having an enrollment of 132,276 out of 544,262. Mr. Hopkins said so far as he knew there is but one endowed Sunday-school chair in all the colleges of the country, and that is among the Disciples. With unconscious humor, he said that about the only Sunday-school lecture courses in colleges are worked up by the lecturers themselves.

Duty to Foreigners at Home.

It has been felt among us for sometime that we take no particular interest in the aliens in America. That they don't comes with startling clearness to us when Mr. Hopkins said: "There are not twenty-five Disciple Sunday-schools among the aliens in this country." This reveals to us that we are yet a rural folk; that we are none too far removed from the developing of the cross-roads, school-house-type of Sunday-school to the neglect of needy, congested centers. The one we should do and the other we should not leave undone.

The Closing Hours

The closing sessions of the convention perhaps found more church visitors and delegates in Portland than the two or three preceding days, for numerous excursions were run, bringing great throngs. The two communion services, held in the White Temple and the First Presbyterian Church, were the largest ever held in Portland and the Northwest.

The Disciples of Christ ring true on the temperance question, and Monday, the last day of the convention, gave some very able addresses on the social and ethical phases of this vital subject.

Comity at Sunday Services.

Perhaps more churches in Portland were occupied by our ministers on Sunday, July 9, than there ever were at a convention in a city of its size. Comity prevailed everywhere, even to the Universalist Church, and the message of Christian union was heard at the most strategic point in the great north west.

Many of our leaders (and we have many leaders) regard the Portland convention as being the dividing line between yesterday and today in things ecclesiastical. We have advanced much farther than most of us have dreamed. Our leaders have learned that our rank and file are abreast of modern conditions; that they have sensed keenly the social and the theological problems, and for the most part, have turned their faces away from the past. Our leaders, whether appointed or self-constituted, have come to know that no mere party shibboleth can longer arouse denominational pride; but that our chiefest pride henceforth is to be found in carrying out in spirit and in truth the program of Christ.

Portland proved itself to be a fine convention city; Mr. Reagor never had a superior as a chairman on entertainment; Mr. Picton as secretary, could scarcely have been surpassed, and all in all, the local and state workers did admirably.

WHAT THE SOCIETIES HAVE DONE

Christian Woman's Board of Missions

Recommendations of the National Executive Committee to the National Board.

1. That the aim for the year 1911-12 shall include four points: Financial, membership, Missionary Tidings, and an intensive call to prayer.

2. That the financial aim be placed in advance of receipts for this year.

3. That the National Board in session at Portland appoint a committee on watchword and aim for the year 1911-12. The executive committee to act on this report as final.

4. That as one special effort emphasis be placed on the securing of shares or half shares in station support from individua's and auxiliaries.

5. That in this year's study of the fields and forces of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in the Auxiliary and Circle meetings we shall make a special study of our various mission stations, the plots of ground, the buildings and their location.

6. That the living link standard continue to be placed as a recognized achievement in individuals, auxiliaries, mission circles and families.

Considering the growing interest in the living link standard, that the securing of twenty-five new ones be determined as one of the aims of the year 1911-12.

7. That a preparatory for the C. W. B. M. Day offering our pastors be asked to give a message in the interest of the Christian Woman's Board of Mission the Sunday preceding the time for the offering, or on that day.

8. That the Easter self-denial period be continued.

9. That auxiliaries and all field workers be again reminded that the support of orphans is for individuals and the Children's Missionary Societies—the support of mountain scholarships and co-workers (native helpers) is the special work of the Mission Circles.

10. As a help to all the above named interests and many others, and for the general cause of missions, the executive committee recommends for favorable consideration the plan and suggestions presented by the central committee on united mission study to all women's boards for a continued united interdenominational effort for foreign missions.

11. Also we desire to give notice that at the last executive meeting before coming to Portland action was taken that the Christian Woman's Board of Missions co-operate in the Southern jubilee campaign during the months of October and November.

Miss Florence Miller, who so efficiently represented our board in the coast to coast series of jubilee rallies, is to be our representative.

The Southern jubilee campaign headquarters will be located in Nashville. As we are permitted two members on this committee, Mrs. Minnie W. Robertson, state president of Tennessee, and Mrs. Elliott, of Nashville, have been appointed.

The total receipts for nine months were $225,722.68.

Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ

In point of numerical growth we have to report at this moment 140 local brotherhoods, affiliated with the national office and articulating under the plans of the Brotherhood general office, which is an increase in ten months of 45. Through our influence, there have been many Brotherhoods formed, not yet affiliated, numbering 236, an increase in ten monthse of 105. During the year seed has been sown in thousands of fields, and in 495 churches, the matter of organization has been considered, but not consummated.

Christian Men.

The subscription list to "Christian Men" grew to 20,000 at the Topeka Convention. Through expiration and failure to renew, the list has dropped to 17,000 copies monthly. We rely altogether upon our friends to keep up our list, and are bending every effort to make the magazine the best masculine religious publication issued by any society.

Finances.

The operation of the office, salaries of office force and secretaries during the ten months was in round numbers $20,000. Against this was an income of $7,000, leaving the net deficit $15,000, or an average of $1,500 per month that has been supplied by Brother Long. We who are charged with financing this movement pray for the co-operation of a great number of our men in a financial way. We have been led to believe that our plan of local dues is not acceptable to our men, and at a recent meeting of the executive board, it was voted to recommend to the Advisory Council, which will meet at some time during this week, that the matter of local dues be eliminated. In place of the local dues, there will be an annual offering from the Brotherhood chapters of the national movement, toward the expenses of the office, and the following memberships: General memberships, $1 per year, including the subscription to "Christian Men" magazine; advisory memberships $5 per year, including magazine; sustaining memberships, $10 per year, including magazine; centurion membership $100 per year, including magazine; life memberships $500 or more at one time, includes magazine. E. E. ELLIOTT, Assistant Sec'y.

Board of Church Extension

The receipts for the year through the corresponding secretary are $41,044.50 for the first nine months of the year. The church Extension Board necessily makes the most fragmentary report of all the boards, since the annual offering does not come until September. Including return loans and interest, which amount to $117,985.78, the total receipts for Church Extension work aggregate $159,030.31.

The annual offering thus far shows an increase of one hundred and one (101) contributing churches over the last year and an increase of $2,640.35 in receipts over the same period last year. Already seven hundred thirty-five (735) churches have promised to make the annual offering in September and the signs are bright for the best offering in our history.

Loans for the Year.

Fifty-five (55) churches were aided to build during the year in loans aggregating $127,873. Seventy-one (71) other churches were promised loans, whose buildings are now in course of construction, aggregating $145,000. During the year sixty-eight churches paid their loans in full, and since the beginning $1,166,088.67 has been returned on loans to go out and build other churches. One thousand four hunared thirty-one (1,431) churches have been aided to bui'd since the beginning and we now have $870,-854.94 in the Church Extension fund.

Our new secretary, John H. Booth, who began his work the first of Mav. has proven himself to be the right man in the right place. G. W. MUCKLEY, Cor. Sec'y.

Foreign Christian Missionary Society

Our receipts to July 1, are $208,868. We are ahead on our general receipts $1,300, from churches and Sunday-schools; but we have a loss in annuities of $11,867.

We have appointed the followng missionaries: Mr. and Mrs. McCallum have gone to the Philippines and Dr. John Sergius has gone to Persia, which is a new field opened.

Miss Nina Palmer, of Drake University, Des Moines, has been appointed to China, and will sail the first of September.

S. J. COREY, Secretary.

Ministerial Relief

Forty preachers and thirty-eight widows is our enrollment for the year thus far. These and those dependent upon them constitute our Ministerial Relief family. These faithful men and women have done their Lord's cause a splendid service. Their names are on the honor roll of the kingdom.

The total new money receipts, including both the general and the permanent fund, is $12,433.56—a gain of $1,386.63 over same period of last year. Eleven hundred dollars of this amount is annuity money—$1,951 from an estate. This is the fifth year we have been able to report a gain over the preceding year. For five consecutive years the board has asked for $25,000, assuring the brotherhood that this amount would meet the demands of the work. And yet here is a duty and responsibility to which our Christianity has not responded.

To the end that we might meet the financial obligations of the work, Brother R. A. Long, upon whose heart rests the interests of the kingdom, made the proposition that he would give one-fifth as much as the entire brotherhood in any sum between $20,-000 and $30,000 annually for a period of five years; provided he shall live so long. This generosity was received with the highest appreciation by all present. The president of the Board of Ministerial Relief expressed himself as feeling sure that to meet this proposition solves the question of Ministerial Relief among us, for once we reach the annual support of $25,000 we will not fail to meet any additional responsibility through increase in the demands of the work. A. L. ORCUTT, Secretary.

American Christian Missionary Society

Receipts.

Church gain, $5,689.52; Sunday-school gain, $4,683.78. Gain, other sources, $2,038.-14; total gain, regular receipts, $12,411.44; loss, bequests and annuities, $16,600.58.

Our Five-Year Campaign.

A campaign for one million dollars, inaugurated at Topeka, to end with the formal opening of the Panama Canal in 1915, is awakening deep interest. Many strong men and churches believe that a million dollars can be raised in that time. The advantage of such a plan lies chiefly in the forward look. The Disciples, not already aroused, will be awakened next year and the year following. They will be made to feel that but four years, then three years, then two years, then one year, remain in which to complete this undertaking. The enthusiasm will be cumulative. Furthermore the linking of our religious work with the greatest event of America's enterprise, is to utilize the patriotism and national glory in achieving material things with the conquest of Christ in the homeland.

GRANT K. LEWIS, Secretary.

Disciples at the University of Chicago

More congratulatory sentiment on the proposal to erect two buildings of $50,000 each for Divinity House and Hyde Park Church.

Dear Brother Ames:—I am very much interested in the proposed building enterprise of the Disciples' Divinity House and the Hyde Park Church. There can be no question of the need in our denomination of a Divinity House that shall fully meet the requirements of modern scholarship and this, one can readily see, can only be done when the resources of the denominational faculty are added to those of a great university like Chicago. Such an institution, however, requires a local habitation as well as a name, and this must be in keeping with its aims and ideals. In other words, if you build at all it must be on a large and generous plan.

One hundred thousand dollars is not too much to spend when we consider the dignity of our movement and the strategic position that the proposed church and hall will occupy in a city of millions and hard by the campus of the university which, more than any other, has its grip on the future. I think, that in view of the neighboring architecture of the university, notably the Mitchell Tower and Gymnasium, the authorities would almost have the right to forbid the erection of anything that was not altogether worthy. H. D. C. MACLACHLAN.

Seventh St. Church, Richmond, Va.

My dear Dr. Ames:—It is in keeping with the courageous spirit of Chicago Disciples for the Hyde Park Church and the Divinity School to enter upon so large but necessary an undertaking. During my year's work in the city I have been amazed at the magnitude of the enterprise in which our people, numerically so weak, have engaged. This $100,000 building project which you announce supersedes anything I have heard of among our churches. But certainly no one with a casual acquaintance with the conditions would think it large.

And of course the churches will stand by you as they have other churches in building. But I think we will have an unusual interest in your project because it is "ours" in a sense in which we can consider no other sister church. Hyde Park Church is our University Church.

But our entire brotherhood should have fellowshinp in the erection of the Divinity House which will represent the brotherhood in this great university. C. C. BUCKNER.

Irving Park Church, Chicago.

My dear Dr. Ames:—Your proposed building for the Hyde Park Church and The Disciples' Divinity House is of great interest to me, and will likewise command the sympathy of many of our brethren. Both the Hyde Park Church and the Divinity House have long needed more favorable quarters, and the combination is certainly a happy one. The opportunity to serve the cause of Christ in one of the greatest student centers of America justifies the plan, and your proximity to the splendid group of University buildings demands the very best structure which can be affforded. I congratulate you upon the project and hope it may be carried to an early completion.

at the other. Our faith, our repentance and our baptism—beautiful as they are in New Testament setting—become a collection of poor, shoddy things unless there is with these forbearance, forgiveness and love. To be a Disciple of Christ does not mean that one must hold to some doctrinal position of Alexander Campbell or Isaac Errett, but that he must practice a life similar to that of Jesus Christ, otherwise the Disciples become a sect and the work of both Campbell and Errett is destroyed. Christ and Christ alone must be our ideal.

Whatever position others may hold, to the Disciples of Christ belongs the position primarily of laboring in season and out of season for the union of the divided house of God. Others may do as they please, but if we do not practice brotherhood with all we drop to the level of a sect and all the arguments in the world cannot lift us out of that sink. Only love can do it. And by love I do not mean something indefinite and etherial, but common sense, every day love that is as visible and as practical as baptism or the Lord's supper.

The tides of love are rising in human hearts, as sap rises in the trees in the time of spring. The warm breath of God is being felt among men like April suns in orchards and forests, for the summer of Christianity is coming. We must be patient and prayerful. We must not seek pre-eminence nor leadership, but we must give ourselves unreservedly to Christ and to all who love him. Doctrinal differences are not the greatest hinderances to union, but our bigotery, our sectarianism, our unbrotherliness, our meanness—not the other fellow's, but these evils in my own heart and yours—these are the real barriers that must be removed first, for the solution lies not in our theories nor in our compromises, nor in our dogmas, but in fidelity to the personality of Jesus Christ. Doctrinal shibboleths cannot bind us into union, but the living Christ in the hearts of believers will bring us into one flock as there is one Shepherd.

Our Readers' Opinions

"The Gordian Knot"

The gordian knot, with us as a people, seems to be our attitude toward the pious unimmersed. The 'Century' increasingly interests me, because it says fine, bold, frank and illuminative things on both sides the problem! How very human and natural that it should in the search for truth and life. But as the spirit of the 'Century' is hopeful, helpful, prayerful, it heartens rather than dismays me.

Yet the knot's tough strings don't all tighten on the mission fields; they constrict the heart of every working pastor at home. I am moved to allow an evidence of advancing age and make a personal testimony of experience with the problem, to make, if it be deemed wise and fair, a closer target for the 'Century's splendid editorial broadsides; a few shots of which, when they crossfire, impress me as poor shooting.

In one of my college charges was the husband of a splendid woman in the church: through years I talked and prayed and planned to immerse him—but he is yet unimmersed, though others have made the same or better effort. A farmer, he is pious, singing, informed on kingdom matters, working right along with his wife in the Christian church—but remaining a Quaker. I believe he has as good a chance for heaven as any man I know; he keeps daily companionship with Christ, starting the day with family worship, but his 'birth-right' satisfactions as a Quaker give him an amount of rightful blessed assurance surpassed by no man of larger faith in forms. I've since known other Quakers of the same quality of character, worth and religious action. And I don't sense at present any influence stressful enough to cause me to question the Christianity of a true Quaker. Logically, by all the proof texts of entrance, they are not in Christ! Yet there is something deep within me that makes me like their company.

Of course I have immersed many people who had had baptism in other form. In one of my services a man retired from active life, came forward with his grown daughter; the wife and mother of the household already a member of my congregation. When I had baptized them, he said "I wouldn't have done this, except to please my wife, to be in the same church with her and daughter." I was nearly struck speechless, but murmured some inanities about the beauty of an undivided family, and returned to my study feeling like a villian—like I was particeps criminis in an absolutely superfluous and illegal ceremony. Whatever virtue may be in immersion as an act I can't feel that immersion had any worth at all. But the man liked my preaching and, I supposed, had been brought to see Christ's will under it, for he had not been going to any other church for a year.

A banker came into my study one day with "My wife is a member of this church; we both like you; I know your church requirements; will you immerse me so I can be a member of the same church with my wife? Will immersion do me any good while I'm fully content with my sprinkling?" And I said to him: "No sir, immersion won't help your Christian character in the premises and I won't baptize any man in the name of his wife; but I will read the Book with you to get a clear understanding of Christ's will." Now that man is a Christian in spirit, conduct and character: but he can't see through immersion.

Two women had me meet them by appointment in one of their homes; one the wife of a leading professional man, the other the wife of a progressive merchant, and both of them mothers of children near grown and one said for the two: "We like your church services and want to unite with the congregation; is there any other way than by immersion?" And I had to say, "Ladies, there is no other way; my church believes that to be Christ's way and my church exists to do his will; knowing your devotional habits, Christian characters and passion for a closer walk with God, I'd personally like to receive you, because your church membership is afar off and you need a local religious home; but I can't." With these two, in the same community, are a half dozen other people of Christian character who have said to me they would unite with my church were it not for the requirement of immersion, being content with their baptism in other form. They are influential, admirable people in human ways. Facing their catholic sympathies, charitable activities and religious fervor, I wonder sometimes if I am any thing more than a little narrow proclaimer of special views, bound upon me by the authority of the brotherhood with which I stand. Then the second reflection has never failed me that I am a Christ man rather than a mere brotherhood man and it's the will of the Master rather than of the brotherhood for which I am set.

In a Yale church history class one day I was asked to set the Disciple position on baptism forth, and made a stagger at it. The class heard, and the professor made the rejoinder in a courteous way that the Pauline position in emphasizing the spirit of a thing rather than the form was the Congregational idea. I laid emphasis on the form; Paul does too as I read him; but sprinkling as a form can be just as impressive as immersion to any mind grasping their symbolism.

Personally, I'd like to sprinkle infants, adults—all penitents coming to me in search for the way of life; it's easier; it's just as impressive in its symbolism; it's approved by the major portion of the believing world; I'd like to receive without immersion other Christians from any body of believers coming to live and work in the body wherewith I live and work; but my will and desire enters no great way into the situation.

I'm an ambassador for Christ and beseech men in His stead to be reconciled to God; it's His way and desire I'm going to observe rather than my own. So did our forefathers in the faith; they wanted, they pleaded and fought for a forsakement of human expedients and traditional modifications of the gospel path of simplicity and sufficiency; our forefathers were called of God and blessed of Him in their unwelcome reforms; we are called of God today as long as we are champions of His revealed way and will; let us just do that and leave all contingent and correlated eventualities to Him; He will control them to the glory of the Name to which supremacy, practical supremacy, is inevitably coming.

In the meantime, instead of 'argufying' so much and splitting drops of water midst theologic hairs, let's practice Christian unity in good works and let whoso wants to join the ranks of the 'mud-dobbers' society and continue their vacuous raspings over speculative straws.

The brass tacks of present Christian conditions are that God has people in all religious bodies; in the same bodies the devil has folks who are trying to place all others now for time and eternity; they are usurping the divine prerogative: 'What's all this to thee? Preach thou the kingdom of God!' We are wanting settled now—and ex-cathedra—things that belong to the ages in love's subgugation of the world to Christ.

Who's to prevent our practice of Christian unity? No one but the perverse folk who won't practice it with us. And in the measure we fail to practice it in our own ranks with papers, organizations, etc., we deservedly become the laughing stock of the religious world. Come Quaker, Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregationalist, or what not by name—we want to work with you for the Kingdom of righteousness in the world; we are not asking you to join us and do our will; we stand in the world to do Christ's will and help men of whatever origin or extraction to do likewise; we are open to truth's incoming always, from anywhere; show us where we have gotten in wrong and the Lord will give us grace to back water.

Vincennes, Ind. E. F. Daugherty.

Frankly Facing the Problem

The following editorial from The Christian Worker, organ of the great Central Church, Des Moines, is encouraging in its singularly gracious spirit and its frank recognition of the problem which the Disciples face today. We do not understand what is meant by the term "affiliated fellowship." To us fellowship is fellowship, and it does not appear why there need be distinct grades of fellowship among those who are all equally members of the church of Christ. But the editorial looks in the right direction. The ultimate solution of the problem is not in doubt if once it is faced as a problem. Following is the quotation, under the heading "Vital Issues Among the Disciples of Christ":

"The vital issues with us are the fruits of the spirit. The domain of their exhibition is where we touch elbows with our religious neighbors. The place of greatest emphasis is where we have the most immediate contact with other Christians. If we love not the Christians whom we have seen, how can we love God whom we have not seen? Two doors of opportunity are ours. (1.) Co-operation with other communions. To show an unfraternal spirit to our religious neighbors is to misrepresent the people with whom and the Christ for whom we stand. Union services may not fill up our church so fast but they fill up His church. We preach in vain the organic union of the church if we do not preface our remarks with a little bit of love that will sacrifice the individual interest of our congregation for the demonstration of good will toward all Christian workers.

"(2.) Affiliation on the foreign field. Though our workers are far flung on that dark horizon, yet one of the most burning problems to be adjusted by this generation. The converts who remove from one territory to another are disappointed to find that their former Christian faith may not suffice to admit them to membership in the new Christian community to which they have come. Not being able to understand the minute doctrinal differences for which we contend on the home field and unhappily have carried to the foreign field, they must wait among their heathen people and possibly be lost. The most satisfactory proposal is that these shall be received into affiliated fellowship until they are taught more perfectly the way of the Lord. Just as we invite all Christians to meet with us about the Lord's table, since neither the table nor the church are our but the Lord's.

"Far above all issues which we nail to our banners on doctrinal subjects is it important that the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount and practice of the life of Jesus in love shall lead us both to keep his commandments and to show his thought of Brotherhood to a lost world."

15. In what year was Jerusalem finally overthrown?
16. To what extent was it destroyed?
17. Why did not Jeremiah go to Babylon with the other exiles?
18. Where were the remnants of the people gathered after the fall of the city?
19. What caused some of them to take refuge in Egypt, and why did they take Jeremiah with them?
20. What do you consider the strong features in the character of Jeremiah?

1. FALSE HOPES.

When Jerusalem was captured by Nebuchadrezzer in 597 B. C. and the unfortunate King Jehoiachin was taken away with his court and the more resourceful of the citizens to Babylon, the prophecies that had been uttered by Jeremiah regarding the chastisement of the nation were deemed accomplished. The event was after all not so dire as might have been anticipated. The city still remained. The temple and the palace, though robbed of many of their treasures, were left to testify to the integrity of the national life. A new king was placed upon the throne in the person of Zedekiah, a third son of the revered Josiah, and all things moved on as before.

This state of affairs bred false hopes in the hearts of the people of Judah. There was a disposition to regard the punishment that had befallen the city as amp'e and easily endured. It was the general belief that those who had been taken away into captivity would soon return. Ezekiel, one of the younger members of that company of exiles, found the same impression prevalent in the colonies of Jews in Babylonia, and strove earnestly to warn his friends against their easy-going optimism.

This now became the chief task of Jeremiah in Jerusalem. The professional preachers of the time insisted that now their troubles were over, and prosperity would surely come apace. Jeremiah denounced these preachers in unmeasured terms. They were false prophets, he said; not because they preached the worship of other gods, but because they were proclaiming a message which was out of date. Isaiah had indeed insisted upon the inviolability of Jerusalem, but that time was past and a new message of warning was now required. The essence of false prophecy is the proclamation of a word which is no longer true, however true it may once have been (ch. 23). The prophet felt that the nation was like figs, worthless and fit only for destruction (ch. 24).

In the effort to convince the people that worse things were yet to come, Jeremiah was compelled to confront certain of the false prophets who had gained prominence by their popular assurance of safety. Among them was a certain Hananiah, who insisted that within two years the captives should return (ch. 28). Jeremiah denounced him and foretold his unhappy end. He also wrote a letter to the people who had gone from Jerusalem and were now living in Babylon, urging them to settle permanently in that land and not to look for an early return. He told them plainly that at least seventy years would pass before the fugitives could come again to their home land (ch. 29). It seems probable from words in this letter that the same type of false prophecy which was the curse of the nation at home prevailed in Babylonia as well (ch. 29:20).

2. THE LAST OF THE KINGS.

The man who was p'aced upon the throne of Judah to complete the period of its national existence was Mattaniah, an uncle of the deported King Jehoiachin. He was given the throne name of Zedekiah, and ruled Jerusalem during the last decade of its history. He was much more friendly to Jeremiah than Jehoiakim had been. He regarded him with mingled reverence and fear. But he was not strong enough to resist the popular and jingo party at court. The men in control hated the prophet bitterly, and the king was not quite able to face their hostility and protect the man whom he really reverenced.

Zedekiah took counsel of Jeremiah on many occasions, but he lacked the courage to follow his advice. The prophet warned him against any effort to break his covenant of obedience to the Babylonian empire. He pointed out the evil consequences of any such action in the certainty of swift punishment. Yet so strong was the anti-Babylonian feeling at the court of Judah, and so explicit were the promises made by Egypt that she would support any efforts to throw off the Babylonian yoke, that Zedekiah was forced, perhaps against his own judgment, to inaugurate rebellion. The result was easily foreseen. The army of Nebuchadrezzer was soon hastening westward, not merely to punish the little state of Judah, but to overawe the entire western coast land.

Jeremiah warned the king that he could expect no mercy from Babylon, but that this time Jerusalem was doomed to total destruction (ch. 21:34:1-7). When the danger was near, panic fell upon the citizens of Jerusalem. In their effort to meet the crisis they sought to win the favor of God by the release of their slaves. Such an act would have marked them for divine approval if only it had been dictated by any other than selfish fear. The shallowness of such a repentance was soon revealed. The king of Egypt actually made a pretense of carrying out his promise to assist Judah against her eastern foe. He marched northward and the people of Jerusalem hailed his coming as a proof that their troubles were over. Nebuchadrezzer turned away from the investment of Jerusalem to meet his southern foe and it looked as if rescue had really come. But the Egyptians soon withdrew from the scene, leaving the city to its fate. However, before this was known, the people of Judah, confident that their danger was past, reclaimed their released slaves, thus proving the insincerity of their former good conduct. For this Jeremiah denounced them afresh (Jer. 34:8-22; 37:1-10).

3. JEREMIAH IN PRISON.

It was during this period that the prophet decided to pay a visit to his old home at Anothoth. But so pronounced had been his anti-Egyptian sentiments and so consistent his prediction that the Babylonians would finally take Jerusalem, that in his attempt to leave the city, he was arrested and charged by the officer on guard with an attempt to desert to the Babylonian camp. This arrest resulted in his imprisonment in a house used for the confinement of the lower type of criminals (Jer. 37:11-15).

The Moral Leaders of Israel is a Sunday School course for Young People's and Adult Bible Classes. It will continue throughout the year 1911. The publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY will supply classes of six or more with weekly copies of the paper containing these lessons, at $1 per year for each copy, or 30 cents per quarter. The class members will receive in addition to their Sunday-school lesson all the rich things provided every week in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY. The papers distributed to the class on Sunday will contain the lesson for the following Sunday. Orders should be sent through the regular Sunday-school Treasurer if you wish to pay quarterly; or you may deal directly with the Publishers, enclosing remittance at the rate of $1.00 per year for each copy ordered. Be sure and give name of teacher or class member to whom papers shall be sent for distribution.

But the king was too much in need of Jeremiah's counsel not to interview him now and then. The prophet sought no favor for himself, save the change of his prison to a more wholesome place. He continued to assure the king that there was no hope for the city, but that it must inevitably fall (37: 16-21). The hatred in which Jeremiah was held by the courtiers and soldiers resulted in still more severe treatment. He was accused of the most unpatriotic conduct, and, though the king may have wished to save him as far as he could, he was compelled to approve of Jeremiah's imprisonment in a dungeon more foul than before. Here he actually sunk in the mire of the hole into which he was lowered, and was probably left to perish by his enemies (Jer. 38:1-6). Had it not been for the good will of one of the eunuchs of the palace who knew of his desperate state and obtained permission to rescue him, Jeremiah would inevitably have died (38:7-13).

Yet in spite of these hardships he never changed his note of confident assertion to the king that the city must fall, and that the only safety lay in going forth to surrender to the Babylonian forces.

To this unhappy period of Jeremiah's life belong some of the most precious of his utterances. When he could no longer preach publicly he committed his message to writing, as he had done once before in the reign of Jehoiakim. In his message he speaks sadly of the distress which disobedience has brought upon Judah, of the hopelessness of any other remedy than exile, and of the heartbreaking bitterness of this experience, in which Rachel, the ancestress of the people and the representative of the motherhood of Judah, weeps for her departed children and refuses to be comforted (ch. 30, 31). Yet this was only one side of the situation. The nation would perish as such, but in its better estate it would survive. The exile was to be not an end but a means of purification. Israel should return and be reëstablished in its land. Houses should be built and vineyards planted. And a new covenant should be made between God and his people, not the old covenant written on tablets of stone, but the new agreement impressed upon the hearts of a repentant and obedient people.

So certain was Jeremiah of the final redemption of the city that he actually purchased a piece of property to give proof that he had confidence in the future of the nation. It was like the act of that Roman patriot who in the days when Hannibal was investing the walls of Rome purchased the very land on which the Carthaginian camp stood, to show his implicit faith in the future of the city (ch. 32, 33).

4. THE FALL OF JERUSALEM.

Events hastened to the end. The siege was not a long one. The resources of Judah were exhausted and presently a breach was made in the walls. The king and his court attempted to save themselves by flight, but were captured and subjected to the customary brutality. The city was set on fire, the temple was demolished, the palaces were looted, the homes of the people were broken up, and even the walls were leveled. The glory of the city of God was gone.

Long processions of the people started northward across the hills toward their future homes in exile. Of course the larger number remained in the land. It was only those who were rich enough to purchase ransom or were influential enough to be likely to cause future disturbance who were taken away. The days of trouble had fallen upon the holy people. The laments that find record in the pathetic pages of the Book of Lamentations were inspired by the scenes of these days. The homesickness and longing of even the most faithful hearts uttered itself in such laments as Psalms 42, 43, which seem at first like the words of profound despair, but die away into the strains of rapturous hope.

5. THE MARTYR PROPHET.

When the city fell into the hands of the Babylonians enough was known of Jeremiah's efforts to prevent his people from a hopeless conflict to win for him the good will of the conqueror. He was offered the melancholy choice of accompanying the exiles to Babylon or of remaining with the remnant in Judah, and deeming the latter his duty he took up his abode with those who gathered at Mizpah for a feeble effort at reorganization.

A governor, Gedaliah, was appointed to take charge of the fragments of the Judean state. But his murder soon afterward threw everything into confusion again (chs. 40, 41). In this emergency, fearing the further wrath of the king of Babylon, a company of the people attempted to make their escape into Egypt as offering some protection. Jeremiah vainly tried to dissuade them, but at last was compelled to accompany the refugees to their asylum in the south (chs. 42, 43). Here he continued his efforts to keep them from that idolatry which had been the cause of Judah's downfall; but his words were unheeded, and, when last he is seen, he is warning his obstinate countrymen that the hand of Babylonian chastisement shall reach them even in Egypt (ch. 44).

There amid the mournful surroundings of persistent idolatry and cold indifference to the divine message, with the memory of a life-long martyrdom and the vision of a ruined and desolate fatherland ever in his mind, the sad yet majestic man of God waited the last act of the tragedy, the death by stoning at the hands of his own ungrateful people, as Jewish tradition asserts.

Few prophets have ever performed so difficult a task as his. Sensitive as he was, shrinking from misunderstanding and calumny, he was none the less compelled to be the bearer of unhappy and reproving messages. Yet with fidelity and rare heroism he responded to the call of God, and has passed into history as one of the choicest spirits of Israel's life, not unworthy to be a reminder to us of the Suffering Servant of God, through whom redemption was to come to all the world.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES.

Topic for July 30. A Missionary Journey Around the World—VII. Missions in Burma and India. Acts 17:16-31.

The work of Christian Missions in Burma and India are not less interesting than in the other countries which we have studied. The land compasses many thousands of square miles. It has the two extremes of temperature. Near the mouth of the Ganges is found the hottest climate inhabited by civilized man. The people are among the best endowed of the human race. They are numbered by the hundreds of millions. The people are generally of a phlegmatic temperament, very poor—scarcely ever have all they want to eat and are frequently victims of severe famine—but withal very religious.

India is the birthplace of Brahmanism For many centuries this religion was the predominating religion. Then about the sixth century before Christ, Guatama Buddha was born. He became the founder of Buddhism. He made a profound and a long enduring impression upon the Indians. He saw in all life pain, which was due to desire. He sought salvation from this life of pain, hence sought to escape from life. His salvation was a negation, his religion a religion of death. It is not supprising that the Indian people should break down under such a doctrine, such a life-philosophy and drop back and down into a much lower and vulgar form of worship, Hinduism.

But the interesting thing is that India seems now to be ready for another change. For the first time in her history she is beginning to have a feeling of a national existance. She is developing a patriotism. This is certain to involve many changes from the customs and practices which have prevailed in the past. Western civilization, while not new to them—for Great Britain has long been in control over India—is being studied sympathetically with a view to adoptions with modifications. Great Britain has no little concern as to how to handle India so as to avoid friction and at the same time bring about development in the desired direction. It can readily be seen that this period of transition in India, as in most of the other countries we have studied, presents an immediate opportunity, a decisive hour, as John R. Mott phrases it, for Christian Missions. It is believed by many missionary students and secretaries that if sufficient forces—missionaries and money—can be secured to properly man the field, that India can be Christianized within this generation. But it is imperative that we grasp the opportunity now. A decade may mean fatal delay. It may mean to prolong the evangelization of India for centuries.

Now who are more in line to promote this work than the Christian Endeavorer? He is young, he has consecrated his life to Christ and his church. If he has consecrated it without reserve, and any other consecration is not acceptable to our Lord, he cannot maintain a heedless indifference to this Macedonian cry from far away India to know the way of life more perfectly. Now all, of course, cannot go in person. Besides there are more now willing to go than there are funds with which to send them. Our great opportunity for service lies in self-denial giving. If a hundred Endeavorers would each give a price of one visit to the soda fountain once each week it would support a Christian missionary among that interesting and powerful people. Who ould refuse so little when it will do so much?

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

There were two additions the last Sunday in June, at Streator, where C. M. Smithson preaches.

There were four additions to the church at Pontiac, where B. W. Tate is minister, the first Sunday in July.

Knoxville Church had five additions the first Sunday in July, with three of them being on confession of faith.

Major Griffith and wife will assist M. M. Show, of La Fayette, in a revival meeting, beginning July 28.

C. E. French had resigned at Tallula. He has consented, however, upon the urgent solicitation of the congregation, to withdraw his resignation and remain in the pastorate.

Salem Pastor, T. A. Lindenmeyer, delivered the memorial sermon from the Oddfellows and Rebeccas, and the baccalaureate sermon to the high school graduates.

Following the dedication of the new church at Blandinsville, a two weeks' revival meeting is being conducted by W. E. Harlow. The dedicatory service was July 16.

At Lewistown, the churches are uniting for Sunday evening services through August. Dr. H. O. Breeden, of Ipava, will address the first meeting, on August 6.

Ipava Church, where C. R. Gains is the minister, shows a total number of additions of thirty-four, all but eight being on confession of faith.

J. P. Givens will spend his vacation in Virginia, his native state. The congregation at Lexington, where he is pastor, has granted him leave of absence for six weeks.

Edgar D. Jones, of Bloomington, shared oratorical honors with Honorable Charles Adkins, speaker of the House of Representatives, on the Fourth of July program at Arrowsmith.

First Church congregation, Springfield, defrayed the expenses of its pastor, F. W. Burnham, to attend the Portland Convention. He was absent from the pulpit for three Sundays.

The church at Villa Grove, where C. H. Scriven ministers, recently had thirteen additions at the regular service, eight of whom were by confession from the Sunday-school.

J. E. Stout, of Mulberry Grove, assisted by his son, held a short revival meeting at Mode, during which there were five additions to the church. W. T. Carley is the resident minister.

The church at Colbrook is prospering under the ministry of C. H. Shipplett. The present pastorate dates only from February. Since that time there have been twenty-five additions, sixteen of the number being on confession of faith.

Bridgeport has laid the corner stone of its new building. Since leaving the old edifice, the services have been irregular, but from this time forward the Iroquois Theater will be utilized and all regular services resumed. The pastor is G. W. Schroeder.

Andrew Scott, the efficient evangelist of the Sixth District, sailed recently with his daughter from Montreal for a visit in Scotland, his native country. They will return in the fall.

E. E. Hartley, of Alvin, is in a very promising meeting at Brook's Chapel, near Danville. This is a new work in one of the suburbs of Danville. Large congregations are listening to the message from night to night, and at last report there have been several additions.

The pastor at Pleasant Plains, Gilbert W. Zink, has been spending his vacation in Oklahoma, during which time he assisted in a short meeting at Wainwright, where a new church was organized, composed of twenty-nine members, and a start made toward the erection of a new building.

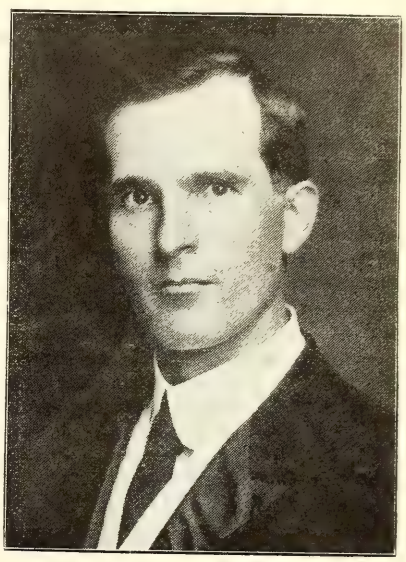
R. V. Callaway is concluding the first year of his pastorate at Havana. His success, both as a preacher in the pulpit and as a leader of affairs in the community, is attested by a unanimous call which he has received to remain in the pastorate. Local papers speak in high praise of his ministry.

At Niantic, where Robert E. Henry ministers, the congregation is uniting with the Methodist church for evening services during the summer months. The annual Sunday-school picnic of these churches was recently held. The transportation facilities were decidedly novel, being trains of hayracks drawn by traction engines. There were three engines, each drawing four wagons.

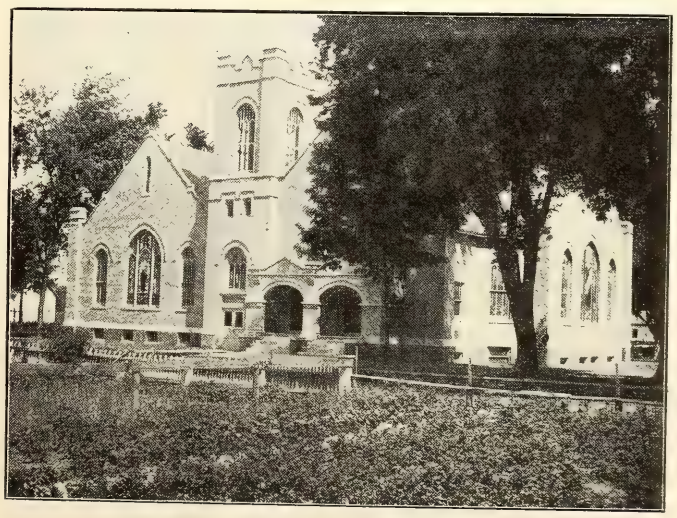
The Christian Century extends its sympathy to J. W. Porter, pastor of Carlinville Church, and his family, on account of the death of Mrs. Emma W. Porter, on June 27. ministry of her husband, and in all affairs connected with the church. She was known throughout the state as one of the Executive Committee of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Besides her husband, Mrs. Porter leaves three children. The funeral service took place from the Carlinville Church, and was conducted by Charles W. Ross, pastor at Litchfield, and the burial was at Eureka.

The many friends of Mrs. Arthur Wilson were shocked to learn of her death, which occurred after a brief illness. Mrs. Wilson was the wife of Arthur A. Wilson, who died several years ago, after exceptionally successful pastorates at Mattoon and Bloomington. Mrs. Wilson was a devoted Christian, and not less efficient as a pastor's wife than was her brilliant husband in the pulpit. Since the latter's death at Bloomington, she has been teaching school. One daughter, about twelve years old, is orphaned by her mother's departure.

The new church house at Blandinsville, was dedicated by Evangelist W. E. Harlow last Sunday. The building cost $22,000. The congregation at Blandinsville is one of the oldest in the state, extending as far back as 1832, when it was organized as the Liberty Christian Church. Here the people of two pioneer settlements met to worship—one known as the Jobe settlement, the other composed of the families of the Brightwells, Bradshaws, Cyruses and Hustons, whose names still appear in the lists of members C. R. Wolford is the pastor of this church, having been with them for close to four years. His ministry is every way prosperous.



Rev. C. R. Wolford, Blandinsville.



New Church at Blandinsville.

Miss Alice Hornbeck, of Denver, Colo., who had recently become superintendent of Teacher Training work, has been compelled to relinquish the office, to the regret of those who know and appreciate her intelligent service.

Ivan W. Agee, pastor at Greenville, is in the fifth year of his ministry at this place. He delivered the decoration day address, and the memorial sermon, and was Fourth of July orator at Pocahontas. There have been a large number of additions to the church at regular services, and the Sunday-school is better than at any time in the history of the church.

The home of W. W. Sniff, pastor of Paris Church, was robbed of a very promising young man on the death of Harold, the eldest child. The young man had lived less than twenty years, but had already completed his college work, and for nearly a year had been principal of the public school at Melrose, Ohio. Mr. Sniff was a young man of estimable character, devoted to duty, and enthusiastic in his pursuit of truth. He had won for himself a host of friends, and his departure grieves a large company of people. The Christian Century joins a multitude of friends in offering sympathy to the bereaved parents and brothers.

Illinois Secretarys' Letter

A. W. Henry, of Esbon, Kan., a former student at Eureka, Ill., will be in Illionis during August and would like to hold a short meeting of two or three weeks. Write him direct. He is all rght.

John McD. Horne, of Des Moines, Ia., will take the work at Charleston, Sept. 1. At that time Geo. H. Brown, of Charleston, goes to the Austin Church, Chicago.

C. E. French, of Tallula, had decided to close his work there soon, but owing to the strong and urgent demand of the church he has consented to remain another year. He has made a good record there and he is appreciated by the church and community.

J. E. Stout is in a meeting at Neoga with hopeful prospects of strengthening the work.

John I. Gunn, of Marion, would like to supply for some good church during the month of August. He would take his family and board in the city during the time and be an active factor in the work of the church. And John I. is no small gun either.

DeForrest Mullins, of Mechanicsburg, has taken the work full time at Detroit, in Pike county.

W. S. Mesnard, of Mason, preaches for Elk Prairie, Oak Mound and Buckeye fourth time each. He wishes another fourth time point within reach of Mason. Write him.

It is quite a problem to gather the annual statistics of the churches of the state, so many clerks and preachers seem to have no conscience on this particular matter. Stamped return envelopes are sent along with the blanks, and in many cases we have to repeat the call three or four times. Even then about 250 or 300 churches do not respond at all. Thus we spend from 20 cents to 40 cents on the churches that are slow in returning their reports. If the reports were returned promptly the first call it would save our society a large postage bill every year. How can we arouse a keen "statistical conscience"?

The church at Modesto will go ahead with the contemplated repairs on their building, although considerably discouraged over the disgrace brought upon them by an unfaithful minister. We are glad they have the grit to go ahead with the work, and not allow the wrong doings of any man to put them out of business. They need a preacher for half time and the field is ripe for a good work. Write to Mrs. R. T. Allyn.

J. H. Stambaugh is being urged very strongly to remain with the Mt. Vernon church another year, which he will probably do. The work there seems to demand it.

J. D. Williams, Macomb, evangelist of the Third district, will soon be off on a month's vacation to West Virginia to visit his aged mother. He is planning a vigorous fall campaign in the Third.

F. M. Branic has resigned his work with the Old Bedford church in McDonough county and is ready to arrange for another field. Brother Branic is a good man and reliable. Address him at Blandinsville.

A bank failure so crippled the Ellisville church that they have not been able to maintain regular preaching lately. That is a real pity. They ought to be helped if our society had the funds.

The month of July is fast slipping away and "you'll have to hurry" or the books will be closed before your offering gets in. What will your record be? "Delinquent" or "Contributor"? July 31, remember.

We are still begging you to send in your statistical report if you have not done so.

The Third Church, this city, laid the corner stone for their new building July 9, the exercises being participated in by Brethren Edgar D. Jones, Milo Atkinson, S. H. Zendt and J. H. Gilliland, besides the pastor, George Hoagland. Our colored brethren are progressive and sacrificing and deserve success. Brother Hoagland is a host among them.

E. K. Higdon, a student at Eureka, preaches for the Texas church near Maroa. July 9 a revival meeting was begun, Guy L. Zerby evangelist and Ernest Higdon song leader, brother of the pastor. Bro. E. K. can do some supply work during August. Write him.

A preacher who wants to come to Illinois writes, "We will make good any place you locate us." He wants a large city work. We will furnish his name to any church desiring to correspond with him.

J. Scott Hyde has closed his work with the Second Church, Danville, and his future plans are not definitely decided upon.

We understand a Brother Mott is the new minister at Elkville.

Lightning struck the Willow Branch church in Lawrence county and damaged the building so badly that it cannot be used till repaired. The congregation is weak and it is quite a serious blow to them.

Chicago

Rev. Willis Green Craig, professor at McCormick Theological Seminary, died at his home July 5. Doctor Craig, who was seventy-seven years of age, has been a professor at the seminary since 1861.

About 250 members of the Illinois Christian Endeavor Union led by E. P. Gates, field secretary of the state union, and W. R. Mee, president of the Chicago Christian Endeavor union, left July 5, on a special train of seven coaches for the International Christian Endeavor Convention at Atlantic City. The Chicago Christian Endeavor union has proposed that every endeavorer pray silently at noon for the conversion of the nearest unsaved person. John Timothy Stone, Frank N. White, and many other church leaders are in favor of the plan.

A unique work among boys is being conducted by Rev. C. J. Quille, superintendent of Catholic charities at the "Working Boys' Home," at 1123 West Jackson boulevard. This home is supported by the charity of the public, and is independent of church and state. The main building is a four-story brick structure. In the rear is a two-story brick printing shop, which supplies part of the revenue for the home. The object of this home says Father Quille, is to provide a home for waifs and orphans. About 500 boys are cared for during the year in this institution. At present twenty nationalities, among whom are negroes and Indians, are represented in the home. The boys are taken in and cared for as in a private home, Jobs are found for them. Their pay is brought weekly to Father Quille, who after deducting two dollars for their expenses in the home, puts the balance into a bank account to the boys' credit. Lately a lot east of the home, 50 x 178 feet in dimension, has been acquired and will be used as a playground for the boys.

The Bible College of Missouri

Under the heading, "The Future of the Church College," The Christian Century points out to our church schools a future mission already conceived and grasped by the Bible College of Missouri. The article reads:

Church colleges must specialize and intensify. Rapidly the situation is becoming such that they cannot hope to compete with the state institution in extensiveness; they can, however, specialize, and by that means they cannot suffer in prestige. Their future in that is secure.

Church colleges must be as well equipped with plant, professors, apparatus, and cultural agencies in religious studies, as state universities are in lay studies; in short, they must have money if they are to solicit the men and women of the west to entrust to them their sons and daughters; for the college years come but once. Incomplete furnishing is a handicap never fully mastered. It is scarcely fair."

The dual aim presented here is that, first, The college shall specialize, and second, Specialize in a highly efficient manner. This is exactly the dual aim of the Bible College of Missouri. And because, like a true pioneer, it has seen the opportunities of a new field and has blazed the trial, it deserves the warm interest and friendship of our whole brotherhood. Its fifteen years' struggle, in which it has proved the soundness of its plea, should be of immense value to the Disciples, not only in Missouri but abroad. It has proved that as a specialized institution the church school may have a vigorous future. It has shown the church that she may have a vital place in the education that is to come; situated across the street from the University of Missouri, the Bible College has turned over to that $3,000,000 institution the field of lay teaching and has devoted its energies to distinctively religious instruction. In this way it saves money, energy, time, everything. But it does more than that. It takes its own special field, i. e., religious instruction, and develops it to the highest degree of efficiency.

And with this powerful plea the Bible College of Missouri comes again to the Christian church of Missouri, to ask for an increase of its endowment. It is proud that it can so come, for it comes on the basis of a plan that has made good, and of a success that grows greater each day. It will take more money to make the Bible College of Missouri what it desires to become, "The Biblical Seminary of the Central West." Such a school ought to have a half million endowment. The seminaries of other great religious bodies have millions. The income of the State University of Illinois is four per cent net on $50,000,000. Against such odds the Bible College of Missouri, because of its strategic location, does not have to compete. But with an equal per cent on only a few hundred thousand it will do a great work in its own field.

R. W. Gentry, Field Secretary.

Church Life

—Our readers will find in the history of our national convention reports no more vivid and prophetic interpretation than that of the Portland gathering given by Mr. Perkins in this issue.

—The first number of the Christian Union Library, published by the Commission on Christian Union, is at hand. It contains three addresses delivered at the oLs Angeles Christian Union Conference—those of Bishop Johnson, of the Episcopal church, Rev. Hugh K. Walker, D. D., of the Presbyterian church and Rev. A. C. Smither, of the Disciples of Christ. Copies may be had by the hundred at $3, or single copies, per year—four issues—at 25 cents. The Christian Board of Publication, St. Louis, or The Commission of Christian Unity, 537 N. Fulton Ave., Baltimore, will fill orders.

F. E. Haughey has resigned at Hartford, Kan., after a pastorate of two years.

First Christian Church, Bowling Green, Ky., was destroyed by fire recently, the loss being estimated at $4,000.

During the meeting held recently at Hoquiam, Wash., there were forty-seven additions. The pastor, U. G. Miller was assisted by C. L. Organ.

W. B. Crouch of Clarksville, Tenn., and J. B. James of Enid, Okla., have concluded a meeting at Roff, Okla. There were forty-nine additions.

Geo. J. Snively and O. J. Marks will dedicate the new church being erected at Danville, Va., and will follow it with a meeting there.

The Christian Union, Des Moines, Ia., has been purchased by The Christian Standard and has been discontinued as a separate paper.

Professor J. W. Hilton of the chair of Ethics and Sociology in Cotner University has been made dean of the College of Liberal Arts in that institution.

The church at Stroud, Okla., has extended a call to the pastor, R. W. Tener, to remain with them indefinitely. Mr. Tener has just closed his first year with this church during which time there have been about sixty additions.

As a result of an evangelistic meeting a church has been organized in South Hutchinson, Kans., with seventy charter members. O. L. Cook, pastor of First Church, Hutchinson, assisted by A. E. Buss is conducting the meeting.

Northside Church, Omaha, Neb., where H. J. Kirchstein ministers, is progressing rapidly in its building project, and it is hoped that the basement will be ready for occupancy in a short time. This church also maintains a mission at Florence.

The congregation at Abilene, Kan., will have a new $20,000 church in the near future. An offer of $10,000 was made by one of the members on condition that $7,000 more be raised. This sum has been subscribed, so that a church building is assured.

Bethany Beach in Delaware announces sermons on July 30 by Pres. T. E. Cramblett of Bethany College, August 6 by John R. Ewers of Pittsburgh and August 13 by Earle Wilfley, of Washington, D. C. Bethany Beach also offers special recreation features in the line of fishing, bathing, boating, etc., without any "dress up" or "style."

L. O. Newcomer has closed the first year of his pastorate at Connersville, Ind. During this time there have been sixty-three accessions at the regular services.

E. S. Bledsoe, who has ministered to the church at Big Springs, Tex., for the past three years, has received the call of his congregation to remain another year.

At the annual convention of Colorado churches held recently at Greeley, it was stated that 2,000 members were added to the churches in that state during the past year.

J. A. Canby, pastor at Traverse City, Mich., for the past five years, has been given a leave of absence of three months. W. J. Shelburne, of Norwood, Ohio, and T. P. Bauer, will supply the pulpit during his absence.

The churches of Des Moines, Iowa, in the vicinity of the capitol, will hold outdoor services on the steps of that building during July and August. The northern group of churches will hold services on the campus of Des Moines College.

East Side Church, Wellington, Kan., was dedicated Sunday, July 2, free of indebtedness, about one thousand dollars being raised. L. T. Faulders, pastor of First Church, conducted the services. This mission is under the care of First Church.

W. H. Martin, pastor of First Church, Whittier, Calif., has tendered his resignation. During his three years' pastorate Mr Martin has built up the membership and done effective work in the Sunday-school. He has accepted the position of chaplain and probation officer at the State School.

Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Mo., where Burris A. Jenkins ministers, will unite with several neighboring churches during July and August. Union services will be held on the church lawns each Sunday evening. Outdoor services are growing in popularity during the extreme hot weather.

Dedicatory services for the new edifice of Grand View Church, Des Moines, Iowa, were held recently. This building was erected for the congregation in that part of the city by subscriptions made by the other churches of the city. Among those taking part in the services were C. S. Medbury, F. W. Mutchler, Finis Idleman and Arthur Long, of Burlington, Iowa.

Jacob Kenoly, the negro missionary to his brothers of Africa, was drowned near his mission station at Scheffelin, Liberia. The story of his consecration has been often told by C. C. Smith as an illustration of the type of manhood turned out by our Southern Christian Institute in which Jacob Kenoly was educated. His death leaves his unique mission quite leaderless.

The annual meeting of the church at Liberty, Mo., where Robert Graham Frank ministers, shows a prosperous year in many respects. The resident membership is 406, with a non-resident membership of 102. The total amount raised for missions and benevolences in the past year was $1,342.50. This church supports Dr. Paul Wakefield in the foreign field at Wuhu, China.

The Christian Missionary Society of Western Washington held its annual meeting at First Church, Tacoma, July 12-14. Besides the local workers, addresses were given by Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, Robert Hopkins, of Cincinnati, J. K. Shellenberger, of Kansas City, Grant K. Lewis, of Cincinnati, E. W. Allen, of Cincinnati, J. H. Mohorter, of St. Louis, Mrs. Effie L. Cunningham, of In-

The Life of Jesus

IN FIFTY-TWO LESSONS

By Dr. Loa Ermina Scott

A NEW TEXT BOOK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'S AND ADULT BIBLE CLASSES

This book comes nearer meeting ALL the demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions—all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportion. It is the product of experience. Dr. Scott is teacher of a successful Sunday-school class in the Disciples' Church, at Chagrin Falls, Ohio. She has been developing this book for years. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

INTRODUCTION BY PROFESSOR E. B. WAKEFIELD OF HIRAM COLLEGE

"In her home congregation Dr. Scott sought in an unpretentious and resolute way to work out her ideal. With such opportunity as has been given her, her work has never been surpassed. For years she has held the largest and most interested class that her community has ever known; and to this very hour the solid interest has grown.

"If her published lessons will only extend her work and help to get more of real Bible teaching into our congregations, they will most surely bless the world."—PROFESSOR E. B. WAKEFIELD, of Hiram College, in the Introduction.

WORDS OF PRAISE.

I know of no book on the subject so admirably adapted to its purpose.—J. H. GOLDNER, Euclid Ave. Church, Cleveland.

I shall take pleasure in introducing the work to my next class in the Life of Christ and in commending it to others.—F. W. BURNHAM, First Church, Springfield, Ill.

It contains just the kind of work we ought to be doing in our Young People's and Adult classes.—O. W. LAWRENCE, Central Church, Decatur, Ill.

Her unusual ability and her practical experience have helped her to meet the new and growing demand for just such a course of study.—HARRIS R. COOLEY, Cleveland.

Its arrangement is excellent. Its choice of material remarkable—as much for what is omitted as for the rich material included. The questions at end of each of the fifty-two lessons reveal the teacher.—JOHN R. EWERS, East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa.

The beauty of the book is that it is an outline and cannot be used apart from the gospels themselves.—A. W. FORTUNE, Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati.

These fifty-two lessons may well serve as a training coures, and as such, the book is superior to any I have seen.—PERRY J. RICE, El Paso, Tex.

dianapolis, and R. P. Shepherd, of St. Louis.

Claire L. Waite will minister to the church at Green Bay, Wis., during the summer months.

Ralph E. Alexander, pastor of Second Church, St. Louis, Mo., for the past six years, has resigned.

E. W. Elliott, pastor at Tampa, Fla., reports seven recent additions to the church there.

Ray O. Miller has resigned the pastorate of First Church, Fresno, Calif., to take effect October 1.

P. D. McCallum who has served the church at Viroqua, Wis., for nearly two years, has resigned and returned to his former home in Australia.

The annual meeting of the Association of Colleges of the Disciples of Christ will be held at Drake University, Des Moines, Ia., October 12-13.

The corner stone of Woodlawn Church, Buffalo, N. Y., was laid on Sunday, July 2, Benjamin S. Ferrall, pastor of Richmond Avenue Church, delivering the address.

J. A. Wharton, pastor at Ravenna, Ohio, reports three baptisms on July 9. Good work is being done in all departments, the Sunday-school having an average attendance of 386.

Central Church, Peoria, suffers another loss in its membership that ranks with its late loss in the death of Mr. Ashley J. Elliott, one of the most prominent laymen in the state. This time it is Prof. C. R. Vandervoort, principal of one of the high schools and a leader in the church. Pathos is added to his taking away by the fact that he and his new bride were on their honeymoon at Pinecliffe, the summer home of Rev. G. B. Van Arsdall of Denver.

The corner stone of Central Church, Gary, Ind., was laid on July 2. The pastor, Nelson S. Trimble was assisted in the services by C. J. Sharp, pastor at Hammond, Ind.; Mrs. Martha S. Trimble, pastor at Tolleston; and Benjamin Borton, of Glen Park Church. The building consists of a basement to be used for the Sunday-school, an auditorium on the first floor, the second floor being two flats, the income from which will be used for the expenses of the church. The permanent edifice which is planned will probably not be erected for several years.

F. F. Walters, of First Church, Independence, Mo., will enter the evangelistic field in the fall. Mr. Walters has held pastorates in Missouri for the past six years and has received over seven hundred persons into the churches at the regular services. Besides this he has held a number of meetings which have been blessed with over five hundred accessions. The great church at Independence reports a great year in its gifts to various causes—the new hospital in Kansas City, the church debt, current expenses, missions, etc.—a total of $35,000. Mr. Walters will go anywhere to hold meetings for single churches or in union meetings. He will keep his home in Independence for the present.

Walter Scott Priest, minister of Central Church, Wichita, Kans., will spend his vacation during the month of August in and around Normal, Ill., and perhaps a week or ten days at Pentwater, Mich. Chas. A. Musselman, one of the Y. M. C. A. secretaries of Wichita, will supply his pulpit. Mr. Priest has recently declined several invitations to dedicate church buildings because he felt his work in Wichita demanded his time so closely. He has had no vacation for two years. But now he is able to render church dedication services in August—if not too far from Normal, or in September, if not too far from Wichita. The money he receives for the service will be given to the Lawrence, Kansas, Church debt.

A home-coming service was held Sunday, July 9, at First Church, Parkersburg, W. Va., where W. D. Van Voorhis ministers, in honor of the young men who have gone out from this congregation into the ministry and Y. M. C. A. work during the past ten years. The history of the church has been remarkable in this respect. The names and locations of these men are as follows: Albert Pennybacker, assistant secretary Pennsylvania Terminal Y. M. C. A., New York; Irvin Maxwell, physical director of the local Y. M. C. A., Parkersburg; Arden Hanes, pastor at Elkins, W. Va.; B. E. Hanes, pastor at Ravenswood, W. Va.; William Hendershot, pastor at Martinsburg, W. Va.; Olin Mozena, a general evangelist with headquarters at Parkersburg; O. T. and W. V. Lytle, students in Hiram College. Messrs. Pennybacker, Maxwell and O. T. Lytle spoke briefly before the church at this service. The congregation is proud of these strong, consecrated young men and rejoices that three more will soon enter the field of religious work. J. G. Slayter, of Minneapolis, will hold a meeting with this church about the first of October.

Gipsy Smith Coming Again

The English evangelist, Gipsy Smith, has been secured for a tour of the Pacific Coast this coming fall. His schedule as agreed upon includes Spokane, Wash., Sept. 30-Oct. 16; Seattle, Wash., Oct. 21-Nov. 6; Portland, Ore., Nov. 11-27; Tacoma, Wash., Dec. 2-18; San Francisco, Cal., Dec. 30-Jan. 22; Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 27-Feb. 12; and probably Dallas, Texas, Feb. 24 through March 11. Already there is great enthusiasm throughout the entire Pacific Coast over this contemplated visit. Several cities are erecting large, temporary auditoriums, the requirement being that a minimum seating capacity of five thousand shall be furnished by each city. San Francisco, at the earnest request of its ministers and laymen, is given an extra week. Committees of the leading Christian men of each city are already working out the details of this great evangelistic movement. Doctor Foulkes has the entire campaign in charge and is directing the movement in conjunction with the London committee. Gipsy Smith will arrive in America the middle of September and has already consented, at the request of Doctor Foulkes and Doctor Jowett, to spend Sunday, Sept. 17, occupying the pulpits of Fifth avenue Presbyterian and Rutgers Presbyterian churches. It is possible that some other evangelistic meeting, in New York City, may be arranged for at that time also.

To Indiana and Neighboring Preachers.

May I say a final word concerning Preachers' Week at Bethany Park from July 31 to August 4. The outlook for a week of helpful instruction and delightful fellowship is very encouraging. Every man on the program will be present unless providentially hindered. It will surely be worth your while to hear Morrison, Lhamon, Rounds, Clifford, Hill and Book. Second to this, only, will be the fellowship of your fellow preachers. The preachers and laymen are coming. Every cottage on the grounds has been engaged and about one-third of the rooms in the hotels have been reserved. We make a rate of $5 for the five days which pays all your expenses, including gate fee, room and board.

We give you a hearty invitation to Bethany Assembly this year. Our Preachers' Week, the C. W. B. M. State Convention, the Bible School Institute, with the fifteen instructors and lecturers, the special Sundays, are appealing to many of our brethren and we are making our plans to care for all who may be fortunate enough to spend some time with us. C. W. CAUBLE.

FORTY-ONE AFRICAN TOWNS ASK FOR TEACHERS

HERBERT SMITH.

A crowd of evangelists were gathered around me. They were saying, "Teacher, the land is very big. Great numbers of towns are asking for the words of life, and some of are very, very large. How are we to reach all the towns that want us to teach them?" "Well," I said, "tell me the names of the towns and where they are located, then we will see what we can do." So they began and I wrote down the names of the towns. When we were finished there were forty-one towns asking for teachers. None of these towns are between here and Longa. All are up river or in the back country. All of them can be reached in less than three days' marching. A year ago these towns knew nothing, and cared nothing about the things of God. Now things are changed. Representatives from these towns have come to us begging that we do not deny them, but send them teachers. They have sent to our evangelist the same message. And day after day they wait the coming of God's messengers. It must not be thought that these forty-one towns are the limit of the Mombuyo territories. The state men tell us there are three hundred and sixty towns here. Into most of these towns no Christian has yet gone. In some of them the Catholics dwell. These towns ought to be reached soon. Our generation is passing. Are we going to evangelize these people in our day? No other Christians will attempt this work while we are here. The very fact that we are here is a witness to the Christians of the world that we mean to do our work, or at least that we said that we meant to do so. Now please let me tell the Christian brotherhood that there are not enough workers on the Congo to evangelize that section of Congo which speaks the Lunkundo tongue and among which we work. It is only fair to these people who are begging for Christian teachers that we send them the teachers. It is only fair to the Christian world at large that we do the work we have undertaken or let some other body of Christians have a chance to do the work. Our great brotherhood has prayed for opportunities of service. These opportunities have come. Our prayers have cost us some things. Let us pay the bill by giving liberally to the work of world-wide missions.

But some one says, "I always thought it was the work of the native church to evangelize in its own field." Yes, but please listen. The Lotumbe Church supports four men and their wives and three single men to preach the gospel. This is no special record for Lotumba. Bolenge, Longa and Monieka do equally as well, maybe better. Does any single church at home do as much for the state or nation as these churches are trying to do for their own people? Three of these churches are less than five years old, too. We are not asking the brotherhood to support native evangelists if that means that the general fund of the society will be neglected. What we want is that the general fund of the society to be so liberally supported that missionaries be sent out. If the missionaries are sent to teach the native church the native church in turn will do a hundred per cent better and the surrounding towns will have the gospel.

This week fourteen persons have come to Lotumbe to investigate for themselves the things we are teaching about the God of Heaven and his son, Jesus. Last week seven came on the same errand. It is not a question of forcing Christianity onto the people by law and edict. The people want to know, and they seek to discover the things whereof we teach. During April, forty-nine were baptized at Bolenge; twenty-two at Longa; twenty-seven at Lotumbe. There are now fifty-five names on the enquirers' book at Lotumbe. Ought not a successful thing to be supported? The things we teach in the name of our Lord redeems women from slavery, men from murder, boys and girls from lives of shame. Who can refuse to support such a work?

Lotumbe, Africa.

Notes from the Foreign Society

Secretary E. W. Allen writes of the foreign session of the Portland convention: "It was a great and good day. Three thousand people crowded the White Temple at day sessions, an overflow meeting of one thousand in the Presbyterian church at night. I never heard Brother Rains do so well. Dr. Shelton's recital of Dr. Zenas Loftis' death was tragic and intense. Oh, how it gripped the people! There was not a weak speech. Every prayer was exalted. C. M. Chilton's reading of John 17 was most profound."

News comes of one hundred and twenty baptisms at Bolenge, Africa, on July 8.

On the morning of May 31st Miss Rioch's school building burned. By school time she had the roof of a detached building mended and two classes going, and the next day had two buildings rented and everything going in the usual way. The kindness shown her by the city officials was astonishing.

W. H. Erskine and wife, of Akita, Japan, have reached America. They spoke at the Portland convention.

Fred E. Hagin, of Tokyo, Japan, recently held an evangelistic meeting at the nearby city of Kafu. He used the stereopticon presented to him by the Christian Endeavor Society at Paris, Illinois, to good effect. Thousands heard and saw the gospel in the picture.

Dr. Royal J. Dye landed at Boston July 10th.

R. Ray Eldred, of Longa, Africa, writes, "The Steamship, 'Oregon,' is working fine. It was such a great blessing to go all of this distance, four hundred miles, by water in five days on a steamer when heretofore it has taken us fifteen days by canoe. I appreciate the steamer very much."

The plague at Harda, India, is over. While hundreds died of this dread pestilence, not a single Christian took the disease.

The First Church, Tacoma, Wash., becomes a Living-link in the Foreign Society. W. A. Moore is the pastor.

Confidence in Foreign Society

The church at Wichita, Kan., which gave $8,300 to missions, benevolences and education last year, a church which is now sustaining three living links in the foreign field and one in the home field and helping two missions in Wichita, wishes it to be known that it has the utmost confidence in the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and its officials. At a regular meeting of the official board of the church the following resolutions were introduced by the minister, Walter Scott Priest, and unanimously adopted:

Be it resolved by the office-bearers of the Central Church of Christ, Wichita, Kansas,—

First,—That we express our unbounded confidence in the Foreign Christian Missionary Society,—its president, Archibald McLean; its secretaries, F. M. Rains, S. J. Corey, and E. W. Allen; in its executive committee, every one, and pledge to these brethren our loyal support, believing that they are true to the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, as believed and proclaimed by the Disciples of Christ, and that they will sanction no teaching or practice by their representatives and ours on the foreign field which is not thoroughly in accord with the belief and practice of the churches of Christ in America;—and,— Second,—That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the mission rooms in Cincinnati, Ohio, and to the "Christian Standard," "Christian Evangelist" and "Christian Century," with the request that these papers publish the same. C. M. JACKMAN, Chairman.

JOHN S. YOUNG, Clerk.

The Life of Jesus

In Fifty-two Lessons

BY DR. LOA ERMINA SCOTT.

A manual for young peoples and adult classes. It is conceded to be the most practicable text for its purpose on the market.

The book grew in the actual experience of teaching. From the moment it came from the press it has been in great demand. Another edition is now being prepared for.

It is just the thing for classes of young people of high school age. But it is equally well adapted to adults.

Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The graded lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' grade was complete the past year. The Primary grade will be complete for the opening of the new year—October 1. Three of the four years of the Junior grade will be complete October 1. The second year of the Intermediate grade (ready October 1) supplies boys and girls of 15 and 16 years.]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

Every lesson writer is a recognized authority in the Interdenominational Sunday School world!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that coöperation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

A NEW YEAR BEGINS OCTOBER 1

The Sunday-school calendar is made to conform to the public school calendar. While the graded lessons may be begun at any time, there are obvious advantages in starting at the beginning of the new cycle.

Send today for Price List, Order Blank and Prospectus!

If you state which grade you are chiefly interested in, we will send, in addition to prospectuses of the entire series, a teachers' and pupils' text for that particular grade. We do not send a complete outfit as free samples.

Volume XXVIII. July 27, 1911. Number 30

Ten Weeks for Ten Cents

In order to introduce The Christian Century into new homes the publishers propose to send the paper ten weeks for ten cents,

Beginning With the Issue of September 21.

Names for this offer must be sent in before September 15. These trial subscriptions will be positively discontinued at the expiration of the ten weeks unless ordered continued by the subscriber.

We expect to gather a list of several thousand names for this period. One subscriber to whom the plan was explained declared that he had ten dollars to spend on that proposition and would send us the names of 100 persons whom he wishes to become acquainted with The Christian Century and its vital message. Others will send smaller lists; still others, perhaps, larger lists. This is on behalf of their paper. Let every present subscriber think over the names of the fellow-members of his church and his friends and make up a list. A good set of names would be your Sunday School teachers and officers and your board of elders and deacons. If your pastor is not now a reader be sure that he is not overlooked. We Believe Every Reader Will Send in at Least One Name.

BEGIN NOW TO MAKE UP YOUR LIST

Send it in at once. Use separate sheet or sheets of paper for your names. Put your own name at the top as the sender. Keep a duplicate copy of your list. Be sure to make addresses plain. Remittance must accompany all lists.

Our Readers' Opinions

Baptism and Christian Union

The Christian Century having conspicuously championed Christian union, carries on the baptismal question under an embarrassment that provokes this protest. In its answer to Mr. Sweeney, it suffers from over refinements and so keeps alive a controversy that has no substance in it and ought to be allowed to die.

Allow me to unburden the debate by denying that there is any evidence that Christ ever enjoined baptism, much less that he bound it as a law for all time. This is written by one not quite so old as our Emeritus Sweeney (who reminds us more than once of the advantage which his age gives him in a tilt of this kind), but one who sees by a larger vision, he hopes, and who gives more heed to the greater facts. It is a regret that Bro. Sweeney's age will not stretch his experience so far back that he might say, "I know it is so, for I was there and heard it myself."

At the very start, we Disciples, in our effort to set up identity between ourselves and the early believers, break to pieces. For here is Luke's gospel, in which is written the commission of Christ to the Apostles, and there is no mention of baptism. Then here, also, comes John with a written gospel that records the commission but omits to mention baptism.

Could Mr. Sweeney or any other Disciple minister write or preach a gospel of Christ and attempt to give the "great commission" and leave out the mention of baptism and stand up at the head of the church? Perfectly preposterous! Well, that is what Luke and John did, and not only so but that drastic commission which Mark gives is regarded by all scholars, conservative and radical alike, as not belonging to the original writing.

And so Matthew is quite alone in seeming to connect baptism with the commission, and the use of the words "Baptizing them into the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit" are now rejected by so great scholars that even Sanday of Oxford says he is ready to accept the view that they were a later addition. There are other very good reasons for this position, such as that Christ nowhere commanded anything to be done to "all nations" as such, and not one of the Apostles could be started out of Judea toward the nations under that commission. They even lingered after others were scattered abroad by the persecution.

The paltry shift that the other gospel writers knew Matthew had placed baptism in the commission and that it was not necessary for them to repeat it is mere pettifogging, and trifling pettifogging at that.

In all his recorded words Christ never brought the names of "Father, Son and Holy Spirit" together in any such way, and the Spirit had not yet come to his office while Christ was here. "The Spirit was not yet given because Christ was not yet glorified." It was after the administration was committed to the Spirit that the trinity was formulated, and it was just as much and as well appropriated to the assembly, to the Lord's Day and the Lord's Supper and to all and every Christian act as to baptism. Their after use does not show that Christ put them in the commission, nor in fact did Christ ever give any commission at all in the sense of a last will and testament to be administered by delegates, himself withdrawn. For our God is a living God, and Christ says, I am he that was dead and am alive forevermore and I have the keys of death and Hades. I open the door and no man can shut and no man can open, and the Spirit is the seal of the living God and he shall be with you alway, even to the end of the world, to lead and guide, even to the raising us from the dead.

Get rid of the Roman notion of carrying out a dead man's will by law and accept the truth that the living Godhead still animates and directs in our lives and hearts, and all forms lose their arbitrary value. They "are judged of all" whose canon law is Christ's own test, "ye shall know a tree by its fruit," its living present fruit in its present climate, not by its exotic product. The word is indeed the precious living word because it is "the engrafted word"; we grafted the New Testament writings upon the Old and we continue to engraft hymn-books and sermons and printed papers and so keep it the living and ever growing word of God.

To change the figure we, steadily beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed from glory to glory even as by the Spirit of the Lord." "Now the Lord is that Spirit and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" and life and growth.

Another hindrance in this baptismal controversy is the interchangeable use of the church and the kingdom. To say Disciples and Presbyterians are in the kingdom is not correct, though the kingdom may be in them just as "Christ is in you the hope of glory," a glory yet to come when this human society shall be ruled by Him.

The church is to the Kingdom of heaven what the Baptist was to Christ. He said, "I am not the Christ but am sent to prepare the way for him." And the church must get to work at the big affairs of the Kingdom, and that it can never do while it carries on baptism and washing of feet and other such ordinances helpful to the profession of the priest but a hindrance to the life of the lay people.

Rabinical subtleties and Roman juridics continue to hinder the life of the Spirit which works in us to do His will. This same Spirit invites us to rise up and with the freedman's sovereignty command the senates and the marts of the earth that they become Christian that our prayer may be answered, "thy kingdom come thy will be done on earth even as in heaven."

Church Membership and Heaven Membership

I proffer my help to The Christian Century in the effort to untangle a tangle. The Christian Century is taking logical but mistaken grounds. The logical ground is that pious people living as Christians live and making such character as Christians make, though not immersed, are members of the Church of Christ, and ought to be received as members in the local church. Admitting that these persons are members of the Church of Christ, The Christian Century takes the only logical and consistent ground. No man, no congregation, can refuse them every or any right, possession and privilege that comes to a member of the Church of Christ, including membership in the local church.

The mistake the Christian Century makes is in assuming that these are members of the Church of Christ. Others make the same mistake. The Christian Century will easily hold its own and defeat any who may stand up to contend with them against receiving the unimmersed into the local church who admit that such are members of the Church of Christ.

Who are members of the Church of Christ? Here the battle must be fought. This is the decisive question. How is this to be determined? Only by an appeal to the Scriptures, to Jesus and the Apostles. No man can say who are members, or what constitutes membership. In John 3:5, Jesus has at once and forever decided this matter. "Except one be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God." "Kingdom of God" here evidently stands for the Church of Christ.

If after this declaration any Apostle should be found teaching contrary to this, he would forfeit his claim to apostleship. In stating the conditions of entering into the kingdom (church) Jesus has made it doubly sure by saying we cannot enter any other way. He must have had The Christian Century in mind when he said it. This, now, is decided. Those not born of water and of the Spirit are not members of the Church of Christ, no matter who says they are.

Here a great hue and cry is raised, "Then all this Christian faith, Christian living, Christian character, all this piety and godly living and devotion and sacrifice and giving goes for naught and these people are all lost simply because they did not understand that they ought to be immersed."

Oh, simple and slow of heart! It is not Heaven Membership we are discussing. It is Church Membership. Nobody is saying all these people are to fail of heaven. That is God's business, not ours. We are not the custodians of Heaven. We are in a large sense the custodians of the church. If we should agree that more unimmersed than immersed people will get to heaven it would not affect the case in the least, nor change the conditions of church membership.

I call upon The Christian Century to show that unimmersed people are "born of water," and that those not born of water are in the kingdom (church) of God. I also charge The Christian Century to be open and fair, and not to attempt to play on the feelings of the people, with the cry that church membership and heaven membership are under discussion. Stick to the question. It is church membership.

St. Petersburg, Fla. E. L. FRAZIER.

[There is something very refreshing about Mr. Frazier's communications, of which the above is a fair sample. His own position of course is preposterous, but he sees the point and talks to it. It is perfectly clear to any one bred in the Disciples way of thinking that as Disciples we have no right to exclude from membership in our churches those who are members of the Church of Christ. To do so is to adopt the essential principle of sectarianism against which all our history is a protest. There is no other ground for us to take; either we must practice Christian union or we must practice sectarianism. But we are shocked at the heresy to which our good friend resorts in order to combat what he regards as our heresy. This "heaven-membership" is a new thing. We do not read of it in the New Testament. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." "Repent and be baptized . . . for the remission of your sins." That is the way our New Testament reads. Where is there any New Testament promise for any one to get to heaven who has not been "saved" or whose sins have not been remitted? And where is there any promise of salvation or remission of sins except to those who have been baptized? And, of course, there is no baptism, in our correspondent's way of thinking, without immersion. This is a serious heresy, Bro. Frazier. We warn you not to be wise above what is written!—THE EDITORS.]

The Churches and Organized Labor

Over 125,000 ministers are being requested by the Social Service Commission of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ to preach on some phase of the labor question on Labor Sunday, September 3.

The Rev. Chas. S. Macfarland, Secretary of the Commission, whose office address is 1611 Clarendon Building, Fourth avenue and Eighteenth street, New York, has sent out a call to the secretaries of the ministerial associations in the cities, recommending that wherever possible a union service be held in one of the churches on Sunday night, to which organized labor and all other workingmen and women be invited; and that the various ministers preach sermons appropriate to the occasion in their own churches on the morning of September 3.

At a recent convention of the American Federation of Labor, a resolution was unanimously adopted designating the "Sunday preceding the first Monday in September as Labor Sunday and that the churches of America be requested to devote some part of this day to the discussion of some phase of the labor question." The various central and local labor bodies were also requested, in this resolution, "to co-operate in every legitimate way with the ministers who thus observe Labor Sunday, seeking, with them, to secure as large an audience of workingmen and others as possible."

The Social Service Commission has prepared for the ministers a leaflet of "Suggestions for Labor Sunday," and also an elaborate program for the services, which will meet the requirements of any church in town or city. We advise pastors to write to Dr. Macfarland for a sample. The price of the folder containing order of service is one dollar for one hundred.

New Venture of Catholic Laymen

Catholic laymen of New York, led by the Rev. Terence J. Shealy, S. J. of Fordham University as spiritual director, are entering upon a work wholly new in the Catholic Church in this country, and so far as they know, in any other country. It is a school for the enlisting and training of Catholic laymen as public speakers and teachers.

At first normal work will only be attempted, the plan being to create a corps of experts who shall, in turn, train other Catholic laymen by the holding of classes in their home parishes. The studies will be social service and Catholic apologetics, and the instruction, both normal and primary, will be placed as far as possible on a college basis, with examinations and practice work. The students are to be volunteers only, and preference will be given to college graduates.

The school, intended not for New York only but for the entire East, has received the hearty endorsement of Archbishop Farley and several bishops in his province. It will have two parts. The spiritual part will be a House for Retreats, which will be opened at the end of this month. It is a fine old mansion on Staten Island, facing the narrows of New York Harbor. There are grounds of twenty acres, and accommodations in the mansion for forty to fifty men. The first retreat will be given about the middle of next month.

Two years ago retreats for laymen were begun in Fordham College, New York City. They were so popular that temporary quarters for them were provided on an island in Long Island Sound. Now permanent quarters are provided as stated, which quarters are to be enlarged as funds permit. The retreats last from Friday to Monday morning, and are conducted on the same lines as retreats for priests. Only one business day, and that Saturday, is sacrificed, and the plan is to maintain the retreats throughout the year. It is reckoned that every week the entire number of men who can be accommodated will be enrolled. Retreats may be taken by men not Catholics, and a few Protestants have already made them.

The practical or material part of the school will be the lectures on social service. These will be begun in October next, and will be given in the rooms of the Fordham University School of Law. These rooms are in Nassau Street, in lower Manhattan, so that classes will be conducted at the noon hour on week days as well as two week nights. The courses of study are now in preparation. Instructors will be members of the faculty of Fordham College. Laymen will be taught voice culture, the preparation of addresses, pedagogy, and will be given practice work in the instruction of other laymen in classes held in parishes of New York and vicinity.

While the Jesuit priest named is the prime mover in the enterprise, he is heartily supported in his plans by a large number of Catholic laymen of influence. These laymen are brokers, lawyers and other business and professional men, whose aim is to develop the resource of the laity and turn it to personal and practical use in the Catholic Church. The two lines of instruction, apart from the spiritual strengthening by the retreats, are the labor and similar questions, and the doctrines and history of the Catholic Church. The name of the new organization to have charge of the school and its work is the Laymen's League for Retreats and Social Studies.

World Methodist Conference Plans

Committees have just concluded program and other details of the Methodist Ecumenical Conference which is to meet in Toronto next October. Unlike the recent Baptist Alliance, world Methodists will bring together a representative body, designed to fix policies for Methodism in every country, and then to return to their homes and officially to carry such policies into effect.

The program will afford surveys of world Methodism during the past ten years, or since the last Ecumenical Conference, and will then present Methodism in the Church universal, its foreign missionary work, its theological heritage, permanent results of Bible criticism, and methods in Bible study. Live questions will be presented in the relations of the Church to modern thought, to the household, the child, young people, men and women. The temperance question, training for the ministry, Methodist literature, Christian unity and peace, will conclude the program.

The two Sundays covered, October 8 and 15, will for the first time be included in the program. Preachers will be provided for Toronto churches, the religious aspects of Commerce and Industry, and observance of Sunday being two of the themes. Former Vice-President Fairbanks of Indiana and Arthur Henderson, M. P., a labor leader and Methodist layman of England, will speak on labor questions, and the Hon. Walter Runciman, a member of the British cabinet, will talk on "International Relations," bringing out it is expected the part and place of the churches in the ending of war.

Ecumenical Conferences have the plan of electing four secretaries, the head one to be named by the Methodists of the country in which the ecumenical session is held. Canada has waived its rights and Dr. Henry K. Carroll, the well known American Methodist layman, prominent in United States census and Methodist missionary work, has been chosen for secretary of the Toronto meeting. It is reckoned that three to four thousand Methodists will attend, including local Conference members, but these will represent almost every country and Methodists to the number of many millions.

World Catholic Federation

A World Federation of Catholic Societies is proposed. The American Federation has, through its secretary, made formal suggestion to the Westminster Federation Council of London, and that body has acted favorably. Together they have agreed to invite the societies of the Continent of Europe, and of Catholic mission fields of the world.

Aims set forth by the American Federation are an international bond of union, the support of world movements like the truth and defence societies, and the holding, once every five or ten years, of International Catholic Congresses for the personal acquaintance of Catholic leaders and the furthering of Catholic Church interests. The Westminster Federation has voted to submit the matter to the Archbishop of Westminster for his approval.

Social Survey

Public Drinking-Cups and Public Thirst

The day of the individual drinking-cup has come. In many states it is illegal to permit the use of public drinking-cups. Undoubtedly the promiscuous use of a single cup by thousands of people, without any effort to sterilize or even to cleanse it, is attended by many risks of transmitting disease germs. Possibly the danger of contagion by means of public drinking-cups was somewhat overstated during the period of agitation in favor of the proposed legislation, but that there is risk cannot be denied. One who has seen pilgrims by the thousands in Jerusalem kissing sacred relics, or who has noticed tourists in St. Peter's, Rome, kissing the bronze statue of Jupiter which has been transformed into a Saint Peter, cannot but lose some of his fear of deadly germs. But on the other hand, hardly a week passes but some surgeon is poisoned in the course of his professional duties. The drinking-cup reform is in the right direction. The public towel ought to be the next nuisance to be banished. It is worse, so far as it goes—and it goes a good ways—than the common drinking-cup. Now that the germ-bearing cup has gone, what is the thirsty public to do? Already many travelers, it is stated, have been driven to bottled beer and mineral water. But these will not, and must not, suffice. The one is too dangerous (its use, too, is illegal in many states) and the latter is too expensive for most people. Railway coaches ought to be furnished with free paper drinking-cups, for one thing. Doubtless first-class railways will provide them as soon as the traveling public demands them. In the meantime, travelers would do well to get into the habit of carrying their own drinking-cups. They do not expect public tooth-brushes, and public drinking-cups are almost as repulsive. The present emergency furnishes an admirable opportunity for the young people's societies of many towns and cities. Let them provide a supply of paper drinking-cups which may be had by the quantity at low prices. Let these be put in a convenient place in railway stations, near the "water cooler." Above the receptacle place a placard bearing the names of the churches of the town, the hours for service, the names of the pastors. Near by put a notice with some such words as these: "The young people of the Cold-water churches provide these drinking-cups free to the traveling public. When you are in this city we should be glad to welcome you to any of the meetings of our churches." A little coöperation among the several young people's societies would reduce to a small amount the expense to each. The advertisement would be a taking one. Some young men, glad of an excuse to drink, might be kept out of saloons. Many a tired mother and her baby would be refreshed.

The Christian Endeavor Convention at Atlantic City

The Christian Endeavor convention just held at Atlantic City, N. J., appears to have enjoyed some measure of that enthusiasm which a few years ago characterized its meetings. Something like 8,000 delegates crowded the auditorium on the "million dollar pier." The report of Mr. William Shaw, general secretary, showed an increase of over 1,000,000 members since July, 1909, in the United States. China has recruited 831 societies during the same period. He pleaded for the spiritual welfare of the immigrant, the betterment of Sunday labor conditions, and the success of the fight against immoral moving pictures. President Clark will continue to travel about the world enlisting new forces and strengthening the work. In his address Doctor Clark said: "This is peculiarly the year to press the peace idea. . . . Let these two years to come mark a great advance the world over in promoting the fellowship of mankind. . . . Our duty to promote the fellowship of the churches as well as of the nations must never be forgotten or minimized. It is our God-given privilege and duty to continue, as in the past, to be, perhaps, the chief agency in bringing the young people of all Protestant denominations together on a non-sectarian basis of love and service to God and man. . . . There are two dangers to be guarded against. First, a narrow exclusiveness which would make the society merely a prayer-meeting, with a narrow round of duties for a few of the spiritually gifted; and, on the other hand, an unintelligent inclusiveness which, for the sake of numbers or prestige, adopts every latest young people's fad, thus belittling or perhaps crowding out the very things which Christian Endeavor was established to maintain, until at last, as one has graphically expressed it, 'the guest has eaten up the host.'" President Taft, who was a speaker at the convention, declared that the negotiations for the arbitration treaty between Great Britain and the United States had reached such a stage that there is no doubt as to the signing of the pact. The President expressed the hope that eventually half a dozen European countries may sign the treaty. Mr. George W. Coleman, of Boston, was elected as a trustee to succeed the late Dr. Wayland Hoyt. The comprehensive resolutions were prepared by Dr. Howard B. Grose, editor of Missions.

The Progress of the American Teacher

There can be no doubt that United States school teachers as a whole are improving in their intellectual attainments, in their character of men and women, and especially as pedagogues. The thoughtless public is less disposed than formerly to poke fun at the "schoolma'ams" and to refer to the men as "wielders of the birch." One notable agency in the elevation of the personnel of the splendid group of teachers, to whom the country owes more than it can ever repay, has been the National Education Association, whose growing usefulness and power have stimulated public respect for the profession. At the meeting of the association at San Francisco there was a large and representative attendance. Many of the papers read were of a high order. The emphasis placed upon efficiency and morals was noteworthy. Mr. Carroll G. Pearse, superintendent of schools of Milwaukee, was elected president.

Foreign Affairs

In Great Britain parliament is still considering the veto bill. Lord Lansdowne's amendment, which provides for exclusion from the operation of the bill of legislation relating to Irish home rule, for joint sittings of the two houses in case of disagreement, and for a referendum where disagreements cannot be reconciled, was adopted by a large majority, the government, however, announcing that it would not accept this amendment. It is understood that the commons will eventually reject all amendments. The bill went back to the commons on July 13. The talk of compromise between the two houses grows louder, the lords appearing to believe that King George will really appoint a sufficient number of Liberal peers to carry the present veto bill, which is intended to curtail the powers of the lords, if the present Conservative majority continues to oppose it. Rather than submit to this the lords, undoubtedly, will yield. ——The Montreal Witness believes there is greater respect for law in Protestant countries than in those nominally Catholic. It cites the fact that when the Eucharistic Congress met in Montreal, a year ago, there was no disturbance, although thousands of Protestants watched the parade, while, this year, at Madrid, the paraders were cautioned to march in silence lest hostile demonstrations on the part of Republicans and Anti-Clericals should follow. As it was, a bomb was exploded which injured sixty people. In Nimes, France, the bishop has just been fined for displaying the papal flag on the occasion of the Joan of Arc festival. "It is in the interests of Roman Catholics," it says, "as well as of themselves, that Protestants are working when they accept Dr. John Clifford's advice and 'hold on to their Protestantism.'"——As The Christian Century has already pointed out, the New Turk party has no easy task in governing the empire. It is not entirely at one among its members, it has inherited centuries of bad precedents and examples of official stealing, the people themselves are so largely ignorant, religious hatred is so bitter, while the problem of governing an empire so large and with so many conflicting and discordant elements is one to tax the resources of even a more competent government. Just at present, trouble appears to center in Albania, the southwest part of European Turkey. The Albanians, like the people of Arabia, are bitterly complaining of the oppression which they feel. There is bound to be another upheaval in Turkey. Yet we have been saying this for years.

The Grafter

By Edwin Davis Schoonmaker.

To have gone from home with confidence of friends
And then return, a thing that has his price:
To know within his heart that this is so:
To have sold honor, yet to take men's hands:
To meet the honest merchant in the street,
The humble workman clean beneath his grime:
To face the Sabbath in the little church,
And after service feel the press of friends
And hear sincerely spoken words of praise,
While wife and children stand admiring by—
Is this not Hell?

Sunday-School

Statistics.

The statistician may be the last person in the world to understand the meaning of a movement but without him we cannot reach adequate conclusions relative to the progress of morals and religion. What is the influence of the Sunday-school in the world? The following figures, from the report of Secretary Marion Lawrance at the convention of the International Sunday-school Association of North America, held in San Francisco, June 21 to 27, are worth studying:

"Six million one hundred and eighty-five thousand nine hundred and seventy-five pieces of literature have been issued from our office during the last three years.

"We are glad to record that we have 1,050 banner counties, as against 716 three years ago, a gain of 46 per cent.

"Forty-eight Sunday-school conventions for every day in the year is what it means to hold 53,380 conventions in three years.

"Twenty-seven thousand, eight hundred and seventy cradle rolls with 687,626 babies in them, show a gain of 60 per cent in three years in this department.

"The home department has made a commendable gain, reporting 19,700 departments with 644,417 enrolled members.

"One million one hundred and ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty-two conversions reported for the triennium indicate a gain of over 290,000 above the figures reported at Louisville. When we consider that this means the conversion of over 1,000 souls a day it ought to make us truly thankful.

"The growth of teacher training during the last nine years is indicated by the following: At the Denver convention in 1902 we reported one person in 111 of the officers and teachers in North America as enrolled in a teacher training class; at Toronto in 1905 the proportion was one in sixty-four; at Louisville in 1908 it was one in twenty, and now it is one in twelve."

The Religion of Youth.

In his address at the Sunday-school convention in San Francisco on the subject, "The Relation of the Church to the Ten Ages," Bishop Hughes said:

"It is never anything less than a tragedy to fasten men's religious duties on children. The Bible makes no such blunder. Its children are not little old men and little old women. They are just children, and they serve only as children may serve naturally. The maid in Naaman's household does a service in a child's way. The little sister that saved Moses' life played along the river banks and ceased not to be a child even when she became a shrewd heroine.

"The boy that picked up the arrows and made answer to Jonathan helped to preserve the life of David, the coming king; but he served in the fashion of a boy. The lad that handed his lunch basket to Christ and became a partner in the most dramatic of our Lord's miracles did all his work after the manner of a generous and impulsive boy. Paul's nephew saved the great apostle's life, as you will read in the Acts; but he never assumed his uncle's duties. It is good and suggestive to note that Moses and David, the greatest figures in the Old Testament, and Paul, the greatest human figure in the New Testament, were saved to their work by children who served better than they knew and yet served only in the ways of childhood. The Bible knows no childish 'prigs,' but it does know childish tasks."

President Taft on the Sunday-school.

Not all Sunday-school teachers are fully alive to the greatness of their opportunity. All need to be reminded frequently of what it means to assist others in attaining a knowledge of religious truth and of the sacred book of Christians. In the following words of President Taft, spoken on Anniversary Day in Brooklyn, N. Y., there is encouragement for every teacher in the Sunday-school:

As I look on these faces and go about the streets of Brooklyn, I am sincerely sorry to think that I have not had in my life the privileges that have grown up in the lives of Brooklyn men and women in the annual Sunday-school observance of Anniversary Day. It must be one to which you all cling. It must be of vast enthusiasm in your schools. It is a thing that must cling to you, because its advantages grow upon you each year. Now, with respect to Sunday-schools, there are a great many reasons why you should attend them. But I would speak to the young men and women who are old enough to understand the importance of literature and history, and I would urge upon them the necessity of close attention to the lessons taught and learned in the Sunday-school. The study of the Bible, the study of the history of the Bible, and the study of its literature will form in after-life a wealth and position for you which you cannot now understand. The men who speak with most telling effect are those able to command illustrations from Holy Writ, who are familiar with the stories of Holy Writ, and who can tell them to their audiences. They are the ones who understand the force of that Book. And, boys and girls, it is in the Sunday-school where you get the opportunities which you never have again in all your busy life to familiarize yourselves with its lessons and literature. I do not mean to say that that is the chief benefit from Sunday-school attendance, and I should be lacking in appreciation if I did say so, for that is only one of the chief benefits of the Sunday-school. The greatest one, of course, is laying the foundations of a moral and religious character. To the older students, this is something I would impress on them; for they realize as they grow older the opportunities they have lost if they have not studied that Book of Books.

Universalist

His Own Fault.

Readers of the Ladies Home Journal will remember the information which a certain woman imparted to them through that periodical a few years ago concerning her experiences in visiting churches in the cities of America. She started out to discover how often she could contrive to be ignored. She succeeded so well that her articles were highly entertaining. What she did not consider and what her readers did not always remember is the fact that if we adopt her attitude we can be ignored every day, by our best friends, and in our own homes. The Universalist Leader comments thus on this method of finding ground of complaint against the church:

Every little while some "Smart Alec" swings into the public view with the astounding statement that he has been to churches of various kinds for the last few years and no one has taken any notice of him! He puts this up as the final judgment against the church, and there are always plenty of newspapers eager to give currency to the statement of the aggrieved one. Now we believe thoroughly in a social church so long as it does not violate the purpose of the church and the standards of good sense and good breeding, but we do feel that whenever this individual comes forward with this plaint, that the only thing to say to him is that he is probably not worth noticing! If he goes to church to be noticed, if that is his object, there is no reason why he should be. If he goes to church to worship God the chances are he will not be looking for other people to worship him. If he goes to church to do some good, he will find a way to do it. But if he goes for the purpose of finding fault, he would be disappointed if some one did speak to him, for then his preformed opinion would be blasted! There is hardly a church in existence today where a person can go and not receive recognition, all he deserves, all he needs, and all he wants, if he does not prevent it himself. From a contemporary we cull the latest story of this freak churchgoer, and, while it may be an extreme case, it illustrates what is true in nearly every instance which has come to public notice. It appears that a man "appeared in church with his hat on, and when the usher requested him to remove it, he explained his disrespect by saying that he had attended the church for two years without any one having spoken to him, and he was determined in some way to get an introduction. He was, of course, very much obliged to the usher for speaking to him. Which moves us to say that this man who goes about from church to church to see whether the people will speak to him must be the same man we have heard of all our lives, who carries a chip on his shoulder. He is looking for something to complain about. He does really go to church at times—very seldom, though it might be a good thing for him to go to church once in a while to worship. But we must be excused from believing that any one, rich or poor, who goes to church is really neglected, except in rare and widely separated instances."

Christian Science

The Darker Side of the Picture.

"The ultimate and final test of any system or philosophy is usually furnished by the child." This is the text of an article in the Independent on, "Christian Science and the Child," by Dr. Henry Dwight Chapin, president of the American Pediatric Society. Various forms of mental healing have come into vogue as a result of the strain of our engrossing life and in an endeavor to relieve this strain. All the so-called healing systems that ignore the methods and progress of medical science gain their reputation by dealing with imaginary or functional or quickly limiting diseases. The tragedy is liable to begin when it comes to severe organic or infectious diseases. Dr. Chapin gives instances of children that have been relieved by scientific treatment, against the protests of the Christian Science cult, and also of children permanently weakened, and of others exposed to infectious diseases because parents and friends persisted, in ignoring plain facts. The article closes with these words:

"Ah! but it gives us such rest and peace."

A peace derived by ignoring the sterner facts of life is too dearly bought. Against the vapid joy and peace that this form of faith gives to any neurotic man or woman you may often count a sick or maimed or dying child. This is the dark, cruel, sinister side of the picture. It is really the child that is offered as a sacrifice on the altar of this unnatural belief.

It is time for plain and emphatic words. An appeal should be made not only to the intelligence, but to the public heart and conscience by those who can speak with knowledge and authority.

The Home Life of Jesus

The wonderful boy who sat among the teachers of Israel in the temple and amazed them by his understanding was content to return to the home of Joseph and Mary and submit himself to their guidance. From the beginning he gave honor to his father and mother. He was not puffed up by the superior insight he possessed; on the contrary, he reverenced the simple goodness he saw in that humble home in Nazareth.

Pious imagination has been busy with the story of Joseph and Mary and has added much to it. According to the apocryphal account Joseph was over ninety years old when he was selected by the priests to be the husband of Mary. When he was a hundred and eleven years old his body was that of a youth and he worked at his trade till the last day of his life. Details of his life have been seen in vision by various saints of the church. In 1871 Pius IX proclaimed St. Joseph patron of the whole church, committing "to the most powerful patronage of the Holy Patriarch, Joseph, Himself and all the faithful, and solemnly declared him Patron of the Catholic Church." The reader of the gospels finds evidence that Joseph was a pious man, a good husband, and an honest workman. As such we prefer him to the Joseph of apocryphal writers and the medieval saints. The childhood of our Lord was guarded by an honest working man, and it is a comfort to believe that there have been and are millions of other working men just as honest and pious as Joseph.

To Mary, the mother of Jesus, the angel said, "Hail, thou that art highly favored, the Lord is with thee." But there is nothing in the gospel narrative to indicate that she was superior in wisdom and goodness to other women of Israel. She was one of the best women that ever lived upon earth. Not to a goddess, but to a modest, sensible young woman was the training of the child Jesus committed. God has great respect for the genuinely human and he intrusts human beings with great responsibilities. Men have not had faith in one another and consequently they have found it hard to believe that a woman not unlike millions of other women was allowed to care for the Savior of the world. They have, therefore, put her in a class by herself and established a cult of Mary. Much good has come to mankind because Mary has been held in reverence, but this has come in spite of the extravagant honor paid to her.

There were brothers and sisters of Jesus with whom he must have played and worked. What they meant to him can be determined only as we learn the value of the companionships of childhood and youth. As Jesus grew in mind and heart, his brothers and sisters were doubtless helpers of his growth. In later life he took time needed for rest and refreshment that he might minister to the needy and distressed. It is in harmony with all the facts to hold that the strength of his youth was freely employed for the benefit of his brothers and sisters. They were younger than he. He was able to teach them how to play and how to do their earliest tasks. The sorrows of their childhood he shared and their joys he multiplied. Their hopes for the future were known to him and he fed their worthier ambitions.

Jesus was a carpenter. He helped to support the family. It was in accordance with Jewish custom that he was taught a trade. It was a saying of the rabbis that he who did not teach his son a trade taught him to steal. The Jew prized his independence and he knew there was no independence for the man who lacked skill in the doing of some useful thing. Jesus the working man teaches that religion and work are inseparably joined. No loafer can be a Christian. A loafer may refrain from active wickedness; the Christian makes a positive contribution to the welfare of mankind. Intelligence depends upon the use of the hands. Manual training has been introduced into the schools, not to make craftsmen, but to make men of clear heads and strong hearts. Such men will never be idlers. They know what is worth while. The dignity of labor is the theme of many a writer and speaker; some day we shall not have to say much about it, for in that day all men will rejoice in their labor and honor only those who do their part of life's work. Then the world will be Christian and understand the life of the carpenter of Nazareth. [Midweek service, August 2. Luke 2:51; Matt. 12:46-50; Mark 2:1-12; 6:3; John 2:2-3; 19:26, 27.]

New York Preachers and Their Salaries

To an extent never known before, New York City has lately drawn upon able ministers of the rest of the country to receive her big salaries and fill her famous pulpits. New York's Protestant churches are the largest in the world, outstripping in number of members, in financial incomes, in salaries paid to preachers, and in gifts to missions, any churches of any name in London, or Paris, Berlin or Rome. Within a very short time New York has called to her pulpits ten ministers to whom it pays $123,000 a year in the aggregate. One of those it brought from Birmingham, England, and one is New York born. The other eight came from other American cities.

In every one of the eight cases the men called were doing important work in their several cities. In some of the cases the men were needed in supreme degree in the cities where they were. New York, however, with her larger stipends and greater opportunity, the latter real or imagined, drew the men away.

The highest salaried ministers in America, probably in the world, are the Rev. Dr. William T. Manning of Trinity, New York, and the Rev. Dr. John Henry Jowett, New York, the one Episcopal, the other Presbyterian. With stipend and house allowance their pay approaches $25,000 a year each. And these salaries, or any others of the ten recently called, are not over liberal, for expenses are enormous. Were the salaries not at these high figures only wealthy men could afford to accept the positions. It is not that great men demand big pay. The salaries are made what they are simply to meet conditions.

The salary of the new Dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, the Rev. Dr. William M. Grosvenor, and the new pastor of the Brick Church, the Rev. Dr. William P. Merrill, is $12,000 a year each. Chicago suffers that New York may have one of these men. The Rev. Dr. Malcolm James McLeod, recently from the Pacific Coast, the new pastor of St. Nicholas Dutch Church, the oldest in New York, receives $15,000 a year. The Coast suffered that New York might have him, just as it did when the Rev. Dr. W. H. Foulkes of Portland went to Rutgers Church, New York, at $10,000 a year.

The Rev. Howard C. Robbins, a New England man lately in charge of a New Jersey suburban church, goes to the Incarnation, New York, at $10,000 a year. The Rev. Dr. S. Edward Young, prominent on the floor of the General Assembly just held, although quite a young man, gets $9,000 a year, and went from Pittsburg, where leaders are needed. Finally, the Rev. John Mockridge, leaving Louisville where needed, went to Trinity Chapel, New York, at $7,500 and the Rev. Theodore Sedgewick, doing a great work in St. Paul and needed in the north west, went to Calvary, New York, at $7,500. London has never drained England to an extent that New York drains other American cities at the present moment.

Not a few of these salaries are higher than their figures indicate, since houses are provided, and houses mean much in New York. Nor are these the only high salaried ministers New York maintains. Indeed, these are merely the recruits of one fairly active spring season. The Rev. Dr. David James Burrell of the Marble Collegiate Dutch Church receives $15,000 a year, the Rev. Dr. Charles E. Jefferson of the Broadway Tabernacle $12,000, the Rev. Dr. Ernest M. Stires of St. Thomas Church $12,000, the Rev. Dr. Leighton Parks of St. Bartholomew's $12,000, the Rev. Dr. Charles L. Slattery of Grace Church $12,000, the Rev. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis of Plymouth Church $12,000, and the Rev. Dr. William Carter of the Madison Avenue Reformed, $10,000. Like the others, most of these are provided with houses, and like all of the others they are under expenses that preachers in smaller cities are not compelled to bear.

Attacks and Defences of Methodist Polity

Bishop Thomas B. Neeley of New Orleans, who for years has given study to Methodist Church polity, has come to the defence of that polity in reply to attacks now making by Methodist laymen. Some Laymen's Associations, in the conferences held last spring, proposed radical changes in Methodism. These propositions have been sent to other associations, and throughout Methodism North this fall it is expected these changes will be heard and recommended. The fall conferences begin about August 15, and the laymen's associations meet at the same times and places.

Methodist laymen charge failure to Methodism in certain places, notably in the large cities, owing to defects in polity. The propositions put forth contemplate laymen sitting as members of the annual conferences as they now do in the quadrennial general conferences; laymen as members of the cabinets of bishops which make appointments of ministers; the districting of bishops, making each supreme in a diocese after the Episcopal or Catholic plans; and the multiplication of the number of bishops so that each may be familiar with his own field and stay sufficiently long in it to be able to lead Methodism in that field constantly and intelligently. Under the present Methodist plan bishops, now only twelve in number, hold annual conferences in many parts of the country, and perhaps do not return within the year to ascertain the suitability of their appointments of ministers, or the wisdom of other decisions made in unfamiliar fields and under hurried conditions.

In his defence of the present Methodist polity Bishop Neeley begins with John Wesley of London, in the first half of the 18th century, and follows the early Methodist organization as it came to America and grew into the Methodist Church. He points out to Methodist laymen that the Methodist system has three determining parts: connectional, supervisional and constitutional.

"The local church," argues the bishop, "is part of a great system and all the churches are bound together by a common government. In this government there is a system of graded oversight and authority, and all the parts of the church act under a written constitution which guarantees the rights of each and every individual.

"At the summit of the supervisional system is the episcopate, which is not a local or diocesan episcopate restricted to a particular section, but one of a general character, so that a Bishop might be assigned service in any part of the churches. This is an itinerant episcopacy but the system provides for permanent and thorough local supervision through a class of officers who used to be called Presiding Elders, but now are known as District Superintendents. This is the local episcopate superintending limited districts, while the bishops supervise the district officers, thus ensuring a very complete supervision both local and general.

"To this supervisional system the overwhelming mass of laymen and ministers are thoroughly loyal and the system has vindicated itself throughout many generations. Indeed, the church has been most prosperous when and where it has been most completely and consistently worked out and the greatest failures have been where the graded system of supervision has allowed to fall into disuse in whole or in part.

"With a vigorous episcopacy and district superintendency, the system," concludes Bishop Neeley, "is as near perfect as human institutions can be perfect. Certain needs now pleaded are the results of the non-working of the system."

Methodist laymen declare that if Methodism keeps in the lead in numbers in Protestant bodies it must readjust its machinery. More than 25,000 churches and 3,200,000 members are vitally interested in actions taken. There are about sixty Laymen's Associations, with 240,000 members, made up of the working laymen who hold most of the official positions in Methodist congregations of the North.

Happy is he who night and day entertains no other care and anxiety, but how he may be able to render a satisfactory account of his life when he stands before the Judge.—St. Basil.

Interpretations

God or Mammon

I have a very good friend (not living here) who is greatly interested in church work but who has never made a public confession of his faith, and of course never became a member of the church. The other day I wrote him suggesting that he should identify himself more fully with the church. This is his answer: "I have peculiar feelings on church membership and I never will be ready to join, feeling in my present state of mind that should I do so I would be to some extent at least a hypocrite, and I will never go any farther than I am until I can truthfully eliminate such things as tend to give me this feeling. My business has some angles I do not like, but as long as I follow this line, I cannot figure how I can run it differently. . . . I realize that we are not supposed to be perfect but I also realize that when a man fully realizes he would be to 'some extent' a hypocrite, if he joined a church, knowing he was not living up to his own idea of what a professing Christian should be, he would despise himself for such an act and I can't do it now, and possibly never. Secondly, I have not considered it necessary for years to be immersed to follow the right track. I feel as if I never could be immersed and I do not see why I should have to be to live an upright Christ-like life. I do not feel that act would ever make me live a better life."

My friend is typical of a legion of business men of today. There are some angles of their business that do not comport with the two great commandments. To do business, misrepresentation is resorted to, and consequently wrong is done to others and all one's sensitive feelings are violated.

My friend is right in not wishing to become a hypocrite, but he is wrong in keeping the "angles" that estrange him from honor and duty. There is one very sad phrase in his letter,—"possibly never." A soul looking upon its ideals says, "Possibly never shall I will to live up to them." What could be sadder? My friend is a big-hearted, liberal, kindly man. What he needs is abandon of soul to submit himself to God. He should quit the "angles," or, if necessary, his business. God will care for him. The soul is tremendously more important than money. When he gets the proper vision of Christ that moment he will leave all to follow him.

Baptism never seemed to me to link up with life quite so vitally as it did after reading the above letter. Baptism itself is a small matter compared to the integrity of conscience. Yet the very thing my friend must do is to submit himself to God. Let him abandon business and everything to do God's will—now. Baptism is a symbol of that submission. The slight expression of his resignation would do his soul good. His two objections are thus closely related. We need more recklessness in our trust of God. "Possibly never," certainly never, will our brother gain fullness of salvation while he is trying to hold on to his false "angles." Let him burn the bridges behind him and go out into the desert of no business if need be. And then he will find an oasis of blessing, God himself, and in his new found joy, joy from surrender, he will cry out, "Lord, what will thou have me to do."

As my friend's is a typical attitude I think it might be well to quote a secular paper. The Chicago Tribune recently had the following editorial, entitled, "QUIT."

"A shoe salesman writes a letter to the Tribune revealing the conditions of business in the establishment as being directly opposed to the dictates of his conscience. He avers that the motto in that and other establishments is: 'Never mind what they want. Sell them what you've got. That's salesmanship.' To have a customer go away without purchasing means dismissal for the salesman, he says. He then tells how he made a sale, by promising the impossible to a customer.

"We are aware of the fierceness of competition, and we do not doubt that in some concerns dishonest methods are resorted to, but we refuse to believe that business—shoe or any other—is conducted on a basis of fraud and deceit. No customer ever returns to a shop where he has been deceived. In the light of present day competition it is fatal to a shop to make one sale under false pretenses.

"The young man puts the problem of business ethics up to the Tribune. Very well. Quit your job. Refuse to work for an unjust and dishonest man, no matter what your needs are. Quit."

The Battle of the Punctuation Marks

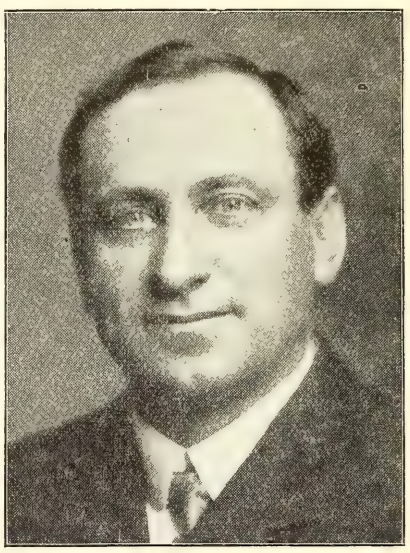
BY ELLIS B. BARNES.

The Christian Century is doing us good service in discussing living issues, a practice, by the way, which had almost fallen into disuse, if not into disrepute among us in these later years; and I hail with pleasure the revival of this noble art which did so much to win recognition for us among the religious forces of the land, and to inspire confidence in our leaders, in the brave days of old. Not that we have not had discussion a plenty of a certain sort, the prevailing effect of the whole leading us to wonder why this dispensation of calomel and quinine had been visited upon us, to silence our inquiries, to humble our pride, and to arrest our progress. Ours has been the discipline of drenching, and, had it continued much longer, I fear that nothing would have been left to tell the story of our disappearance but the apothecary and his drugs. The voice of The Century is one of the symptoms of our convalescence.

Discussion a Boon.

The ability to raise searching and serious questions, and to discuss them calmly and with intelligence, is a boon to any people, a sign of life, and guarantee of mental alertness which a people must possess who hope to exert any influence upon their age. The wags will tell us that a fool can ask more questions than a wise man can answer; and I have often wished that in the providential order it had been so arranged that a wise man could answer more questions than the fool could ask; but since the order cannot be changed, we may find compensation in the fact that the fool whose queries are the despair of the wise may one day join their ranks, and share with them their silence. It will certainly be the verdict of history that the world has learned more from the interrogations of the fool than from the silence of the wise and, that being true, the majority of mankind will not escape the encomiums of the historian for having contributed something to the sum of human knowledge. What Carlyle said of England is true of all countries, that "its population is forty millions—mostly fools." It is as natural for man to enjoy the follies of the fool as to indulge in the illusions of hope. The fellowship of the wise, which we all covet, may elude us, but the fellowship of the vast majority we may all enjoy. If only the wise raised questions, or spoke when they were raised, the silence of the world would not often be broken; and then we could not always be certain that the wise man spoke according to his profession. The fool may be a philosopher after all, hiding his wisdom under the vernacular of the boor. The clown pays tribute to the wisdom of the fool by burlesquing the folly of the wise. Even the wise man in Holy Writ is exhorted to become a fool that he may be wise. We can never forget that the follies of one age may be the philosophies of the next. So the fool may be a mightier factor in the world's development than the man whom wisdom teaches to hide his ignorance under the mask of silence. The inquiring spirit is a reversion to the days of inquiry and wonder which shed a halo around the head of childhood. What a revelation is this gift of the child! How pitiful that it should become dormant so soon, and that on the very threshold of knowledge, the questioning spirit, the key that unlocks the treasure-house of all that is of value in the world, is lost. So we affirm that the ability to raise and discuss living questions is a priceless gift to any people.

The man who in far off ages discovered the use of the interrogation deserves to be ranked with the shivering savage who learned to make a fire, and with Edison who taught our world the marvels of electricity. From that hairy citizen away back in the dawn of the world's morning to Thomas A. Edison is, as the poet's say, a far cry; but had he not spent his spare time trying to pry off the lid of his neighbor's repository of knowledge with a query for a crowbar, it is certain that Edison would never have uncovered the secrets of the electric fluid. The mysterious twinkle in the barbarian's eye that lighted up the domestic hearth, when he propounded a question which not a member of the village



Rev. Ellis B. Barnes.

Sanhedrin could answer, was a forerunner of the arc light. It is certain that the sleep of the pre-historic world was broken by the man, or maybe the woman, the stirrings in whose brain was first suggested a question. "Why?" must be one of the oldest words in human speech. The rising inflection was foreordained to become as great a factor in the civilization of the world as the rising of the sun. Without the question there never could have been a response, and all possibilities of intelligence would have perished under the unbroken blight of silence. An interrogation is a dissolver of a sedate and contented society, the sea that breaks into endless variety the shore line of human thought. It is a challenge to the dull conformity of every age, a leveller of partitions, a uniformed official demanding passports of the stranger, a custom-house dignitary prying into the secrets of the unsuspecting, and exacting an inventory of all the possessions of earth and sky and sea. The antedeluvian highwaymen who first compelled the mysterious to stand and deliver, was the harbinger of Darwin and Burbank; the crude gropings of the savage who has passed to oblivion like his foot-prints on the sands, presaged the birth of the scientific spirit that probes the joints and marrow of rock and star, to wring from their reluctant lips secrets that had been hidden from the foundation of the world. The interrogation point is the "lucky curve" in the process of civilization.

A Prehistoric Columbus.

Naturally this Columbus on the sea of inquiry in that remote age become a thorn in the side of his time, a disturber of the dignified and established order of society, and finally devoloped into an intolerable nuisance. As his desire for knowledge grew from more to more, his instructors grew from few to fewer. As his confidence in his own assurance weakened, so weakened the confidence of his neighbors in him. The more seriously he questionel the correctness of his own conclusions, the more seriously his fellow citizens questioned his right to be at large. The leaders of his day inflicted upon him "the cold recoil of suspicion;" and, when they looked in his direction, it was only to call the attention of their friends to his mental peculiarities by pointing their index finger to their beetling brows, a sign, by the way, which bears the ancestry of the ancient house of Melchesideck. He was laughed at by the elite, and jeered at by the ragamuffin. But he heeded not the frowns of the pious or the curses of the mob; and in his daily parades on Fifth avenue in quest of physical culture, while he threw his sheep-skin toga around his massive shoulders to protect them from the biting blasts of Boreas, he bravely bared his lofty brow with contemptuous indifference to the more cruel shafts of aristocratic scorn. He found his revenge in the pity he felt for the ignorance of the wise which they were shrewd enough to conceal by their silence. He well knew that their greatest asset was the confidence with which they affirmed on all subjects, and the sharp resentment with which they spurned the charge that they were undecided on any question that had come within the purview of human thinking. In his estimation, they were passing spurious coin. The difference between him and them was that he wanted to know, and he inquired; they wanted to know, too, but to inquire would reveal the fact that there was something that they did not know, so they kept still, and their silence, in the estimation of the proletarians, passed for a university. One joined the long procession of fools that inquired; the other joined the procession and the silence of the rocks.

Two Parties Born.

The next step in the process was undertaken as a matter of public policy; the curve must be taken out of the back of this interrogation point or the ancient order of the world would pass away. At once society divided into two classes, and the struggle of the centuries began. Two parties were born which should never die, the Exclamationists who were startled by the effrontery with which the opposite party asked questions which indicated that something might be wrong in the constitution of society, and who were called Interrogationists. The former stood for the existing order, for the traditions and long established usages to which the sanction of antiquity and the prestige of great names had been given; of course they were in the majority. They were known as the powers that be, by the nobility; by the opposition they were known as the feebles that be. Wealth and influence were on their side, while to the Interrogationists was left the cold consolation that comes of confidence in the justice of their cause, and the certainty of its final triumph. With no power to confer offices, they could never hope to be popular. One sect owned all the chapels, the other owned all the cathedrals. Each claimed a great invention as an ally: the Exclamationist had the rack, the Interrogationist, the printing press. But the Exclamationists having numbers in their favor, and all popular machinery, set bounds beyond which none should pass, and determined in solemn assemblies what questions should be tolerated in well ordered communities. With numbers, they had the applause to bestow when prominent leaders spoke and when the elect among the leaders sneezed the partisans came to believe that the foundations of the earth had been shaken, and rent the heavens with their adulations. They had in their keeping, too, the big stick, a carnal weapon adorned with huge knots which, when applied to the Interrogationist, won his assent to the tenets of the belaboring party. That stick still survives in theological circles, and has more influence than ever, under the new name, patronage. In ancient times it was applied to the offender's back; in our times it is applied to his belly. The brutalism of the old regime has been superceded by the more refined, but none the less effective punishment of the new.

The Weapons of the Parties.

Finding that the Interrogationists were making for themselves a place in the world through the power of their ally, the printing press, the Exclamationists determined to use their ally which was designed to take the crook out of the back of every Interrogationist in existence. When laid on that machine, and the power properly applied, the kink had to come out or the undertaker had to come in. For immediate results, the Exclamationist had the stronger weapon, and for a time the wonders it accomplished exceeded the expectations of the most sanguine. If the victim survived, he looked as straight and orderly as any Exclamationist that had ever been born, and he was compelled to take his place in the ranks of the popular party where he contributed to their uniformity, but never to their unity. His conversion was successful in form, but a failure in fact. The opposition labored under the delusion which has dominated the world from the dawn of the Stone Age until the dawn of this July morning, that the essence of the tree is changed when its form is changed. The Interrogationist might have the straight and soldierly bearing of the Exclamationist, after a brief sojourn upon the rack, but though he might lose his form, and even his tongue, he could never lose the rising inflection. The rack might as well hope to change the color of his eyes. That inflection has been born to trouble as the sparks fly upward, and its character cannot be changed any more than the Ethiopian can change his skin. In all ages that spirit of inquiry has impelled its possessor to obtrude his turbulent and scientific nose into the complacencies of the church and the satisfactions of the state. The Interrogationist has been the alarm-clock to the intellectual torpor of the world.

Conflict Still Continues.

The conflict continues today, the Exclamationist puckering his brows at the audacious and unsettling queries of the Interrogationist. With the one, the present is a period of degeneracy, and the golden age is always past; with the other, the present is an opportunity as ripe as any day that dawned upon the world, and every hour a gateway to the golden age. For the progress that always disturbs, one has a frown, the other a cheer. Along this path of friction, beset by warring powers, moves the progress of the world. The difference between men everywhere, and which results in our upheavals, is the difference of attitude—the difference between that spirit which regards the past as a tomb, or the past as a torch, and the present as the opportunity for burying, or for promulgating the truth as it is in Jesus.

Our English Letter

The King's Coronation and a Trip to Norway

BY LESLIE W. MORGAN.

I have to write in this article concerning the Coronation which I did not see, and in regard to a little trip to Norway which interfered with my sharing in the joys of the Coronation festivities.

I was not the only one who had a mind to leave London the night before the great event. I thought before reaching the station to take the continental express train, that I should be the only one seeking to get out of London the evening before such a great event, but the train was crowded with people who doubtless thought the same thing. Those with whom I talked expressed themselves as being anxious to get away from the press and throng which threatened the metropolis. Some had made it convenient to begin their holidays at that time. Some were going away for only the few days covered by the special festivities.

Vast Crowd Expected.

From the accounts given of the Coronation day, and the day after, called Procession day, many people were frightened out of the city by the oft repeated assertions in police notices and in newspaper articles that London would be packed from centre to circumference, for the actual experience seems to have been that nothing like the crowds gathered that were expected. It is said that there was elbow room and to spare in Trafalgar Square, one of the best points for viewing the procession, and that some of the streets were occupied only by the three rows of police and soldiers set there to keep back the crowds. It was necessary to close only a few of the gates erected as barriers for the purpose of controlling the expected throngs. Doubtless there were thousands of people who would like to have seen the procession, and would have done so, had they known it might have been accomplished in comparative comfort. Some who paid fabulous prices for seats, having purchased them some time in advance, were sorry that they did not wait until the morning of the day, when, in many places, they could have been gotten for a trifle.

Notwithstanding all this, there were great throngs to see the king and queen ride forth to their Coronation and return crowned, crowned also in the hearts of a loyal people. The beauty and pageantry of it all has never been equalled, and the enthusiasm and loyalty displayed has never been excelled.

There is no doubt about the reigning family, from the king down to little Prince John, being firmly enthroned in the hearts of the people. Their family life appeals very strongly to the English heart. The king and queen are looked upon as ideal parents, and most devoted to the interests of their own home.

Perhaps one of the most striking features of the Coronation celebrations was the visit of 100,000 school children to the Crystal Palace by invitation of the king. They spent a day of frolic, fun, and feasting. The king and queen, the Prince of Wales and Princess Mary were there to greet them. The children were collected from every part of London, conveyed to the palace and returned, without a single accident. Each received a souvenir from the king in the form of a Coronation cup.

King Visiting His Realm.

Following on his coronation, the king is to pay a visit to various parts of his realm, including Wales, Scotland and Ireland, and in the autumn to India. A visit to India has never before been carried out by a reigning sovereign, and the proposed visit is attracting great attention, and giving immense satisfaction to his Indian subjects.

It is believed that King George will devote more time to the cementing of imperial ties, and less perhaps to the cultivation of continental friendships. Being Great Britain's sailor king, as he is called, he will the more readily take to the sea and visit his outlying dominions.

And now concerning the things I saw in my absence from the festivities at home.

By invitation of the committee of our work in Norway, I paid them a visit at the time of the annual meeting of their churches, held at Fredrikshald, a town of 12,000, situated not far from the southern border of the country.

The coronation festivities had claimed a number of the boats, usually plying in the North Sea, hence I made the journey by what is known as the overland route, via the Hook of Holland, Hamburg and Copenhagen. I was glad to get a glimpse again of picturesque Dutch scenes; to renew my friendship with the windmills and canals, the dogs and the black and white cows, not to mention the jolly Dutch men and Dutch women themselves. I was sorry to see that many of the black and white cows have turned to brown, and many of the black horses had changed to bay. Had they altered to gray I would have thought it was due simply to the addition of twelve years to their age, but since the change was not to gray, I am at a loss as to its meaning.

A few hours were spent in Augsburg and also in Hamburg. The latter has elements of great beauty, especially in the magnificent stretch of water in the midst of the city. A very enjoyable day was spent at Copenhagen, in the company of my old-time friend, Julius Cramer, who is pastor of our church in Copenhagen. Many Drake students will remember him as having been at Drake in the nineties. He is happy in his work, and exceedingly happy in his home. The little girl of four of other days has grown to young womanhood, and her charms have been discovered by an excellent youth, but there! secrets must be kept. The Danish people are of a quiet and stable character; not so voluble or enthusiastic as their Norwegian neighbors, but probably more set in their convictions and permanent in the positions taken up. Mr. Cramer joined me in the journey to Fredrikshald, which occupied the greater part of a night. We journeyed through the southern portion of Sweden, which is somewhat rocky and barren.

The conference was largely attended, and was very enthusiastic. The Norwegian people seem never to tire, and are willing to sit the greater part of the day and far into the night, listening or participating in religious exercises.

The Church at Fredrickshald.

Our church at Fredrikshald has a membership of 283, and is the strongest free church in the town. The pastor is Anders Johnsen, who also will be remembered by some Drake friends. It was a pleasure to be in his home, and to enjoy the cordial hospitality there extended. The one little girl of Drake days has been multiplied by two, and three

The Moral Leaders of Israel

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XXXI. Obadiah and the Foes of Judah

August 6. Scripture for Special Study, Obadiah.

1. JUDAH AND EDOM.

It was natural that an event so tragic and far-reaching as the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B. C. should profoundly affect the inhabitants of the entire region at the eastern end of the Mediterranean. The Kingdom of Israel had come to an end in 721 B. C., so that it was no longer a political unit. But the neighboring nations were deeply and selfishly concerned in the fate of Jerusalem.

Among those nations were the Philistines, the Ammonites, the Moabites and the Edomites. The first occupied the coast region south and west of Judah. The second and third lay east of the Jordan and the Dead Sea. The last dwelt in the rocky district south of the Dead Sea, and was of all the tribes named the most vindictive in its hostility to Judah.

The Edomites were the reputed descendants of Esau. It was the feeling of the Hebrews that the old feud between Judah and Esau was never healed. When Jacob came back from Syria to Canaan, Esau was dwelling in the mountainous region of Seir, south of the Dead Sea. The two brothers met, Jacob with his flocks, herds and family, and Esau with his four hundred warriors. There was no strife at the time, and the two separated in peace (Gen. 32, 33). But the two clans were too close in blood and location not to cherish ill-will toward each other. This was augmented by the growing strength of each, the Edomites soon became a powerful people (Gen. 36). Their rule was earlier and more successful than that of Judah.

The relations between Israel and Edom were never friendly. The Edomites were among the nations against which Saul the first king warred successfully (1 Sam. 14:47). In the reign of David an even completer mastery of Edom was obtained, so that Hebrew garrisons were placed in the important cities of that land (2 Sam. 8:14).

The narrative in 1 Kings 11:9-22 describes a further cause for the national hostility with Edom in the destructive campaign which David and Joab waged against that land.

Solomon continued to hold sway over Edom, and his port of departure for the sea voyages which brought him wealth from India was Elath on the Gulf of Akaba, the southern point of Edomite territory (1 Kings 9:26-28). Among the women of his court were representatives of Edom (1 Kings 11:1), and it is intimated that some of the religious practices of Edom were introduced into Judah (1 Kings 11:8).

In the reigns of Jehoram of Israel and Jehoshaphat of Judah, the king of Edom was summoned as a vassal of Judah to assist in the campaign against his neighbor, the king of Moab (2 Kings 3:1-9), but in the following reign, that of Jehoram of Judah, Edom revolted from the authority of Jerusalem and established its independent rule (2 Kings 8:20-22). In the reign of Amaziah, however, a great victory was gained over Edom, and a rock city, perhaps Petra, was taken (2 Kings 14:7). But this ground was lost in the reign of Ahaz (2 Kings 6:16).

Thus the hatred of Edom for Judah was developed through the centuries, and needed only an adequate occasion to express itself with full force. That occasion was presented when the Babylonians took Jerusalem in 586 B. C. and devoted it to destruction. The Edomites held mad revels on the heights about the doomed city, and sated their vengeance on any stragglers that ventured outside of protection or fell out of the line of exiles that took up the journey to the east.

2. EDOM IN THE OLD TESTAMENT.

Throughout the Old Testament Edom is referred to as one of the chief seats of wisdom. The wise men are mentioned as among the most famous of the time, and even Solomon was measured by this wisdom of the East.

At the same time the prophets maintain the same attitude of a disapproval and hostility voiced in the historical references. Amos announced the punishment of Edom because of its brutal and unbrotherly treatment of Judah (Am. 1:11, 12). Jeremiah, in an oracle uttered some years before the fall of Jerusalem, declared his confidence that Edom should feel the wrath of God, visited upon her by the stern experiences of war (Jer. 49:7-22).

Ezekiel, in Babylonia, preached the fall of Edom, Because of the vindictive attitude of that land, toward Judah (Ezek. 25:12-14).

The emotion of Obadiah as he reflected on the savage conduct of Edom is the subject of our study in this section. And a psalmist of the period has described not only the homesickness of the exiles taken to Babylon, but the sentiment of vengeance which flamed in their hearts as they thought of the merciless brutality of their two chief foes, Babylon and Edom (Ps. 137), and the spirit of those great evangelical prophecies which are expressed in the third and post-exilic section of the Book of Isaiah (chapters 56-66, is disturbed by feelings of hatred against Edom which reach their climax in the terrible oracle of 63:1-6. In this tremendous utterance the hope is expressed that when Jehovah appears for the complete redemption and restoration of his people, he will come like a warrior drenched in the blood of the Edomites. In that moment he exclaims, "I trod them in mine anger and trampled them in my fury; and their life-blood is sprinkled upon my garments, and I have stained all my raiment." Only the deepest hatred could have inspired such a bloodthirsty oracle in the same breath with the most glowing Messianic hopes.

And that there was just cause for such resentment appears evident not only from the long hostility of the past and the cruel joy of Edom at the overthrow of Jerusalem, but also from the fact that the land was speedily overrun and occupied by the Edomites and other neighboring peoples after the downfall of the capital. One of the long and difficult tasks of the revival of Judah after the exile was the regaining of its land from these ancestral foes. Not till the Maccabean wars, when Judas the Hammer sacked the cities of Edom, even as Joab had done long before, did the Jews feel that the bitter account was squared. Who knows how much of the resentment felt against the Herods in the Roman period of Judah was due to their descent as Idumeans, or Edomites, from the detested race south of the Dead Sea?

3. THE MESSAGE OF OBADIAH.

In the light of what has been said it is easy to see in what spirit the prophet Obadiah approached the work of declaring his message. Of the man himself we know nothing. It is not even certain that the fall of Jerusalem was the immediate occasion of his oracle. It may have been some later but similar episode in the Persian period, when, as is probable, the city suffered and her enemies triumphed. But all things considered the date of 586 or soon thereafter best meets the situation.

The book has only the one theme. The message is "concerning Edom." Against the despised and hated dweller in the rocky land of the south a messenger utters among the nations a word of threat and a summons to war. But no height of mountain fastnesses, no strength of rock-hewn cities, can save Edom from its deserved fate. It shall be plundered beyond even the devastation of robbers, or the closest gathering of autumn grapes. The allies in which the men of Edom have trusted shall turn against them. They can count on no help (1-7).

Even the boasted wisdom of Edom, which has become a proverb in the world, shall prove unavailing, and the warriors, whose fame has been heralded far and near, shall be overcome. And all this because of the brutal and unfraternal conduct of Edom toward Judah. For in the day of Jerusalem's distress the Edomites offered no aid to their kinsmen, but ranged themselves with the enemy. They assisted in the sack of the city; they carried off what they could of its treasure, they stationed themselves along the trails to intercept the refugees, and either sell them into slavery or deliver them back into the hands of the Babylonians, and on the very mount of Jehovah they held their drunken orgies in celebration of the city's fall (8-14, 16).

But a day of retribution is coming upon Edom, and all the other nations that shared in Judah's discomfiture. The city that is now waste and desolation shall be rebuilt and shall reassert its sway over Edom. In that day the house of Jacob shall be like a fire and Edom stubble for the flame. And the Jews of the south shall possess Edom, while those of the west dwell in the land of the Philistines, and all other foes of Judah shall likewise give way before the wave of victory which shall proclaim Judah's return to power (15-21.)

With such hopes of restoration and of vengeance upon the foes of Zion the prophet sought to encourage the souls of his people, stricken almost to the death by the terrible tragedy of the downfall of the Holy City. In a measure these dreams came true, though it was a far later generation that witnessed their fulfillment. But though their realization was only partial, and Judah's plans took another curve than the mere chastisement of Edom, the oracle was not without the value of encouragement in one of the darkest days of the nation's life. And that it met the needs of the people in that and later days is proved by its survival through centuries that witnessed the destruction of so much of ancient Israel's literature. And it is the quality of efficiency that gives survival value to any piece of literature.

FUTURE STUDIES.

The title of Section XXXII will be "Ezekiel in Babylon," and of XXXIV, "The Shepherd of the Exiles."

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES.

Topic Aug. 6: Lessons from Great Lives. VIII. Job 6:1-11; 42:1-6. (Consecration Meeting.)

Of course Job is the man of patience, so we have heard from time immemorial. But as a matter of fact was he not a man of great impatience? Did he not feel the injustice of his suffering? Did he not magnify his troubles? He said they were "heavier than the sands of the sea." They affected him as if he bore about in his body poisoned arrows sent from God. Yea, "the terrors of God do set themselves in array against me." Hear his prayer,

"Even that it would please God to crush me;
That he would loose his hand and cut me off!"

Does not Job's virtue lie in his loyalty to God? Hear him comfort himself in the midst of his affliction:

"And be it still my consolation,
Yea, let me exult in pain that spareth not,
That I have not denied the words of the Holy One."

While, therefore, he felt the injustice of the suffering through which he was called upon to pass, he remained true to Jehovah. His faith stood the most extreme test known in Jewish experience. He was made to suffer unjustly, and that too at the hands of the God whom he worshipped. Still he trusted him. His worship was not, therefore, for selfish purposes, but because of an unshaken faith in Jehovah as the true God. At the close of his experience when he was made familiar with the purposes of Jehovah, he saw his own foolishness and he said,

"But now mine eyes seeth thee:
Wherefore I abhor myself,
And repent in dust and ashes."

The interesting thing about the experiences of Job is that it is so like our own. Ours may be different in kind, they are, and even less in degree or intensity, but all the same real and similar. It is not an uncommon thing to find people today who are disposed to rebel at real or imaginary injustices which either they or their friends must pass through. The foolish thing is that they should set themselves up as judges of justice and righteousness when with the dull eyes of mortals they can only see a few of the facts. He who would be a just judge must have all the facts which enter into the situation. In the very nature of the case we cannot know them. Instead of uttering foolish words of protest we might profit by the other action of Job who consoled himself that in his trial and hardship he denied not the words of the Holy One.

Our crosses may consist in a bodily affliction as did Job's, or it may consist in the false statement of people about the kind of life we are living. Moreover it may be in the form of a self-denial for the sake of the fulfilment of your life purpose, your Christian ideal, but to endure it and to remain true to Jehovah as did Job means certain victory for us just as it did in the experience of Job. This is the big thing for us to learn. Through long suffering and loyalty, victory came to Job. Through struggle and suffering it came also to Christ; to his apostles; to his disciples in the early and later days. It will come also to us if we are faithful.

boys have since been added—a rich heritage for any man.

It was with great fear and trembling that I anticipated speaking for the first time through an interpreter, but the actual experience was not so trying as the anticipation. Mr. Nills Devold, who last year attended our Anglo-American Conference in London, acted as interpreter, and he did exceedingly well. Mr. Devold also very kindly acted as my host during the great portion of my stay in Norway, and showed me some of the delights of Christiana. I preached for our people in Christiana and also at Fredrikstat.

We have about fifteen churches in Norway, with a total membership of something over a thousand. They have had many difficulties to face, and have not surmounted all of them yet, but they have accomplished much, and hope still to make progress. The free churches are very much in the minority, the largest one, the Free Lutheran, having only about 10,000 members. The Methodists follow with about 8,000, and the Baptists with 3,000. The Baptists in Sweden have over 50,000, but their cause seems not to have prospered so well in Norway. Both the Methodists and Baptists receive financial assistance from their sister churches in America. We are not the only people who expend mission funds in Christian lands.

I was very much interested in a convention which I attended at Christiana. It was a Pentecostal gathering, consisting of those who are advocating a special theory concerning the fruits of Pentecost, including speaking with tongues. Topics that were considered, however, were varied, and by invitation of the leader, I spoke at one session on Christian Union. There were many professed tongue talkers present at some of the sessions and they caused no little disturbance by their uncanny shrieks and their incoherent utterances. I talked with some of them. One woman confessed that she did not know what she was saying, and admitted that there was no one so far as she knew who could interpret it. On my asking her what was the good of speaking in tongues if that was the case, she said Jesus understood. My thought was that Jesus could understand any language, and that therefore it seems scarcely worth while to work a miracle to enable anyone to speak in an unknown tongue. Some of the leaders of the movement seemed to fear that the matter might go too far, and that the "gift" may be abused. One of them reminded his hearers, and especially those who were the loudest in their utterances, that noise was not power, but a nuisance. "Some of us," he said, "have not lived in a blacksmith's shop, as some of you evidently have—our ear-drums are not used to such shriekings." This particular speaker professed to speak in tongues, but he said he nearly always used it in private, and seldom, if ever, in public. I remarked to him afterwards that his remarks were most sane, but that I doubted whether he would produce many tongue talkers by means of such sound advice.

The Norwegian character lends itself very readily to a movement which appeals to the emotions, and to manifestations of an enthusiastic character. I had always supposed before that it was people in southern lands only whose emotions were easily touched, but certainly the people of this northland are most impressionable. They are most warm hearted and cordial, and make delightful hosts.

I saw many things in Norway which revealed to me the source of many American customs and ideas: their home life; the houses in which they live and the manner of serving meals, all revealing the fact that Scandinavia has made its contribution to American life. The Norwegians seem to be universally good cooks, and their fish is especially fine. Of their fish pudding, what can I say? Do not ask me to describe it. I met several young ladies who wanted to come to England, and I told them straight way that I could get them anything that they liked from housemaid to matrimony if they could guarantee that they could make Norwegian fish puddings. I believe several of them have already commenced their cooking lessons.

One thing that impressed me in both Denmark and Norway was the comparatively even plane upon which every one seemed to live. There was no display of riches or poverty. Every one seemed to be busy. No one seemed to be idle, either because of not being able to get anything to do, nor because of not having to do anything. One misses the height of perfection which great wealth in certain countries has been able to bring the material things of life, and yet if the poverty of the masses is the result of this, the price is certainly too high to pay. It will be a sad day for Scandinavia for the rich to become richer if it means that the poor are to become poorer. Let us hope before that takes place that social reform will have discovered some means of prevention rather than having to devote all its energies to the best means of cure.

It was a pleasant trip, and I greatly enjoyed it, but here I am at home again in merry England, as glad to be back as when I returned two years ago from my native land.

Prayer as a Form of Service

Have we not need to learn and remember and practice the truth that there is no work so dignified, so fruitful, so abiding, as the serious effort and activity of prayer? Few things are sadder than a fair dead body when the soul is gone. And it is possible, all too plainly possible, to carry on the routine and decencies of a religion when the soul, the living soul, has fled. Settle it in your minds, then that there is nothing so needed in an age like ours as determined withdrawal of the soul from the clamor of the world and the work of life, into the secret presence-chamber, where we learn our own weakness, and gain experimental certainty of the strength of God. Settle it in your minds that what your prayers may want—from the pressing demands of business—what your prayers may want in length they must gain in intensity. Settle it in your minds that you must work in time, but the scope of your inward vision must be—indeed, it must be—eternity.—Canon Knox Little.

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

E. M. Norton is in a tent meeting at Potomac.

At Mt. Pulaski, where Gilbert Jones is pastor, there were three confessions July 9.

The pastor of Latham Church, Clifford S. Weaver, delivered an address July 4 in his home town.

E. W. Akemon, who has been pastor at Harrisburg, has concluded his ministry there and moved to Indiana.

W. B. Slater, pastor of Moline Church, conducted the services in Memorial Church, Rock Island, on a recent Sunday, during the absence of the pastor, E. T. McFarland.

Edgar D. Jones, of First Church, Bloomington, preached and lectured at the Eureka Chautauqua on the closing day of the season. Mr. Jones and family are to spend their vacation in Kentucky.

W. J. Burner, missionary of Buenos Ayres, South America, spent last Sunday at University Church at Champaign. Mr. Burner is supported by the women of this congregation. His visit, therefore, was an unusual pleasure to the church.

Adam K. Adcock, of Carbondale, has accepted the pastorate at Du Quoin to succeed George W. Wise. His pastorate will begin the first of September. Mr. Adcock has done a splendid work at Carbondale, and is leaving with the regret of his people.

Augusta Church, where Edwin T. Cornelius is minister, is building a substantial addition to its edifice, which will be dedicated in October. Evangelist F. A. Sword will be in charge of the dedicatory services, and will follow with a revival meeting to last for several weeks.

Long Point Church, under the ministry of Rochester Irwin, is achieving excellent results. The interior of the edifice is being redecorated and otherwise improved, and the men and boys of the Sunday-school are planning to cement and furnish the basement for Sunday-school rooms.

First Church, Springfield, will lay the corner stone of the new building, Tuesday, August 1. Finis Idleman, of Central Church, Des Moines, will deliver the address. The stone will be laid by the Masons, with Most Worshipful Grandmaster A. B. Ashley of Decatur, in charge.

Normal Church, of which J. H. Gilliland recently became pastor, has purchased a new site for the proposed new building. The location is central, and was purchased at a cost of $3,000. The congregation is contemplating the erection of a structure to cost not less than $25,000. Of this amount, one-half has already been raised.

Arthur Church is fortunate in securing H. H. Peters, of Eureka, for one-half time preaching. He began work July 1. This does not mean that Mr. Peters is to relinquish his duties in connection with Eureka College. The campaign for endowment will not cease. The committee having this in charge, together with Mr. Peters, are making a determined effort to round up the full $125,000 by September 1.

Bowen Church will have a meeting in January, conducted by Evangelist Sword. The church here, under the ministry of W. A. Taylor, is engaging actively in missions, and the Sunday-school is advancing beyond any record of recent years.

First Church at Charleston has recently purchased a fine modern seven-room house for a parsonage, which will be ready for occupancy September 1, at which time John McD. Horne, of Des Moines, will begin his work with the church. Mr. Brown, the retiring pastor, preached his farewell sermons last Sunday. After a month's vacation, he will assume the pastorate of Austin Church, Chicago. The congregations in Charleston are taxing the capacity of the house, and there have been frequent additions.

During the month of August, Walter Scott Priest, pastor at Wichita, Kansas, will spend a part of his vacation at Normal. Mr. Priest has declined a number of invitations recently to dedicate churches. He will have the months of August and September free for this purpose, and will be glad to enter into negotiations with churches desiring such service. The compensation received will not be used by himself, but will be turned into the treasury of the Lawrence, Kansas, Church, to be applied on its building debt.

News Editorials

REACHING THE CROWD.

Carmi Church and its pastor, L. A. Chapman, are coöperating with the other churches and preachers of the city in holding street meetings Saturday evenings. The ministers are rotating in conducting the services. The music is led by a cornetist and a male quartette. This is a practical movement to reach the people. Many a man will hear the gospel on the street who will not hear it in the church. The streets of most cities and towns are thronged with people on Saturday evening so that an experiment like this might well be tried in many places. One cannot help wondering if Jesus, or his Apostles, would not find an opportunity to deliver a serious message to many of the large concourses of people in our day. Peter delivered his Pentecostal message to a crowd of people probably not much more than curiosity seekers. Paul went uninvited to deliver his message on Mars Hill because he knew a company of people would be there to hear him. On the other hand, it is noteworthy that when Jesus was surrounded by a great multitude of people, he went up on the hillside, and when his Disciples had come unto him he sat down and preached to them alone, "The Sermon on the Mount." So there is excellent precedent for the preacher who goes to the multitude, as well as for the one who quietly and faithfully seeks to train a few for the serious duties of Christian living. Whichever of these two seems the ideal one, there is danger perhaps in both.

The man who chooses the quieter and less public method will very often sacrifice opportunities to wield an extensive influence on the multitude with a sober but passionate message for righteousness. And his very example of modesty and quietness may deprive his followers of that assertiveness and initiative, without which the advance of the kingdom of God will be slow. An exclusiveness may develop that is devoid of evangelistic passion and missionary enterprise.

On the other hand, the minister who seeks the crowd may become so enamored of the crowd that the individual becomes of little significance, and that the real passion for saving a man shall be lost in his eagerness to save a crowd. The invitation which is responded to by only one individual will disappoint when fifty are expected. It is hard for the preacher accustomed to hear a score of converts witness the good confession in chorus, to have any considerable emotional thrill from hearing a single voice express faith in Jesus Christ. The man who preaches to the throng constantly, ought to pray that the throng shall be broken up into separate individuals in his own consciousness. The message which he delivers will be more truly the gospel message if this is achieved, and his own personal conduct will be less imperiled. It may be seriously questioned, if he ought not to hear the confession of every individual convert, instead of the chorus confession—this for the sake of the minister as much as for converts. The preacher who is impelled to address large congregations all the while is not to be condemned on account of mistakes so much as prayed for. The large crowd has dangers for the preacher as well as for the layman. To the layman there may come irresponsibility, while to the preacher there comes responsibility of a new sort. Before, the preacher was responsible for his own integrity and the deliverance of a message at once sincere and true. But when he has become the minister of the crowd, there has come the new necessity for gripping and holding the crowd. Here is the danger—that his ideal may be lowered, his message attenuated, less serious, and more pleasing. This is the constant temptation to fasten his grip more securely on the multitude.

Many a young man just entering the ministry looks forward to the glorious time when hundreds and even thousands of people will sit with rapt attention before his pulpit. Every young man whose face is fixed toward such a future should be careful lest, when such good fortune approaches, he may weaken in the presence of its mighty temptations. Let there be no ungenerous thought of the minister who, in faith and love, ministers to the few, but let all pray that there may always be those who are great enough and true enough to reach the multitude, without themselves falling prey to the ensnarements attendant upon the ministry of great influence.

Chicago

A. C. Fegart, superintendent of the evangelistic department of the Chicago Christian Endeavor union, is leading that department into larger fields of usefulness. He proposes to begin a systematic effort to reach 100,000 souls for Christ in a year. All Endeavor societies are urged to cooperate. Personal work, street meetings, shop meetings, are mans to this end.

E. E. Faris, of Texas Christian University, is taking work at the University of Chicago this summer. Mr. Faris will minister to the church at Waukegan while here.

Open air evening services are proving fruitful at Evanston. At a recent service O. F. Jordan, pastor, presented a stereopticon lecture on "Christian Work Among Immigrants." The neighborhood surrounding the church is becoming interested in these services.

The slogan for our city work this year is $3,200. All offerings for home and city missions will be credited to our city work, excluding the two thousand dollars the A. C. M. S. already places here. The churches have been apportioned and many have raised the needed amount.

The United Charities of Chicago is making an appeal to our churches to assist them in arranging for the children of the tenement district a week's visit in the country. In past years nearly 3,000 have been treated to this "midsummer country week." For more information write: Summer Outing Department, United Charities, 167 North LaSalle St., Chicago.

Chicago will have a prominent place in the program of our next state convention to be held at Danville, Ill., Sept. 4-7. Hitherto our city has been overlooked, but it is now being recognized as a most strategic and important field. O. F. Jordan, superintendent of city missions, and Will F. Shaw, Sheffield avenue, will present the city work before the convention.

VAUGHAN DABNEY.

Illinois Secretarys' Letter

Bro. Geo. F. Duffy, of McLean, began his new work at New Boston, July 16.

Z. M. Brubeck, of Lawndale, in Logan County, could engage to preach for some church within reach half time. Write him.

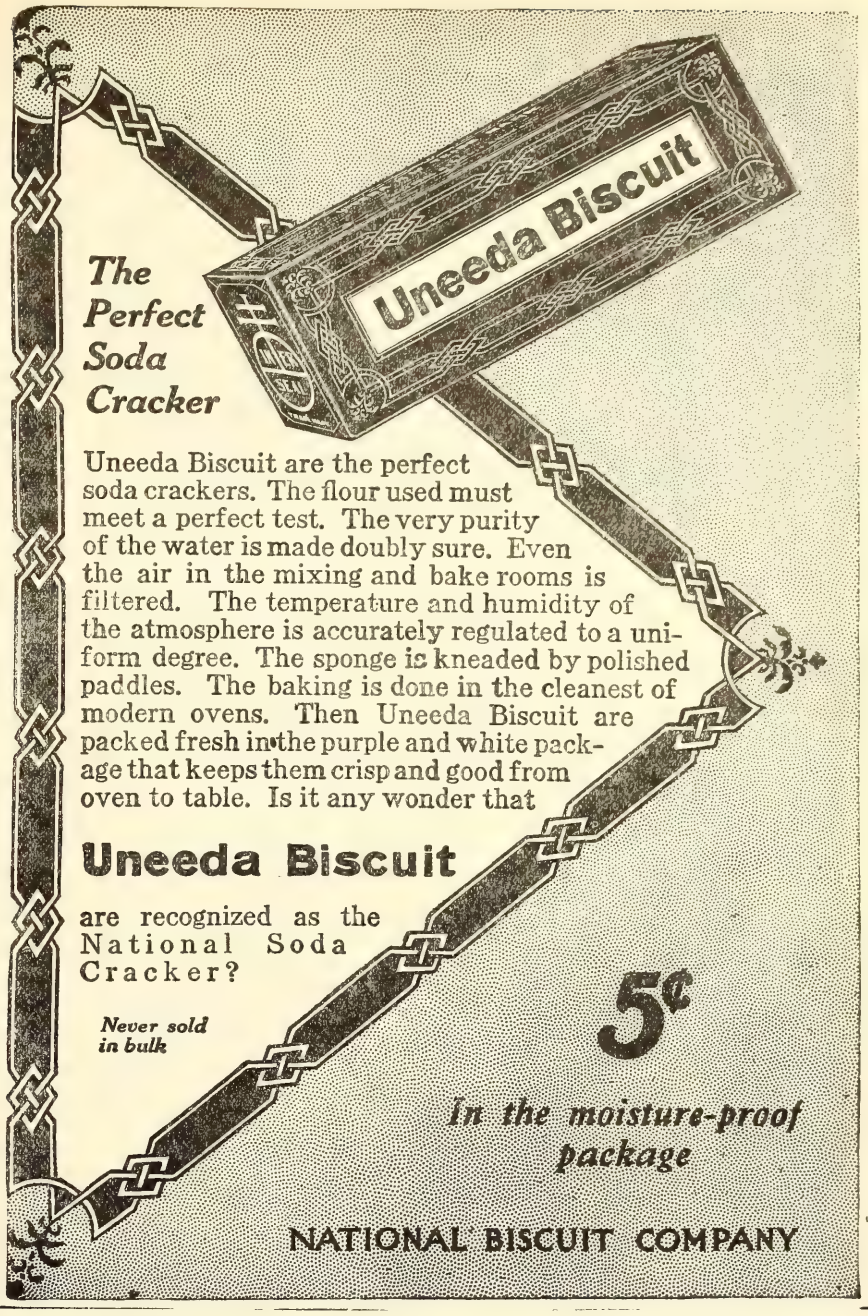
C. R. Piety, Hillsboro, desires to attend Eureka this fall and will do so if he can secure half time preaching within reach. Write him.

Encouraging words are coming in concerning the state convention at Danville, Sept. 4-7. Get ready to enjoy a great time. Send your preacher and his good wife, and a large delegation. Urge the business men and church officers to go. It will give them a new vision.

A brother said to us recently: "I think you are too liberal in sending out stamped envelopes in your correspondence. I have four or five ahead now, and I know of other preachers who have as many." He evidently did not think out the logical conclusion before he spoke thus. It means that he and the "others" have not answered our letters promptly and we had to write again and again before they answered. That is why the stamped envelopes have accumulated in his pigeon hole. Prompt replies would save our society a good many dollars in a year.

Evangelists are very active at this time of year making their dates for revival work this fall and winter. Churches, likewise, are looking out for the right men to hold their meetings. It is well to make your arrangements early and thus have time to make thorough preparations for the meeting. That is important.

The recent drinking cup law in this state has the effect of calling attention to the more sanitary individual cup in the communion service. Whether the law covers this case or not it certainly gives the church a very broad hint, to say the least.



Uneeda Biscuit
The Perfect Soda Cracker
Uneeda Biscuit are the perfect soda crackers. The flour used must meet a perfect test. The very purity of the water is made doubly sure. Even the air in the mixing and bake rooms is filtered. The temperature and humidity of the atmosphere is accurately regulated to a uniform degree. The sponge is kneaded by polished paddles. The baking is done in the cleanest of modern ovens. Kansas Disciples will hold their annual meeting this year at Parsons, October 2-5.

John A. Armstrong has resigned at Felicity, Ohio, and will take the work at Mogadore.

D. F. Stafford has closed his work at Watkinsville, Cal., to accept a call to Covina.

D. F. Cross, for the past two years minister at Turon, Ind., has begun his new work at Greensburg, Ind.

L. L. Shaw, who resigned at Raton, N. M., to accept a call to Beaver, Okla., began his work at the latter place on June 25.

After a pastorate of eleven years, J. A. Longston will close his work at Independence, Kans., August 1.

The congregation at Nowata, Kans., will erect a new edifice in the near future at a cost of $12,000.

J. R. Middleton, for seven years pastor at Lewis, Kans., will close his work there this month.

Work on the new church at Bloomfield, Ind., is progressing rapidly and the corner stone will be laid in the near future.

G. H. Steed, pastor of Central Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., has resigned and will continue his university work.

A meeting will begin August 1, at Douglass, Kans. The pastor, S. E. Hendrickson, will be assisted by Lawrence Wright of Des Moines, Iowa.

I. G. Shaw, pastor of Central Church, Newport, Ky., has presented his resignation to his congregation. It has not yet been accepted.

R. W. Stancill has accepted the pastorate at Hartsville, Ind., and will begin his work there immediately. This church has been without a pastor for some time.

Charles E. McVay, who is now in a meeting at Haigler, Neb., will assist George H. Nicol in a meeting at Red Oak, Ia., later in the year.

A. R. Adams, pastor of First Church, Saginaw, Mich., will deliver a number of lectures in northern Michigan this summer on the subject of "Christian Union."

The work in Akron, Ohio, continues to grow encouragingly. Two more sites have been purchased recently and when buildings are erected Akron will then have six churches.

The annual meeting of the Tipton (Ind.) County churches will be held August 6. A. B. Philputt, pastor of Central Church, Indianapolis, Ind., will be the principal speaker.

Disciples of Stark County, Ohio, will hold their annual gathering on August 1, at Myers Lake, near Canton. I. J. Cahill will give the principal address.

W. L. Barbee has completed his third year as pastor of First Church, Rockville, Ind., and has received the unanimous call of his congregation to remain with them another year.

The church at Columbus, Kan., has accepted the proposition of R. A. Long to give one-fourth of the cost of a new church building to cost not less than $40,000. Mr. Long was a member of this church while a resident of Columbus.

C. A. Cole, pastor at Abilene, Kans., gives an encouraging report of the work there. The prayer-meeting services are well attended and the Sunday-school has the largest average attendance in the history of the church.

W. H. Hampton, pastor at Liberty, Ind., has received the unanimous call of his congregation to remain another year. Mr. Hampton's pastorate has been very successful, there having been a number of accessions to the membership in the past year.

The new church at Orangeburg, Ky., was dedicated on July 9. The pastor, E. L. Miley, was assisted by T. P. Degman, of Springdale, Ky., and W. T. Brooks, of Ladoga, Ind. The indebtedness remaining on the building amounting to over four thousand dollars, was provided for.

Broad Street Church, Akron, Ohio, where Lloyd H. Miller ministers, has sold its property and purchased a much more desirable site. A new building will soon be erected, modern in every particular, and when completed will be one of the best equipped churches in Akron.

The annual County meeting of the Christian churches of Tipton County, Indiana, will be held in Carr's Grove, near Hobb's Station, on the Indiana Union traction line the first Sunday in August. The following churches are represented in the fellowship of this meeting: Tipton, Windfall, Normanda, Independence, East Union, New Lancaster, the Chapel, Nevada, Kempton, Hobbs, and Curtisville. Preaching services will be held in the grove at 10:30 a. m. and 3 p. m. Allen B. Philputt, minister of Central Church, Indianapolis, will be the preacher of the day. A most cordial invitation is extended to the brethren of neighboring counties to join in the fellowship of this meeting.

E. J. Fenstermacher of Bowling Green, Ky., has been called to the pastorate at Elizabethtown, Ky., to succeed D. W. Scott.

First Church, Lafayette, Ind., is preparing for a series of evangelistic services to be held next September. Herbert L. Yeuell will have charge of the meeting.

Earle Wilfley, pastor of the Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., was elected a trustee of the United Society of Christian Endeavor at the recent convention at Atlantic City. He also delivered one of the principal evening addresses and presided at the Disciples' Rally.

George B. Stewart of Colorado Springs, Colo., has received a call to Jackson Street Church, Muncie, Ind., this pulpit having been made vacant by the resignation of William H. Allen, who has accepted a pastorate in Melbourne, Australia. It is not known as yet whether or not Mr. Stewart will accept the call.

E. B. Wakefield, of Chagrin Falls, Ohio, reports a good attendance of Disciples at Chautauqua this year, the Sunday service being largely attended. Mr. Wakefield, Herbert L. Willett and Miner Lee Bates have so far been the morning speakers. The Disciple headquarters are under the care of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Ford.

The Disciple Sunday-schools of Indianapolis will have charge of the school at Bethany Park on August 6. Every effort will be made to make the school a model of modern methods in graded work, and each department will be in charge of an expert. These will be picked specialists from the fifteen churches of the city, and the Bethany Assembly management has designated this date as "Indianapolis Day," since the major portion of the attendance is expected to come from that place, owing to the interest and enthusiasm being worked up by the arrangement. However, it will be a great chance for the officers and teachers of the state to observe this remarkable gathering engaged in the new order of things.

The following good report is from M. E. Chatley, pastor at Centerville, Ia.: "The Centerville Church has secured the services of J. Earl Morton as music director and financial secretary. For awhile, at least, he will give his entire time to the work of the church. Until recently, he was with the Emmons Evangelistic Co. as leader of song. The Methodist and Disciple churches have united in Sunday evening services on the court house lawn, during July and August. An audience of several hundred has attended these open-air services so far. We have just sent in our last contribution in redemption of our pledges to the foreign and state work. It has been a blessing to the Centerville church to assume the support of Mrs. R. D. McCoy at Tokyo, Japan, and of L. P. Kopp at Ft. Dodge, Iowa.

Leslie Wolfe writes from Manila, P. I., as follows: "Sunday, May 2, we dedicated the new chapel at Wawa in Cavite Province, making the second dedicated since January 1 and the tenth since I took charge of this district (Tagalog Provinces) two and a half years ago. This is a small structure of nipa and bamboo, the cheapest materials. Humble as it is, it represents much devotion and self-denial on the part of the little band of disciples there. It was beautiful to see the pride and rapturous joy the brethren took in their new church home. Many brethren came from neighboring churches, including several evangelists who spoke at their best. The fatted pig was killed and roasted. A rich feast for both soul and body was enjoyed. It was a most happy occasion, a high tide of good cheer and sweet Christian fellowship."

The China mission sends word that the number of our Chinese Christians has passed the one thousand mark. We now have one thousand and twenty-five.

Seventy-eight baptisms are reported at Monieka, Africa. This church is only two years old and has never had a resident missionary. The missionaries visit the station about every three months. The work is in charge of a native evangelist. The Monieka congregation has sent out and supports sixty native evangelists of its own.

J. C. Ogden, on the Tibetan border, writes as follows: "We think at times that the people here will get tired of us, and our teaching, and look for the crowds to drop off, but it seems to be the opposite. Today the chapel room was filled long before time to begin service, and I believe we had the largest crowd at regular service since the movement began December 19, 1909. The crowded house was silent as death while the lesson was given, and we pray that the seed sown today may spring up and grow.

Rose T. Armbruster writes from Akita, Japan, as follows: "Twice a month a group of neighborhood women come to my house for a Bible lesson. Among them is a dear old grandmother in her eighty-third year. She is expecting to receive baptism as soon as some one else is ready, for she is timid and does not want to be the only one to be baptized at that time. Last Saturday she brought a friend, just the same age as herself, to the meeting, that she, too, might learn the way of life."

IN FIFTY-TWO LESSONS

By Dr. Loa Ermina Scott

A NEW TEXT BOOK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'S AND ADULT BIBLE CLASSES

This book comes nearer meeting ALL the demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions—all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportion. It is the product of experience. Dr. Scott is teacher of a successful Sunday-school class in the Disciples' Church, at Chagrin Falls, Ohio. She has been developing this book for years. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

INTRODUCTION BY PROFESSOR E. B. WAKEFIELD OF HIRAM COLLEGE

"In her home congregation Dr. Scott sought in an unpretentious and resolute way to work out her ideal. With such opportunity as has been given her, her work has never been surpassed. For years she has held the largest and most interested class that her community has ever known; and to this very hour the solid interest has grown.

"If her published lessons will only extend her work and help to get more of real Bible teaching into our congregations, they will most surely bless the world."—PROFESSOR E. B. WAKEFIELD, of Hiram College, in the Introduction.

WORDS OF PRAISE.

I know of no book on the subject so admirably adapted to its purpose.—J. H. GOLDNER, Euclid Ave. Church, Cleveland.

I shall take pleasure in introducing the work to my next class in the Life of Christ and in commending it to others.—F. W. BURNHAM, First Church, Springfield, Ill.

It contains just the kind of work we ought to be doing in our Young People's and Adult classes.—O. W. LAWRENCE, Central Church, Decatur, Ill.

Her unusual ability and her practical experience have helped her to meet the new and growing demand for just such a course of study,—HARRIS R. COOLEY, Cleveland.

Its arrangement is excellent. Its choice of material remarkable—as much for what is omitted as for the rich material included. The questions at end of each of the fifty-two lessons reveal the teacher.—JOHN R. EWERS, East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa.

The beauty of the book is that it is an outline and cannot be used apart from the gospels themselves.—A. W. FORTUNE, Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati.

These fifty-two lessons may well serve as a training coures, and as such, the book is superior to any I have seen.—PERRY J. RICE, El Paso, Tex.

Studies in Social Reform
And What to Do

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one man to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the two years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature.

Beginning Next October.

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that have ever been offered to Sunday Schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Look at These Live Subjects for the Fall Quarter!

DANGEROUS AND UNSANITARY OCCUPATIONS AND CONDITIONS.

OCTOBER: Accidents
1. Christ's Valuation of Life.
2. Our Increasing Number of Accidents.
3. The Reduction of Accidents in Foreign Countries.
4. What We Should Do.
5. Employers' Liability.

NOVEMBER: Sanitation and Hygiene.
1. Health a Christian Duty.
2. Unsanitary Occupations.
3. Sanitary Legislation.
4. Housing and Sanitation.

DECEMBER: Tuberculosis.
1. The Tuberculosis Crusade.
2. Economic Causes of Tuberculosis.
3. The Need of Education.
4. What the Church Can Do.
5. Review of the Progress of the Kingdom During the Year.

These lessons are published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to see the work start off in the autumn with zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these classes in the study of Social Reform.

Send 5c in stamps for a single copy of the magazine. Do it now and begin at once to talk up the new program for the Fall Quarter! Address,

Enforced Inconsistencies

There are conditions that compel us to be religiously inconsistent.. We are hedged in between law and love, so that if we construe the letter strictly we fail in generosity. Or if we love much and are generous in our judgments we let down the bars of the law. We frame rigid dogmas and pronounce them absolute, and immediately allow that other views may have some weight. Statesmanship is a happy accommodation to circumstances amidst conflicting principles. Art presents its most vivid lessons in violent contrasts, and literature could not live if logic were its rule. The gospel according to John has been pronounced the greatest book in the world, and the truest, but also the most contradictory, literally interpreted.

Our denominationalism has its enforced inconsistencies. Strickly speaking, if one denomination is right all the others must be wrong. Yet the denomination that arrogates to itself such pink-of-perfection righteousness gets itself branded for bigotry, and boycotted into bankruptcy. The result is that each growing and virile body of Christians esteems itself relatively right, and all the others relatively a little off. That means that we are all in the same boat, each viewing himself with an especially satisfied eye, and looking slightly cornerwise at his neighbors.

Take a few examples of denominational inconsistency.

The Baptists hold to believer's baptism exclusively, and to immersion as the form of it. They make that the door into the Baptist church. Consistently they make the church identical with the circle of immersed believers, and they place the communion table within that circle. Consistently they should not admit that anyone outside of that circle is Christian. But there they break down, and admit the real rebirth, and Christian character and hope of milions of the unimmersed. They allow that these unimmersed Christly millions are good enough to be going straight to heaven but not fit to go into the Baptist fold!

Calvinism is a mathematically rigid doctrine, and all not Calvinists must be, therefore, heretical and subject to the "anathema sit." Yet Calvinism looks Arminianism in the face and concedes the Christliness of its devotees. Practically it revises its articles before the Synod meets.

Loyal Methodists insist on a mystical conversion; regeneration with fixed geography and chronology, and absolute and sudden reversal of character. Yet not half of those good people ever experience anything of the kind, and they allow that myriads outside their fold have been somehow regenerated without it.

We ourselves are akin to the Baptists in our insistence on adult immersion as baptism. We go a step further and make baptism a factor in the process of conversion, coupling it with faith and repentance as conditions of forgiveness. Logically we should, even more rigidly than the Baptists, exclude the unimmersed as un-Christian. We have made immersion the door, the initiatory rite into the church. Consistently with this we have placed our list of members, our roll of the redeemed, within this circle of the immersed. Inconsistently we have set our communion table outside of it.

How did we happen to fix the line of our inconsistency just at that point? Thomas Campbell had a repugnance to close communion. That grew out of his experience. Also, he felt compelled to recognize the Christianity of the unimmersed. Over the line therefore he carried the communion table, setting it just outside. He justified his inconsistency by saying, "It is the Lord's table, not ours, and we are not to be the judges of the communicant's fitness. We leave that with him and his Lord." Mr. Campbell's inconsistency was both emotional and compulsory. There is no logical or Scriptural justification for it. He made a path and we have worn it to a rut; we have traveled in it ever since his day.

It is the compulsory feature of this inconsistency that should interest us just at this junction in our history. We, too, are under compulsion. Scripturally we are compelled to immerse. Practically we are compelled to recognize the Christianity of the unimmersed. We are compelled to be inconsistent—that is the point.

But why keep the rut of our inconsistency forever on the same side of the road? Why not change over, and make a new path? Have we not as good a right as the Campbells, and others of our fathers? Why not carry our church roll out and lay it on the communion table, and whenever a really pious unimmersed one partakes of the bread and wine with us allow him to write his name by the side of ours? Since we are compelled to be inconsistent perhaps it is no sin. It may even turn out to be a holy inconsistency, broad, and brotherly, and full of love.

Besides, would not a practical, a really workable, up-to-date, inconsistency, be more advisable than a purely traditional one?

In a closing word let us thank the Lord for the gift of such a soul as that of Thomas Campbell, large enough to be repelled by bigotry, and wise enough to be inconsistent under fraternal compulsion. And let us thank the Lord for his inconsistency, since it is a precedent for further practical adjustments of a similar sort.

That Biggest Sunday School

The claim that Brazil, Ind., has the largest Sunday-school in the world has caused much questioning, because the city has only 10,000 inhabitants, and there are several other churches, with their Sunday-schools. A correspondent of the Religious Telescope makes the following statement regarding the matter:

"The First Methodist Church of that city has published through the local papers that it has the largest Sunday-school in the world, claiming an enrollment of five thousand members, equal to fifty per cent of the whole population of the city. The same church claims to have a Bible class of men numbering twelve hundred, forty less than one-half of the votes cast at a ward election held in the city May 29, 1911, to see whether the city should remain dry or return to the curse of all curses, the saloon. There were 2,444 votes cast, being forty-four more than twice the number of the men enrolled in the Bible class. The vote for the city to remain dry was 866, being 334 less than a number of Bible students. The wets had a majority of 713, carrying every ward in the city but one, which went dry by fourteen votes. To the casual observer, this is most astounding for a city of ten thousand inhabitants, with a Sunday-school of five thousand members, a class of men studying the Bible numbering 1,200, and eight other churches with respectable Sunday-schools. Certainly there is something radically wrong in the ethics of Brazil.

"The big Sunday-school may have five thousand names enrolled, the accumulation of years, many of whom have died. Others have moved away, many have dropped out and do not attend Sunday-school anywhere, while there are quite a number who consented to be enrolled under the persistent importunities of the solicitors, who never have attended nor expect to attend. The published attendance ranges from eight to thirteen hundred, except on Easter, which was a special rally day, when they reported 2,100 on that day, with an offering of over $2,500, the superintendent giving one-half of the entire collection. The school takes no part in the county Sunday-school association.

"As the largest Bible class in the world, it is of mushroom growth, and is an accumulation of names gathered within a radius of twelve miles of the city, many giving their names through courtesy to the solicitors or as a matter of business. The largest reported attendance was at a banquet given in the basement of the Methodist church recently, when three hundred were present."

Ten Weeks for Ten Cents

In order to introduce The Christian Century into new homes the publishers propose to send the paper ten weeks for ten cents,

Beginning With the Issue of September 21.

Names for this offer must be sent in before September 15. These trial subscriptions will be positively discontinued at the expiration of the ten weeks unless ordered continued by the subscriber.

We expect to gather a list of several thousand names for this period. One subscriber to whom the plan was explained declared that he had ten dollars to spend on that proposition and would send us the names of 100 persons whom he wishes to become acquainted with The Christian Century and its vital message. Others will send smaller lists; still others, perhaps, larger lists. This is on behalf of their paper. Let every present subscriber think over the names of the fellow-members of his church and his friends and make up a list. A good set of names would be your Sunday School teachers and officers and your board of elders and deacons. If your pastor is not now a reader be sure that he is not overlooked. We Believe Every Reader Will Send in at Least One Name.

BEGIN NOW TO MAKE UP YOUR LIST

Send it in at once. Use separate sheet or sheets of paper for your names. Put your own name at the top as the sender. Keep a duplicate copy of your list. Be sure to make addresses plain. Remittance must accompany all lists.

Licensing Laymen to Preach

The Reformed Church in America has taken the lead in authorizing classis, which are the district authorities, to license laymen to preach, to speak, and even to have charge of churches. So far as known, no classis has as yet exercised its new power, but it is said that permission to do so was granted unanimously by the church, and that there is strong inclination on the part of laymen to exercise the right.

Six years ago the Episcopal Church much increased the authority of laymen in spiritual affairs, especially in the right of bishops to license them to take part in the public services with ordained men, and in the delivering of religious addresses. While not specifically authorized, many laymen in dioceses in the west, where clergy are not plentiful, have been placed in charge of churches.

Among Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist laymen there is a movement to train men of parts to make public religious addresses after the manner generally followed in England among both the Established and the Free Churches. Any desire to substitute laymen for ordained men is disclaimed, but the points aimed at are a vast increase in the number of sermons preached, and the development of laymen through giving them something to do.

The laymen to be licensed by the Reformed Church are not those who devote their whole time, and are supported by congregations, but business and professional men who support themselves, and do not contemplate entering upon clerical careers.

G. Campbell Morgan's New Venture

The Rev. G. Campbell Morgan of London, well known in this country, who comes to America this autumn for a series of evangelistic and Bible conferences in a dozen principal cities, has founded in England a Summer Conference on Northfield lines, and has established a Bible Study Movement of national scope. Quitting America seven years ago, Mr. Morgan took up work at Westminster Chapel, which is located in the West End, but which was, at the time Mr. Morgan went there, an almost hopeless proposition. Little remained but a great building.

Mr. Morgan has transformed conditions, until now Westminster Chapel is the centre of a great congregational life. So vast is it that the need of larger facilities is apparent, and steps are under consideration to secure them. The new national work is that of sending into other cities of the kingdom Bible teachers of the first rank, Mr. Morgan going himself as much as his London work permits. In summer the new conference, held at Mundesley in Norfolk, and coming to be known as the Mundesley Conference, is the center of the Bible work. Mundesley is Mr. Morgan's summer home, and like Dwight L. Moody, he turned his acres into a summer headquarters for Bible and missionary instruction.

Now it is proposed, so reports from Mundesley and London just to hand indicate, to perfect what will be, in effect, a college whose faculty has headquarters at Westminster and Mundesley, but whose work is the training of leaders in Bible and evangelistic work in many cities of England. It is said to be Mr. Morgan's ambition to leave, as his life's benefaction, this Bible college in permanent form, having a home in the historic Westminster section of London. Mr. Morgan's tour in the United States will begin in October.

Christian Endeavorers' New Plans

Following its convention at Atlantic City, at which for the first time in the history of Christian Endeavor a President of the United States spoke, Endeavorers will enter upon three or four vigorous campaigns. The longest, and as they admit the hardest, may prove to be a saloonless American nation on the 4th of July, 1920, the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth.

Another project to be taken up by Endeavorers is the holding of one or more conferences of leaders in young people's society, Sunday-school and missionary work to see if some of the duplication of effort, and especially some of the friction that admittedly obtains at present, cannot give place to co-operation and co-ordination.

Three other projects are: 1. To secure the appointment by the National Council of Congregationalists, of a Christian Endeavor committee in sympathy with Endeavor plans to increase the number of societies and their usefulness in that religious body. 2. To take hold of the situation in college towns, and if possible to adapt the local churches to students' ways, and through Endeavor secure a better relation than usually obtains between churches and students. And 3. Increasing Endeavor efficiency in the churches of the Negro race in the South. To this end the presidents of all Endeavor Unions in the South were placed upon a co-operating committee.

By its size, its earnestness, its recent achievements, and its practical plans for immediate work ahead, the Atlantic City convention proved, it is shown, that the Christian movement is more virile, and has a larger hold upon young people of the churches, than ever before.

Federation Versus Organic Union

Is federation a means of preventing the union of the churches and of saving denominationalism? Even if the promoters of federation have no desire for union they may be unconsciously working for it. Having stood side by side in fights against vice and political corruption, men will learn to magnify their common faith and to minimize their differences. They will discover that what is good in their denomination does not have to be given up for the sake of union. Federation may and ought to receive the endorsement of those who look for something better than federation. This is the opinion of the Presbyterian Advance which it states as follows:

> A favorite argument of those who are opposed to the organic union of Protestant churches is that all that is accomplished by organic union could also be accomplished by federation, and that federation is much easier of attainment. It is probably true that it is easier to secure general consent to some scheme of federation than it is to a plan for union, for federation does not involve the giving up of name and separate organization; but is it true that we can ever hope to secure satisfactory results through federation? Can we ever hope for the same hearty co-operation through federation as can be secured by organic union. To bring about federation will amount to little unless it is an effective federation which will prevent that kind of ecclesiastical competition which is so distressingly prevalent. Can such competition be prevented so successfully through federation as through union? Experience says, No. As the Christian Guardian remarks, "It is clear that intimate co-operation with foreign bodies requires a more delicate mutual regard than does the co-operation of organic union." This, indeed, is clear to any one who stops to think. For really effective co-operation, organic union is about the only hope. Nevertheless, let us do the best we can with federation when only that is possible.

Ventilate the Church

Every preacher knows he is often robbed of his power by the janitor who will not let in the fresh air, or by the building committee that made no adequate provision for ventilating the church. The church ought to preach the gospel of health and it ought to practice what it preaches. If the minister observes tuberculosis Sunday, he ought to preach to people whose health is not endangered by coming to church. Dr. Frank E. Wing, superintendent of the Chicago Tuberculosis Institute, writes:

> Churches are notorious for their poor ventilation. Churches, as do all other indoor meeting places, help spread the disease. It is fortunate that the sessions in churches are as short as they are.
> The danger of contagion in a room filled for only a short period is not serious. But I would like to see church architects pay more attention to ventilation and possibly less to decoration.
> Churchmen generally do not realize how serious a problem tuberculosis is to them. I believe it is one of the most vital things the church has to consider. Without a doubt it is responsible for the deaths of nearly 10 per cent of church members. When the ministers fully wake up to the devastation this disease is creating in their churches I believe they will recognize the need for education from the pulpit.

Social Survey

An Unsavory Political Object Lesson

Wonder is not infrequently expressed that so many well-educated and public-spirited young men decline to "go in for" politics. In a democracy where every man may enter the game, with a fair chance to succeed, it is remarkable that politics attracts so few of the thousands of young men who annually are graduated from institutions of higher learning. That they are not assuming the duties and enjoying the advantages which political life affords is patent to any one who observes the average political convention. Yet in politics may be found excitement, discipline, companionship. There are opportunities to be useful. There is possible hope of preferment and of promotion to positions of real power. Why is it, then, that so many of these first-rate young fellows are unwilling to take a share of office-holding and to do their part in administering the public affairs? One reason, at least, may be discovered by wading through the solid pages of testimony given before the committee on elections now investigating the charges against Senator Lorimer. If the Illinois senator is innocent, the young man would be apt to say: "Look at that! Do you suppose I want to be compelled to endure such persecution?" If Mr. Lorimer be guilty of bribery, either direct or by proxy, the young man of high motives would say, as he ought to say: "If in order to be a senator I am obliged to become a criminal, I will never dabble even in shallows of the filthy pool of politics." And if he should read the testimony of the governor of the great state of Illinois, he would be almost sure to remark: "Not for me, thank you! I can help my fellow-men in church. I can earn an honest living in my store. I can serve my country by keeping out of jail, and by voting right, and by membership in a reform club or service in a municipal voters' league. But, I tell you, I will never stoop so low as to plot behind barred doors, to pull wires, to offer 'jobs' as bribes for support, and to do a hundred selfish, underhanded, near-conspiracy things, such as any high-minded man would be ashamed to do in business. No, sir, please count me out of the game if I must take part in such a vulgar scramble as that described by the governor, who, you say, is an honest politician." If politics is to be merely a series of petty, underhanded, undignified combinations, together with continual office-mongering, no wonder that the best young men, in too large a degree, refuse to soil their hands with such dirty business. Yet if this clean stream cannot be induced to flow into the miry pool, how withal shall the germ-laden waters of politics be purified? There is a great opportunity open to young men of clean morals and high ideals if they can only be grouped for effective action, but the scandalous condition of the situation makes it difficult to convince them of duty and possible service.

In Great Britain

It is customary to say that nobody is in London at this time of the year. Evidently this season is an exception, for something appears to be happening every day during this memorable summer. The last public vestiges of the coronation festivities have been removed, and now King George and Queen Mary are visiting different parts of the islands over which they rule. The emotional Irish seem to have discovered—or some of them have, at least—after the royal visit across the channel, that the king does not have horns and hoofs. The Welsh, too, are pleased with another glimpse of that pageantry of the middle ages. On July 13 the young Prince of Wales was invested with the insignia of his office. The ceremony took place in the old castle in the quaint little town of Carnarvon, in Wales. It is announced that the young prince, following the precedent of his grandfather, is to make a tour around the world this fall, and that in the course of his travels he will visit the United States. Surprise is expressed in some quarters that Lord Kitchener has been appointed as "financial adviser" of Great Britain, in Egypt, as successor to the late Sir Eldon Gorst. Hitherto Britain has always been represented in Egypt by a civilian. On July 20 the house of lords passed the third reading of the veto bill. There appears to be little doubt that the upper house eventually will be obliged to adopt the whole measure, which means little else than the relegation of the lords to a comparatively powerless position. If the veto bill, even with some amendments now proposed, shall become the law of the kingdom, the house of commons will be the all-powerful element in the government of the British Empire, thus marking another significant advance in the extension of democracy. The commons will attempt to reject the amendments made to the bill by the lords, for, as was stated in the debate, on July 20, these amendments so change the bill as to cause it to bear no resemblance to the measure originally passed by the commons. If the lords stand firm, in this last struggle to maintain the prestige of the upper chamber, then there is reason to believe that the Liberals will demand the appointment of a sufficient number of Liberal peers so that the proposed curtailment of the power of the house of lords eventually may be secured. It is announced that the names of the prospective peers have already been listed, and the king has agreed to appoint them if the necessity arises. Such a plan appears to Americans a clumsy and archaic method to secure the progressive legislation which democratic Britishers are insisting upon. In order to diminish the power of the lords, it seems to say, something like 500 more lords are to be created. Such a course may become necessary, but most political prophets declare that rather than see the upper chamber so cheapened, as they believe would be the case by the admission of such a flood of young peers selected from the sons of present peers, from members of parliament and from other classes, after making a noisy and lachrymose protest, the lords will surrender. Before The Century reaches all its readers the matter will have reached the critical stage, for at the latter part of the week the lords will once more have the bill before them and probably shorn of its amendments. The best opinion in London appears to regard the eventual passage of this strikingly revolutionary measure as a foregone conclusion.

At the Center of Things

If only a sufficiently large number of people would move away from Chicago to the northern Pacific Coast, and others would refuse to go to Texas, strange as it may seem, Chicago might be nearer the center of population of the United States. Steadily the center of population has moved westward, between the thirty-ninth and fortieth parallels of latitude. In 1790 it was east of Baltimore; it crossed in 1830 into what is now West Virginia. In 1860 Ohio could claim that it was at the center of things American, the decade between 1850 and 1860 having witnessed a widespread westward movement of people, the population center in this period moving eighty-one miles. In 1890 "westward the star of empire" had moved so fast that it was shining into Indiana. The latest statement of the census bureau now names a pin-point on the map of Indiana, four and a half miles south of Unionville, Monroe County, to be specific, as the place where, if every person in the United States were balanced on a plate, the support must be placed. If the present rate of migration westward is maintained, the center of population in 1930 will be in the vicinity of Effingham, Ill. The establishment of the interesting fact of centrality is, of course, determined by purely abstract calculations, and town lots in Unionville will remain at the price quoted week before last, notwithstanding its new claim to fame and its proximity to the University of Indiana. The fact is chiefly useful, if really useful at all, in that it indicates the trend of population of the United States, and ought to prove more suggestive to writers upon sociological topics than to missionary boards. The latter are fully aware of the migrations of the people, that which they need is sufficient funds to follow the moving population with gospel privileges. The method by which the center of population is determined is thus described:

> A point is first assumed as nearly as possible to the true position of the center. Through this point a parallel and meridian are drawn. A north or south moment is the product of the population by its distance from the assumed parallel; an east or west moment is the product of the population by its distance from the assumed meridian. . . . The population of the country was then grouped by square degrees, that is, by areas included between consecutive parallels and meridians, as they are convenient units with which to work. The population of the principal cities was then deducted from that of their square degrees and treated separately. Then the population of each square degree was assumed to be at its geographical center, except in cases where this was manifestly an incorrect assumption. In these cases its position was estimated as nearly as possible. The population of each square degree and of each city north and south of the assumed parallel was multiplied by its distance from that parallel and the sum of the north and of the south moments made up. Their difference, divided by the total population of the country, gave a correction to the latitude, the sign of the correction being positive if north, negative if south.

Over two million dollars a year income has been provided for the University of Illinois. The state legislature has appropriated $3,519,300 for the use of the university the next two years and has provided a mill tax in the future. The latter will yield about $2,225,000.

The Religious Values of Trades-Unionism.

The prophets made it plain for all time that the religion of men who practiced injustice was a lie and that God refused to honor the worship of such men. Every movement in the direction of justice to all will receive the blessing of the church if the church knows its mission. That men err in their efforts to secure equal rights for all does not justify religious leaders in standing on the side of the oppressor. It is religious to protect motherhood and childhood, to secure a living wage, shorter hours of labor, sanitary surroundings, and the means of education and culture for all. The trades-unions have been struggling for many of the things for which the church is praying. That their methods have sometimes been imperfect and rough is all the more reason why the church should have their confidence and give them honest help. Writing in the Continent on the religious value of trades-unionism, W. Nat Friend says:

The church has preached and prayed for relationship among men that would give every man a chance to have hours of leisure and days of rest and means of self-respecting living among his fellows. It has looked for and urged the establishment of agencies that would help to bring these things about. When we have discovered an organization that is successfully struggling, though often roughly and imperfectly, to accomplish some of these results, shall we not give attestation to its religious value to society, and help by all in our power to increase the efficiency of such uplifting principles as it puts into practical use?

You, whose zeal eats itself up in doing good to your down-trodden fellow-man, whose ambition as a Christian is to care for the widow and orphan and defend the helpless, look now into the inside pocket of your coat and see if the union label is there. You answer that it is not. Do you know what that means? Well, for one thing it means that you cannot be sure that some poor, starving widow in the sweatshops in New York has not dragged out miserable, hacking hours of a never-ending day putting your clothes together for a pittance that does not begin to feed her or the babes in the squalid back room of a lightless tenement.

However veiled these processes seem to be they certainly do suggest things pleasing to the great heart of the Master. If there is mischance and envy and selfishness at work along with them, then all the more should they who love the best strive to help make that best the most prominent and interesting and worth while to those to whom this opportunity for service belongs.

Think of the blessings of the shorter hours and the living wage and the sanitary conditions of work that they have secured for all workers. Think of the safety to the consumer as well as the worker that the union label on his goods insures. One does not have to worry about sweatshop or death trap or underfed and worn-out women.

I know that there are grievous mistakes made and violence sometimes spreads its accidental appearance so large that we get lost in doubts. But in all the vast, strange struggle there is a manifest making toward those best methods for which the church has been calling so long. It is not only the forward look of the men but the forward encouragement of the Christian that is needed. They are on the way. Just beyond lies the victory.

Where the Church Has No Rival.

Much of the work that used to be done by the church is now entrusted to other institutions. For this reason, it is sometimes said that the church is no longer needed. It is the contention of Professor Simon N. Patten that if the church becomes an ethical institution its work can be and will be passed over to other institutions, but if the church remains a religious institution it can have no rival. His meaning will be made clear by the following selections from an article in the Independent:

On its ethical side, Christianity has been a success, but it does not follow from this that the Church of today should become an ethical institution. The Church is not the one organ of Christianity, as it was in the first century. It is now one of many Christian institutions, each of which had its origin in the mother Church, but which now has an independent organization, makes its special appeal, and would persist even if the organized Church disappeared. If the Church deserts its religious platform, it will gradually become merged in the social institutions that have ethical progress for their end. The school would be the place where morality is taught; the university would increasingly become the standard bearer of culture; the family would enforce and elevate the law of love; the state would protect from aggression and extend international law. All these institutions have been devised by Christian nations to uphold and extend ethical ideals. Christianity is a force, not an institution; it will continue to thrive so long as any group of institutions exist to make it effective.

The Church has and can have no rival if it keeps its religious program in the foreground. The new birth, regeneration, social justice and an impulsive opposition to oppression have a common thought and a common remedy. This thought is that men tend to sink below their maximum ability, and need supermaterial motives to arouse their full powers. Progress looks to something beyond man to which it wishes to elevate him. A superman is its goal and increase of knowledge is a means to this end. Religion, on the contrary, evokes what is in man by bringing him into contact with spiritual as well as material forces. The new birth manifests itself not in knowledge but in activity, and thus brings every part of man into an effective co-ordination.

Shall the People or the Church Go?

The church has quit waiting for the heathen to be converted and has gone out to convert them. But is it going to the people at home? It erects its house of worship and it sends out its invitation. Many people do not know they are invited. Not a few are of the opinion that they are not expected and not desired. The commission Jesus gave to his church was to carry on the work he had begun. "That work," says the Outlook, "was to feed the hungry, teach the ignorant, comfort the sorrowing, succor and save the sinful. If the church would follow the example of its Master, it must study human nature, understand human needs, and minister to those needs, whatever they are, either by its own direct activity or by inspiring the ministering activities in other organizations." On the duty of the church to go where men are, the Outlook says:

There are multitudes of poor in our great cities to whom the Church might well preach glad tidings by carrying a message of cheer to them where they are. It is no great wonder if they do not come to wealthy churches in aristocratic neighborhoods, filled by well-dressed and sometimes over-dressed congregations, to see if the Church has good tidings for them. The men who proclaimed liberty to the slave in America, whether they were in the Church or out of the Church, were doing the work which Christ declared he came to do, and which he commissioned his Church to carry on in his name and on his behalf. Some of the social settlements are fulfilling Christ's mission better than some of the Christian churches. In our judgment, the social settlement would fulfill its mission still more effectively if it did so in the name of the Christ who set the example and who inspires the spirit. To build a handsome church, put it in a wealthy section of the city, and open it three or four hours a week, is not to imitate the example of Christ; nor is it to fulfill the mission of him who said, "As the Father hath sent me into the world, so send I you into the world." We submit to ministers and churches, to councils and conferences, as a legitimate subject for discussion, in lieu of the oft-debated question, Why do not people go to Church? the more important but less debated question, Why do not the churches go to the people?

Congregational

Statesmanship Needed in the Churches.

The city of Lowell, Mass., has a population of 106,294. Of these 85,000 are of foreign parentage. From 60,000 to 65,000 of the foreigners are Roman Catholics, 7,000 to 8,000 are Greek Orthodox, and 3,000 are Jews. The Protestants, native and foreign born, number between 30,000 and 35,000. Fifteen Catholic churches serve the Catholic population of the city. The Protestants have fifty churches and missions for their 30,000 or 35,000 people. On this situation the Congregationalist and Christian World remarks:

The Protestant forces in Lowell, while contending manfully and with some measure of success against tremendous difficulties, and while accomplishing a work for which we would give them full credit, seem to us, nevertheless, operating on a basis suited rather to the Lowell of sixty years ago than to the Lowell of today. Fifty churches and missions are too many for a Protestant population of perhaps 30,000, not more than four or five thousand of whom are found at any one time in the sanctuaries.

Under these circumstances what is the duty of the Lowell churches as representatives of the faith and the program of our Lord Jesus Christ in the world? Do they wish chiefly to perpetuate all existing organizations and alignments, or can the hundred thousand dollars annually expended through their organization, and the brains and consecration to be found among the twelve thousand professing Christians be utilized to bring a more powerful impact upon the cosmopolitan population.

Lowell's problem is duplicated essentially, if not in detail, in hundreds of other American communities. The solution in every case will depend upon the measure of patience, good will and Christian statesmanship which the churches concerned can bring to bear upon the situation. The situation is not met when one church or several formulate and carry out their plans independently, no matter how brave and energetic they may be. It is not met when co-operation is confined to relatively minor matters. It is only met when each church, grasping the thought of the reality of God's kingdom upon the earth, and looking upon itself simply as a means to an end, and falling into line with its sister churches, stands ready to assume any burden or make any sacrifice, even unto laying down life itself for the welfare of those in behalf of whom the church exists.

Jesus as a Guest in the Homes of Others

The guest has been one of the great teachers of mankind. Many a youthful heart has been stirred by the words of the visitor to the frontier cabin. The pioneer preacher took Christ to the homes in which he was entertained. The best that comes to some homes where culture is supposed to be found is brought by visiting friends who know the things that abide.

The guest has been a destroyer as well as a builder. The coarse, bad-mannered preacher, who expects his every whim to be gratified, is an enemy of the gospel of Christ wherever he is entertained. If those who have received into their home the singing evangelist are not loud in their praises of his solos, they may have good and sufficient reasons for doubting that he is singing the gospel. Women have been known to deliver "powerful" lectures on temperance, and then show themselves very irritable creatures to their hostesses.

The home of a friend should be to us a place of rest and peace. We ought not to carry into it the anxieties of business and of social strife. Yet it is a place of moral stimulus. We may there discuss our affairs, but the method of approach is different and the result is quieting rather than distracting. The lessons of our successes and our failures are impressed upon us and we return to our homes and our work refreshed and with a firmer hold upon the deeper realities of life.

We do not serve others best when we go to their homes as missionaries of culture and religion. We ought to add something to the culture and faith of all we meet; this we shall do best if we think of others as our friends. In the intercourse of true friendship whatever of true culture and religion we have will be made evident in the most favorable way. Chautauqua audiences are sometimes bored by lecturers who announce themselves as "prophets of the new era." Nearly everybody is willing to have the world made better, but the average man does not take seriously one who knows all about the new era and travels around to tell simple-minded people what to expect. In like manner we have our doubts about the man who announces that he expects to lead us to repentance and good works. We object to being reformed by the conscious reformer. But a friend is allowed to talk plainly on morals and religion.

Jesus was known as the friend of sinners. This means that he was the friend of all men. And while he had a mission and knew exactly what it was and never lost sight of it, his ability to treat human beings and to awaken in them feelings of their own worth must have been the distinguishing characteristic of his ministry. The Pharisee denounced the outcast. Jesus drew the outcast to him and spoke words of hope. While others were bound by the conventionalities of society and the technicalities of religion, Jesus spoke from the heart the word that was needed and did the deed demanded by justice and mercy.

The moral and religious standards of a home were raised when Jesus came to it as a guest. The reproach of his enemies, that he ate with outcasts and sinners, was a reproach of ignorance and spiritual imbecility. The Pharisee, like many of us, had so feeble a hold upon the life of faith and righteousness that he had to be always on his guard lest he should lose all the religion he had. The religion of Jesus was of the positive sort. It grew stronger by contact with the common life. When he touched others, they were lifted. The Pharisee feared that he would be pulled down if he lived on friendly terms with sinners. He did not have strength of character to fix the conditions on which he could live familiarly with bad people.

Jesus went where he was needed. We are apt to thing well of ourselves because we go frequently where we are well entertained. We make our boast of the fine homes in which we have received a welcome. The Master did not shun the homes of the so-called better classes. But he was drawn by phyisical and spiritual destitution. Zacchæus the publican was doubtless not the only man in Jericho who was anxious to have Jesus as a guest; it was at the house of Zacchæus that a conspicuous service could be rendered, consequently Jesus chose the publican to be his host. The disciple may not be conspicuous for his interest in the forsaken and lonely and the spiritually wrecked, true discipleship is not ostentatious, but the observant will discover him where there is misery and sin. [Midweek Service, Aug. 9. Matt. 8:14-17; Mark 2:14-17; Luke 7: 36-50; 10:38-42; 14:1-24; John 2:1-11.] S. J.

Going Behind the Returns

A communication from Dr. George Sitherwood, found on another page, discloses a clear understanding of the contradiction inherent in the Disciples' present treatment of other Christian bodies. This layman sees perfectly well what is slowly dawning upon many ministers that the practice of Christian union involves in no sense a compromise of our convictions with respect to immersion-baptism or the change of our present practice in that ordinance.

He sees that it is plainly practicable to receive into fellowship all Christians whom Christ has received into his church and at the same time practice no form of initiation into the church except immersion. He sees that to refuse to receive a member of the church of Christ into our fellowship makes us sectarians and nullifies our plea for unity. The prevailing method of treating candidates who present church letters is essentially sectarian.

"It does not coincide with the true spirit of Christian unity to go behind the returns," says Dr. Sitherwood. A letter from a church of Christ commending to the love and care of a sister church any Christian person ought to be received at its face value by any church of Christ to which it is presented. Not to do so is to act on the very essential principle of sectarianism. It is to divide Christ's body.

Yet every Disciple minister must confess that it is his custom to accept letters from some churches of Christ at their face value and to treat letters from other churches of Christ as totally worthless. If a candidate for fellowship comes forward bearing a letter from a Baptist church or a Disciple church he is received heartily into membership by the formality of the "right hand of fellowship." But if the candidate bears a letter from a Presbyterian church, the minister whispers the impertinent question, "Were you baptized by immersion?" If the answer is yes, the right hand of fellowship is extended.

But if the candidate answers no, he is asked to make a confession of faith in Christ and to be rebaptized before he can be received into fellowship. In other words, this minister and his church assume to treat this fellow-Christian, a full member of the church of Christ, as if he were not a Christian but an outsider coming for the first time to accept the Saviour.

The presentation of letters by persons who were not baptized by immersion is largely controlled by the minister in private conference, to be sure, and embarrassing instances in public services are not frequent. But the procedure is no less sectarian because it is private and informal. It is an affront to a sister church of Christ. It is an injustice to the Christian person bearing the letter, and it is a piece of unconscious arrogance on the part of minister and church precisely similar to that of our Southern Baptist brethren when they disallow any but immersed persons to partake of the Lord's Supper.

Close communion and close-membership are perfectly analogous. Every argument against one applies against the other. Not one good reason can be given for forbidding any follower of Christ eating and drinking the sacred emblems. Not one good reason can be given for forbidding full and complete fellowship to any true member of the church of Christ who desires it.

Not until the churches of Disciples frankly admit that Presbyterian and Methodist and Congregational churches are churches of Christ, and joyfully render all the courtesies implied in such admission, will their plea for unity be taken seriously in the Christian world.

And one of the most elemental of these courtesies is that a letter from one of these churches is entitled to receive the same consideration and respect as is given to a letter from any other church of Christ.

Religious Education vs. Opening Exercises

Our St. Louis neighbor, the Christian Evangelist, gives evidence of being determined to stem the senseless eddy of reaction against the graded lesson principle. We admire the stern way in which it contends that the Sunday-school does not exist for the sake of "opening exercises" but for the sake of religious education. In an editorial recently these stout and strengthening words were used:

The quiet period of growth and development has been succeeded by the period of spectacular demonstration and exploitation. This period has about reached its close.

Christian educators in universities, seminaries, colleges, homes, everywhere, are becoming more thoroughly alive to the fundamental importance of Sunday-school instruction than has been true at any earlier time. The opportunities which the Sunday-school affords for instruction in righteousness have been largely disregarded by those who ought to have been foremost in establishing its highest interests and widest usefulness. Teacher-training has been left mainly to publishing house exploitation and commercial enterprise. The Sunday-school has not been conducted as an educational institution. It has been a weekly rally. Sometimes it has been conducted as if it were a kind of baby show, where great numbers of little tots were held in squirming discomfort for the inspiration of their elders. It has in fact been almost anything but a real educational institution, where the interests of God in Christ in men have received the attention of educators of first ability.

The traditional organization of the Sunday-school prevents educational work rather than helps it. Opening and closing exercises which have characterized the Sunday-school in the past would not be tolerated for one moment in any other educational institution; the teaching period has been subordinated to the convenience of secretaries and school officers and of careless teachers. These and similar customs are not at all a discredit to those who, by means of them, were doing the best they knew how, but they are an appalling shame to educational leaders who heretofore have made no use of the splendid possibilities which the modern Sunday-school presents for educational work of the highest spiritual and religious value.

The Motive of Missions

The following remarks from a sermon by Professor James Denney published in the British Weekly are very appropriate at the present time:

"The motives to mission work—in other words, to preaching the gospel—can never be found in a command as such. * * * It is the passion of Jesus alone that evokes a responsive passion in sinful hearts. * * * If Christ the propitiation has been revealed to us as the power of God to save, then we have something in our hearts that lifts us above the need of commands and makes secondary motives unreal. The only motives worth considering in this region are the irresistible motives. We get nothing until we get men who say, 'We cannot but speak. Necessity is laid upon us. We are debtors. Whether we be beside ourselves, it is to God; or whether we be sober, it is for your cause; for the love of Christ constraineth us. Having, therefore, obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great.' I repeat, what we want is not missionaries, in the narrower sense, but evangelists—not a new interest in the non-Christian world, but a new interest in the gospel; not men who want to preach to the heathen, but men who cannot but preach where they are. That is the stock from which alone the missionary force can be recruited—the men and women in whom all emotions and motives are swallowed up in the sense of what they owe to the Redeemer. Let us pray and preach for the multiplication of such men if we would help the mission cause. Redeemed and devoted lives will solve all our problems, and nothing less will touch them. The appeals which have been made so long in vain will not be vain when the old doxology breaks again irresistibly and spontaneously from the Church's lips—unto him that loveth us and loosed us from our sins by his blood be the glory and the dominion forever and ever. That is the praise which knows instinctively that Christ is the heir of the world. It is of him and of his Church that it thinks when it sings that ancient psalm of the kingdom and its King. 'There shall be an handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon; and they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth. His name shall endure forever; his name shall be continued as long as the sun; and men shall be blessed in him; all nations shall call him blessed.' Amen."

Foreign Missions Victorious Among Disciples

The annual national assemblage of the Disciples of Christ was held in Portland, Oregon. It has been heretofore an October event in the religious world, but this year it becomes a July occasion. Held in a section where Disciple churches are not numerous, the gathering was by no means as largely attended as its predecessors in such convenient centers as Pittsburgh and Topeka, but it was rated in Portland as the largest church convention ever held there.

Just prior to this convention, the Disciple body had undergone a vehement and acrimonious contention over the policy of its foreign mission society in endorsing the union of the Disciples with Presbyterians and Methodists in the new university of Nanking, China. The Christian Standard of Cincinnati denounced this action as contrary to the principles taught by the founders of the denomination, in that it proposed joint action with missionaries not immersed. It was also argued that the mission society was disloyal in supporting certain missionaries known to be willing to receive into their foreign mission churches, without rebaptism, converts who have been baptized by sprinkling in other missions. On these charges The Standard undertook to induce local congregations to withhold foreign mission collections, and it was at one time feared that the society would be so desperately crippled that some of its missionaries would have to be recalled. However, the more liberal element of the denomination rallied so strongly in the society's behalf, under the lead of The Christian Evangelist of St. Louis and The Christian Century of Chicago, that at the close of the year the contributions from churches and Sunday-schools were actually $1,300 in excess of the year before, and danger of retrenchment was averted.

The society itself meanwhile issued a statement saying that it did propose to join other churches in educational work, but would not appoint any missionary who was willing to receive to membership an unimmersed convert. Indeed the society went further and promised to recall any missionary who was discovered to be wavering at this point. There are hints abroad that if this latter promise was literally carried out, it would bring home from the foreign field a large proportion of the society's strongest missionaries; and a large element among Disciples in America is deeply dissatisfied with this item of announced policy. Nevertheless, such minor matters were waived, and at Portland there was general rejoicing because the foreign mission activities of the church had been victorious over this bigoted attack.—The Continent (Presbyterian).

For Unity and World Service

At the recent convention of Disciples of Christ in Portland, Ore., a noteworthy feature was the report of the commission on Christian Union appointed last year at Topeka. The chairman, Dr. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore—who last year described for our readers the aims of the commission—announced that together with eight other communions, the Disciples had agreed to join in the World Conference on Christian Union to be held some time within the next five or six years. A striking example of the leading Disciples' attitude toward this great problem appeared in the words of Dr. W. B. Craig of New York: "There is a bigger question before the churches of America than any mere question of polity. The fate and future of Christianity is to be decided in America. It is the most critical period in the history of the church. I am not a pessimist; I am an optimist facing facts. The spirit of sectarianism is dead in New York. Being a Presbyterian or a Methodist or a Disciple has nothing to do with church attendance there; the people go where there is some man who can reveal the heart of God to them. Sin is whipping the churches in the great cities. Union alone can save the church in America." In addition to their special work for the ending of denominationalism, the Disciples of Christ are becoming an aggressive missionary body and are increasing their benevolences. At present they are engaged on a million dollar campaign to end with the formal opening of the Panama Canal. Their adult Bible classes are nearly a fourth of all those enrolled with the International Sunday School Association, and probably the only "endowed Sunday-school chair among American colleges" has been established by Disciples. With influential and aggressive laymen—like R. A. Long of Kansas City, whose benefactions, such as a million dollar gift to the Disciples' national hospital announced at Portland, have been many and generous—with more leaders of the ability and breadth of Dr. Ainslie, Prof. H. L. Willett of Chicago, and an able corps of denominational officials and a devoted rank and file, the Disciples have every reason to be optimists.—The Congregationalist.

From a Methodist Point of View

An Editorial on the Disciples' Plea in the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate

AN AMENDED PLEA.

Two years ago there was celebrated in this city the centennial of the beginning of a movement which has led to the organization into Christian societies throughout the country of those who call themselves Disciples of Christ. The fellowship of these societies is often referred to as the Disciple Church, or the Christian Church, though there is, in fact, no general organization which could be so designated. But the local organizations do recognize and co-operate with one another, and they have shown a spirit of unity among themselves and of zeal in propagating the Christian faith, as they interpret it, which has made them remarkably successful in multiplying their own numbers, and in establishing those educational, missionary and benevolent agencies which are characteristic of Christianity in earnest. Now, that feature of their propaganda by which the Disciples have coveted most to be known has been the appeal they have made from the first for Christian unity. Persistently, in season and out of season, they have pleaded with what they evidently regarded as convincing logic, if not moving eloquence, that all sectarian names and dogmas and polities be laid aside, and that all Christians unite upon the basis which they have proposed. But for the most part the plea has fallen upon deaf ears, so far as Christians in the other churches are concerned, though these were assumed to be guilty of perpetuating the deplored divisions, and were distinctly and often vehemently charged with being sectarians, and moreover ought to have been convicted and led to repentance, if the plea had been as logical and invincible as it seemed. That there was a flaw in the logic, an inconsistency in the appeal, was very early discovered, and has long been known to Christians in the various churches, and they have been content for the most part to keep on their course, and allow the Disciples to win as many as they could to their sect.

Emphasis on a Dogma.

In short, it seemed plain to discerning Christians in the denominations established when the Disciples began, that the Disciples themselves were putting a tremendous emphasis upon a dogma, and that dogma one of the less important teachings of the Christian faith; scarcely worthy, in fact, to be regarded as a dogma at all, but rather as one of those disputed points of doctrine not necessary to salvation or a wholesome spiritual life. An address in the centennial convention in this city pointed out what we have just stated, and called upon the Disciples to leave off their insistence upon immersion as the only mode of baptism. That address was pretty generally repudiated as an expression of the views of modern Disciples. But the spirit of Christian unity has been gaining power and recognition during the century since the Campbells began to preach their conception of it, and to seek in their way for its realization. Christians in the various churches have been drawing near to one another, and have been uniting in communion and council and service. Particularly is this true on the mission fields, where the things which divide the churches at home seem inconsequential. The Disciples of Christ have shown a commendable spirit of missionary enterprise, and their missionaries are in many foreign fields working alongside the missionaries of other Christian churches. There they have been brought face to face with the question of Christian fellowship in a very concrete and urgent form; and the situation is thus clearly described by "The Christian Century," an able and progressive journal of the Disciples, published in Chicago: "The missionaries of the Disciples of Christ, pleading with their Christian brethren of other names to unite, now find themselves in the anomalous position of being pleaded with to practice their own distinctive message!" Which is to say, they have been invited to unite with other Christians in those practical manifestations of courtesy and unity which are practiced by the other denominations.

Home and Mission Fields Not Unlike.

But the situation on the missionary field differs from the situation at home only in the matter of emphasis, as the "Century" frankly concedes in the following paragraph: "On the mission field the pivot on which unity turns is the principle of intercommunion, which includes not only the open celebration of the Lord's Supper, but a free interchange of members between church and church, by letter, on the basis of the recognized validity of the ordinances, ministry, membership and discipline of all participating churches. This, of course, is the pivot on which unity turns in the home field, too, only it is not so easy to see it here as there. There can be no unity without this free intercommunion."

Decision of Mission Society.

The Executive Committee of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society has recently decided against any such free inter-communion on the foreign field in this published declaration:

"The Executive Committee clearly and solemnly recognize their relation and responsibility as representatives and agents of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, and of the churches, Sunday-schools, Christian Endeavor societies, and other organizations and individuals co-operating through that Society. They know the constitution and history of the Society, and thoroughly understand and cordially approve the abiding purpose of its founders and supporters. They are familiar with the teaching and practice of the ministers and churches of the Disciples of Christ. No member of the Committee advocates or approves anything that contradicts or contravenes this well-known teaching and practice; nor does any one of them advocate or approve the reception or acknowledgement as members of our churches, either at home or abroad, of any persons except immersed, penitent believers in Christ. Furthermore, it is believed by the Committee that all missionaries appointed and supported by them are in sincere accord with this policy; and certainly they would not appoint, and indeed would recall, any one known to be not in such accord. They disclaim any right and disown any desire to do otherwise."

The "Christian Century," seeking to show that in making this statement the committee has not sufficiently considered the situation which confronts the Disciples in the modern Christian world, has so clearly pointed out the flaw in logic and inconsistency in appeal to which we referred above, that we can not forbear to quote at length a paragraph which only a clear-sighted, tremendously earnest Disciple could have written:

"The third fact which the Committee overlooked in affirming its policy is that there is a deep-rooted and rapidly spreading conviction among Disciples of Christ that both our historic plea and the demands of the age into which we have come call for the casting away of this one last survival of sectarianism in our practice—the practice of selecting from among Christ's followers only the immersed, and rejecting all others from our fellowship.

"There is no change of disposition with reference to the practice of immersion-baptism. No true Disciple considers for a moment the possibility of relegating immersion to an optional basis alongside of sprinkling and pouring. It is increasingly plain that the practice of Christian union calls for the practice of immersion only.

"But there is a wide-spread disillusionment with regard to the immersion DOGMA. The sanctions for this dogma are breaking down.

"The New Testament facts are against it.

"The spirit of Christianity is against it.

"The spirit of the age is against it.

"The vital, effective, triumphant movements of today ignore it.

"Not one great modern interpreter of the social ideals of Christianity has an ounce of interest in it.

"Not one great modern interpreter of the inner life of the soul has an ounce of interest in it.

"Not one great modern interpreter of missionary passion and the missionary enterprise has an ounce of interest in it.

"It would seem as if there is almost no exception to the rule that as an immersionist goes farther into the field of social or missionary service, or deeper into the spiritual mysteries of the soul of man, he loses interest in, if he does not develop a contempt for, the dogma of immersion.

"The immersion dogma is a sectarian obsession in which the big, sane-visioned men and women of the world, who are working at the world's real tasks—at Christ's real task—have no interest.

"So long as this dogma obsesses the mind of a Christian community, that community will not fling itself with complete abandon into the great brotherly enterprises that really carry the world up toward God. Such a community will be finical, hair-splitting, sectarian in temper, exclusive. It may gain adherents, but it will be too particular about technicalities to render its full meed of service. Its intake from the world may be worthy of boasting, but its output into the world will be an occasion of shame.

"Among Disciples the disillusionment has long since begun. A new spirit—a spirit of fraternity, of co-operation, of fellowship, of unity—is abroad in our hearts. This spirit is not to be inhibited by dogmatic considerations. It freely regards every Christian as a brother, and desires his fellowship, and is willing to give that fellowship through the 'right hand'!

"It is too late in the day for the Foreign Society to commit the Disciples of Christ to a policy of aloofness from our brethren in the mission fields because, forsooth, they have not been immersed! Disciples know that Christian character and membership in the Church of Christ is not limited to those who were immersed at baptism."

Immersion Not Changed.

It should be noted that the editor of the "Century" in proposing his amendment to the historic plea of the Disciples for unity does not abandon the equally historic contention of Campbell and his followers that immersion is the scriptural and only regular mode of baptism. But he proposes to relate this contention to the appeal in a very different way. In another editorial he takes the position that affusion-baptism is irregular, but not invalid. Methodists, Congregationalists and Presbyterians who have been baptized by this mode are none the less Christians. Disciples who carry the old logic to its apparent conclusion, and exclude from the church of Christ all who have not been immersed, are declared to be "non-representative brethren." How many of these "non-representative brethren" yet linger in the fold is an interesting but unanswered question. In stating his position, which he justly claims is involved in the recognition of other Christians as such, the editor says:

"Affusion-baptism is not invalid; it is not meaningless. By it men do become members of Christ's body, the church. By it believing and repentant men are buried with their Lord and rise with him to walk in a new life.

"Immersion is not the substance, the essence, of baptism. The substance of baptism is the candidate's self-consecration to Christ, and the church's recognition of him now as of the household of faith. The outward form marks and symbolizes this gracious spiritual reality . . .

"But the advocates of immersion must free their advocacy from the legalism which both the modern spirit and the New Testament abhor. No outward form gives validity to any act in our dealing with Almighty God. It is preposterous to take a position that disfranchises the great body of Christ's followers. We must not unchurch the church.

"On the other hand, because the validity of affusion-baptism is admitted is no reason why its irregularity should not be insisted upon, and finally corrected.

"But its correction can take place only within a united church as a result of unity, not in a divided church as a means to unity."

Willing to Face the Facts.

It is sincerely to be hoped that the Disciples generally will adopt the position of the "Century." However reluctant or unwilling Christians of other churches may be to admit that their baptism is even irregular; however much they may be disposed to regard the mode of baptism as a question of relatively small importance in the face of other issues before the Christian church; however complacent Methodists may be with their time-honored method of relegating the question of mode to the intelligence and conscience of the individual, there can not be any reasonable protest against an honest effort to show that immersion is the scriptural, historic mode of baptism. But there has been a very reasonable resentment against the attempt to read unimmersed Christians out of the church, on the one hand, and an amused indifference to the inconsistent appeal for unity, on the other. May the pen of Brother Morrison lose none of its keenness until he has caused his "non-representative brethren," whether they be many or few, to see the point of his contention, and to adopt his amendment!

A CONGREGATIONALIST AT THE PORTLAND CONVENTION

BY WILIAM E. BARTON

[EDITORS NOTE.—Dr. Barton, whose contributions often appear in The Christian Century, is a leading Chicago Congregationalist pastor. He was touring on the Pacific coast at the time of the Disciples' convention in Portland and writes interestingly to the Advance about three conventions he attended: The Disciples, the Seventh Day Baptists and the National Education Association. We give his impressions of the Disciples gathering.]

I am touring the Pacific Coast without any serious attempt to attend meetings; but already I have dropped in upon three great conventions, and they suggest some profitable comparisons.

The National Convention of the Disciples of Christ was in session in Portland, and I dropped in long enough to get the temper and spirit of their gathering. Their convention is not a delegate body. Some of their men told me they felt it ought to be so and were studying our National Council for an analogy. At present it is a mass meeting. Five thousand to eight thousand were said to be the numbers in attendance. They kept three churches filled with their simultaneous meetings. Their meeting is a very free parliament and the average age of their speakers is less than that of the average delegate to our National Council. Their method seems favorable to the bringing forward of young men, and yet I could readily pick out the men whose poise and confidence betokened experience in such gatherings.

Weak on Polity.

They do not seem to have many keen and careful students of polity. One undeniably wrong ruling went unrecognized, and when a vote was pending and the question was raised whether such a vote would be constitutional, no one present had a copy of the constitution. They went straight on and voted it, the chair merely warning them that if it should be found that this was unconstitutional, it would be void.

I was present when they adopted the report of their committee on resolutions. It was a kind of denominational platform for the year. They denounced intemperance, divorce and the white slave traffic; they went on record in favor of tithing and family worship, and these things were done without debate; one member merely rising to remind the brethren that those who voted for these resolutions ought themselves to have family worship in their own homes. Their debates were all on the minor resolutions. The great things they accepted without division.

Their View of Unanimity.

It was in this spirit and with this unanimity they went on record favoring closer relations with other bodies of Christians. I talked with some of their leading men, and am sure that to many of them that resolution represented a deep and earnest purpose. But I am equally sure that to others it was an empty and self-deceiving word.

I picked up copies of all the free literature that was about, including sample copies of their denominational papers. I did not see any copies of the Chicago paper, The Christian Century, which I know to be of a different temper than that to which I am about to refer. I brought away copies of the Standard, of Cincinnati. That, too, is in favor of union. But its attitude shows how little may be expected in the way of a spirit of union. Here is an article on "Action of Baptism," thrashing the old straw with as much ardor as if there could possibly be found in it a fresh kernel. And I bought several copies of the Christian Evangelist of St. Louis. It has an earnest editorial in answer to the question whether a converted heathen who has been baptized by sprinkling, and who later moved to a field where the Disciples were at work, should be received, just as he was, if he could not conscientiously receive immersion. Never, is the answer. If through lack of fellowship and Christian oversight he should lapse into heathenism again, that would be unfortunate, but not even to avert that unfortunate possibility can the Disciples possibly receive him into their communion.

A Declaration.

Here is this remarkable declaration which, let us hope, the recording angel will overlook, and not lay to the charge of these dear brethren:

"If the conference in India, to be held in August, shall decide that some way must be provided by which converts to Christianity, who were sprinkled for baptism, going to reside in communities having only immersionist churches may become members of those churches, and not drift back into heathenism, let them provide the method by which the commandment of Christ and not some Romish substitute shall be honored.

"We claim not simply that immersion is a better baptism than sprinkling, but that the former is the only baptism. We believe that affusion can no more be performed in the name of Christ than can any other human substitute for a Divine commandment. We could as consistently receive Quakers into the membership of the churches as we could receive affusionists. Whether some way shall be found to prevent the fearful loss of converts to Christ in heathen lands, on account of contradictory teaching concerning baptism, other than the adoption of the 'one baptism' we know not. We know, however, that for us there is no option except to receive into the churches those only who obey the Lord, not only in the 'one faith,' but in the 'one baptism' as well."

Methodist Not In the Bible.

Also I read in that paper, a letter, sent in great glee from a Disciple in Indiana, who had been traveling through the South and had had a famous victory. Some Methodists got on the train, from having attended a conference. He watched his opportunity, and broke in to inquire whether in that region there were any "Christians only." Then he gave them a written offer of $25 if they could find the word Methodist in the Bible. He rejoiced in having thus upheld the glory of his denomination. He left the Methodists hunting that word, and he wrote to his paper, and the paper printed his silly letter.

Dear brethren, the editors, we long have known that not all the fools were Congregationalists, and you cannot control the mails that bring to you stuff like that, but how in the name either of good journalism or Christian spirit, can you print it? And when you do so, how can you talk of union?

Exhorts the Disciples.

Hear me, my dear brethren. There are no "Christians only." You and we, and all of us are Christians plus and minus. We and you are Christians plus our denominational names. The very name of Christ was used as a sectarian name in the time of Paul and is so used by you today, and is none the less sectarian, but may be rather the more so, for being that holy name. We are Christians plus our creeds, written or unwritten, and our sectarian bars willfully raised between us and our brethren and defended by proof texts and other sectarian methods.

And we are Christians minus. This brother who glories in being a "Christian only" is a Christian plus a bumptious, cocksure, intrusive spirit, and minus something of Christian charity, and a saving sense of the ridiculous. You may pass resolutions till doomsday, but you must get rid of that spirit before you can be even ordinary Christians, much less Christians in any special or peculiar sense.

I liked the Portland meeting. A lot of earnest men and women were there, and most of them are very much the sort of folks we are, good, average, every-day Christians, really trying to do the work of the Lord, and doing it with commendable energy and fervor.

Going Behind the Returns*

Editors The Christian Century: I desire to commend the high plane you have reached and real Christian character of your plea for Christian union as set forth in your editorial in the July 6 number of The Christian Century.

The manner in which members of Methodist, Presbyterian, and other denominational churches are frequently treated when they present church letters for membership in a Disciple church has always been a source of amazement and regret to me.

I think it is almost twenty years since I heard a prominent Methodist preacher in the pulpit make this statement: "There is a certain people claiming to be followers of Christ, who proclaim loudly for Christian union, and moreover assert they have no written creed; but I want to tell you, that they have the most rigid and cast-iron creed of any denomination in Christendom, for you cannot become a member of that church unless you go under the water tooth and toe-nail!" After the sermon a number of the Methodist brethren came to me in a spirit of apology, but I immediately informed them there was no need, for while it was a unique way of stating the fact, nevertheless it was true in the main.

It does not coincide with the true spirit of Christianity to go behind the returns. When a man or woman presents a genuine letter from an evangelical church, desiring membership in one of our churches, it represents to us that they are Christians in good standing. Then of what avail is our statement from pulpit and press that we consider them Christians, and yet refuse to admit them, because they have not been immersed? It is simply going back on what we preach, as any Methodist or Presbyterian very well knows. Either they are Christians or they are not. The old position that I heard preached in my boyhood was more logical, which made them appear as unbaptized sinners. We do not say that now, but partly imply it when membership is refused on a letter because the person has not been baptized by immersion in water.

All this has nothing to do with the practice of the church, because as you explicitly say, "No true Disciple considers for a moment the possibility of relegating immersion to an optional basis alongside of sprinkling and pouring."

So, again I congratulate you and quote your own words: "A new spirit—a spirit of fraternity, of co-operation, of fellowship, of unity—is abroad in our hearts. This spirit is not to be inhibited by dogmatic considerations. It freely regards every Christian as a brother and desires his fellowship and is willing to give that fellowship through the 'right hand!'"

Nothing short of this kind of fellowship will ever bring about the Christian union we long and pray for, and may God speed the day when all our brethren see the light and interpret the Gospel of Christ in the same lovely spirit.

Christian Science and the Child

BY HENRY DWIGHT CHAPIN, M. D., IN THE INDEPENDENT.

How is the child endangered by Christian Science? A few instances recently observed in real life can best answer this question and point the moral. A family in a neighboring town consisted of father, mother and little son, the latter being the center of the brightness and interest of the home. When three years of age, the child began to fail with obscure digestive symptoms. The best local physician was called, but, in spite of his efforts, there seemed to be no relief. The nervous mother became almost frantic as she saw the boy grow gradually weaker. Her fears were not relieved when further observation and a consultation revealed the fact that the case was one of tubercular peritonitis. The only chance for life lay in an operation. It happened that in this town the Christian Science cult was active, and some of the mother's friends were of this belief. They assured her that if the case were put in their hands a cure would result, and that the uncontrolled fears of the mother herself were largely responsible for the suffering of the child. This way of putting it naturally did not tend to relieve the mother's mental anguish, and meanwhile the child was growing rapidly worse. Finally, a firm talk with the parents, pointing out the urgency and importance of an operation and the otherwise hopeless nature of the case, led to their consent and a consequent parting with their Christian Science advisers. On the moral side, an effort was made to convince them that any legitimate comfort in such a case could be derived from all forms of true religion without ignoring the real facts and possibilities of the case. An operation was performed, the tubercles located and the child made a slow but perfect recovery. The boy would surely have died without this scientific interference, as the trouble was alike demonstrated and relieved by the operation. Here a precious life was nearly sacrificed to this delusion.

In another case, a little girl was found to be suffering from tubercular disease of the hip joint. After months of needless suffering, the direct result of Christian Science treatment, a permanent lameness that could easily have been prevented by modern scientific management was the outcome.

As previously hinted, a large number of slight illnesses need no other attention than rest, and will practically do well on any treatment or no treatment. But who can safely advise whether the ailing child has a mild or dangerous affection? Certainly not those who deny the real existence of disease. Again, the mild disease may be communicable and thus endanger others. Recently a Christian Science mother sent for a physician, as she was alarmed at the peculiar appearance of her boy's skin. It proved to be a mild but distinct form of measles. The rash naturally began to fade in a few days, when the mother telephoned the doctor that the child had not had measles and she was sending him back to school. A whole class was thus exposed, as the case was still infectious, because the mother did not believe in measles.

It is not necessary to repeat other instances that have come under the writer's observation. Any physician in active practice can cite similar cases. They are reported as true and typical examples of what is happening, and will continue to happen, as a result of a too tolerant attitude toward one feature of this form of religion. The object of this paper is not to discuss the general theory of Christian Science, but simply to enter an emphatic protest against one of the dangerous results of this belief, in which the child is the helpless victim.

"Ah, but it gives us such rest and peace!"

A peace derived by ignoring the sterner facts of life is too dearly bought. Against the vapid joy and peace that this form of faith gives to any neurotic man or woman you may often count a sick or maimed or dying child. This is the dark, cruel, sinister side of the picture. It is really the child that is offered as a sacrifice on the altar of this unnatural belief.

It is time for plain and emphatic words. An appeal should be made not only to the intelligence, but to the public heart and conscience by those who can speak with knowledge and authority.

Jacob Kenoly

On July 10 word came from Liberia, Africa conveying the sad news that Jacob Kenoly was drowned on Friday, June 9. There was some conflict of dates, but this was due to their effort to lose no time in notifying friends of the mission in America of their great loss.

We have had in all nine letters from there, all telling of the helpful visit of Dr. Dye and of the loss of their teacher. He had in his school fifty-one boys and in his effort to keep them properly fed he was often hard pressed. It seems in the heavy rains the lake near the mission station from which they had been getting many fish became flooded so they could not fish because the outlet became clogged. On Friday, June 9, he and seven others went out to cut this outlet so the water would fall that they could again fish. Early last year the C. W. B. M. asked me to buy him a net and this we sent, together with many other articles which we knew he would need. This box was much delayed in transit and had not been there long. They were anxious to use it in getting an abundant supply of fish. When the outlet was cut they went into their boat and attempted to cross over and go home. They got too near the rapid current and were carried out to sea which is always very rough at this place. The boat was capsized and Brother Kenoly and four others were drowntd. Three of these swam three-fourths of a mile to shore. At last reports his body had not yet been found and possibly never will be.

It seems to me fitting here to give a little sketch of this truly wonderful missionary career. When all the circumstances are taken into consideration his seven years in Liberia are a chapter in the best heroics of African missions. His life opened up a phase of work that had scarcely been touched heretofore, viz: the work of the American negro in the "Dark Continent." His call from and to the negro was answered in such simple sincerity that it seemed almost like an apostle in this particular phase of the Master's work.

In 1899 while going to the jubilee Convention in Cincinnati, I fell in with David Brindle of Georgia. After a long conversation about our work he said "What can I do for you." I said, "Send us a Georgia boy to be educated." On his way home he was struck by the conduct of a hotel boy and he suggested to him that he ought to go to the S. C. I. After some correspondence he came to earn his way. He was a pure black, over six feet tall and weighed about 190 pounds. He had not been here many months until he obeyed the invitation one morning and was baptized. He afterwards stated he had found just what he was looking for. He had been confused by denominational controversies and was as happy as could be over his new find.

While here he impressed every one as an exceptionally sincere young man. No one ever questioned him on anything. The battle to earn his way and still go to school was a fierce one and he sometimes almost felt that he must give up. But in his hour of greatest need Mrs. Ross succeeded in getting Miss Denham of Bloomington to interest an Endeavor society and thereafter he got regular though not very large help. When the time came for graduation he was on the program for a solo, "Then Cling to the Bible my Boy," and he sang it with such unction that the audience became fairly frantic and called him back two or three times.

On the night of graduation when we had our reception, the Superintendent of Industries and I presented him with a square, a saw and a hammer. In making the presentation speech I said, "Here is a square, if you find things crooked, square them up. Here is a saw, if you find some things you can not square up, saw them off. Here is a hammer, if you find good things, nail them down." He replied that he intended to go to Africa. We scarcely thought he meant it, but from that day on he kept twenty per cent of all his earnings for his trip to Africa.

The story of his struggles in getting there have often been told and I need not repeat them here. The first two years in Liberia were largely lost, so far as outward appearances go, in convincing the people that he was not a fugitive from justice, in fighting the fever and in planning his mission. We therefore can count only five years as actual work in building up the Liberian Christian Institute. In that time he took a most wonderful hold on the people there. He accomplished with his small salary of $300 what other mission stations had not attained in a quarter of a century with great outlays of money. No one can read the letters that have been coming from the people about there during the past three years without noticing how he succeeded in giving his spirit to all who came under his influence, and nearly the whole settlement came under his influence. His fame extended to the back countries and the native chiefs were bringing in their children. Even the chiefs got his spirit and uttered his sentiments in presenting their children.

He concentrated his energy in his school, in his church, and in his temperance society. All three were managed with the same unction. He preached the truths in his temperance society with as much earnestness as he

20. When this event actually occurred, how did he change the aim of his work? And why?

1. THE EXILES IN BABYLON.

It will be remembered that there were two seiges of Jerusalem, each of which resulted in the spoiling of the city by its Babylonian foes. The first occurred in 597 B. C., at which time Jehoiachin and his court, with a considerable body of the people, were taken eastward on the long trail of exile. The city was left standing, however, and the kingdom of Judah persisted for another ten years. In 586 however, the final tragedy came, and Jerusalem was overthrown to rise no more for half a century.

When the first of these deportations took place, the people were taken by their conquerors to the north, across the Jordan, up along the course of the Euphrates, and finally southward into the plains of Babylonia. Here they were located in small communities, where they were given considerable freedom to work out their industrial problem of a livlihood. They seem to have organized themselves in community groups, after the manner of the towns of Palestine, with such authority as was necessary vested in their elders. Their religious practices were almost wholly suspended, both because of the strangeness and loneliness of their new condition, and because they had neither sanctuary nor priesthood in the land.

The homesickness and depression which breathes through such psalms as 42, 43, and 137 were almost too hard to be borne. It seemed as if God had forsaken them (Ps. 22: 1f). The land in which they found themselves was flat and monotonous as compared with the beauty of Palestine. It seemed to them as if the end had come, and they were poured out like water in the sand.

But at the same time there was a strong feeling on the part of many that their evil state could last but a short time. After the first depression wore away they began to comfort themselves with the conviction that they should soon go back to their old homes. Both in Babylonia among the exiles and in Judah among the people who were left there was the firm confidence that their troubles would soon be over, and they would go back to their former homes. This belief was fostered by the popular prophets both in Jerusalem and by the Euphrates.

2. THE CALL OF EZEKIEL.

Among those Jews who were taken from Palestine in the first deportation in 597 B. C. was a young man named Ezekiel, of a priestly family. He may have entered already upon his sacred calling at the temple when the city was taken. He went into exile with Jehoiachin and the others who made up the company of expatriates. One of the groups of these Judeans was placed in the town of Tel-abib on the stream called Chebar, probably one of the many irrigating canals which carried the waters of the Tigris and Euphrates to fertilize the land between the rivers.

Here five years later Ezekiel was called to the task of leadership as a prophet, and for a period of almost twenty-five years he continued his work (cf. 1:2 with 29:17). His call, like that of others of the prophets, consisted of a vision, which may be understood as the means by which the prophet came to the recognition of his ministry, or the method by which he sought to give the people an adequate conception of his message. This vision took the form of a mighty chariot, moving across the heavens with the speed and majesty of a storm (chaps. 1-3). Upon it was the divine figure, though the prophet, true to his Hebrew training, is careful to refrain from the direct statement that he saw God.

The general meaning of this vision is clear, in spite of the elaboration of the description, and the successful efforts of many of the commentators to make it obscure. Its value does not consist in the intricacy of the different parts, nor the minute elaboration of the picture. It lies in the fact that the vision made clear the power of Jehovah to move whithersoever he would, and that he could as easily assist his people in Babylonia as in Palestine. The tendency of the moment among the exiles was to believe that God was powerless to assist them, and that he was limited in interest and movement to the little territory in which their national life had been passed. The new experience of a world-governing and all-ruling Lord came but slowly and was difficult to make real to Israel. But in time it won its way and made the older form of idolatry impossible.

Ezekiel was bidden to devour the book of God's purposes, and to act as a watchman for the people, responsible to God for the faithfulness of his service. To this hard task he set himself through the years that followed.

3. THE BOOK OF EZEKIEL.

While there is less of dramatic interest in the life of this prophet than in the experiences of Hosea, Isaiah or Jeremiah, the story of Ezekiel is not without profound significance in the religious experience of the Old Testament. The Book of Ezekiel differs in several particulars from the other books we have been studying. It is much more orderly in its arrangement. The chapters move on in direct sequence from beginning to end. Then too it uses the element of symbolism more freely. The parables employed by the prophet in his preaching are set forth with considerable fulness. Such spoken or acted devices for the illustration and enforcement of his message as the pictured seige of Jerusalem (chapt. 4), the razor and the shaved hair (chapt. 5), the description of an imaginary journey back to Jerusalem, where he beheld the abominations that were still practiced by its people (chapt. 8), the hasty removal of his goods from his home as a hint of the terror that should seize upon the people of the holy city in the days of the coming seige (chapt. 12), and such parables as the eagle and the cedar (chapt. 17), the lioness and the vine (chapt. 19) and the two sisters (chapt. 23), give some adequate impression of the variety and force of his message.

The book falls easily into two parts; chapters 1-24, uttered between the first deportation and the fall of the city, and devoted to the stern assurance that Jerusalem had not yet paid the full penalty of her sins but must perish; and 25-48, written after the heart-breaking news that the city had actually fallen reached the exiles at Tel-abib, and devoted to the work of encouraging the despondent group with the confident hope that the fortunes of the nation, now so low, should actually be revived in the good time to come.

4. FATHERS AND CHILDREN (Chap. 18.)

The fact that there were many problems involved in the experiences of the exile which were quite new to people made it necessary to adapt the message of prophecy to the occasion. One of the most perplexing questions was that which related to the sufferings of seemingly good men. That is the essential problem of the Book of Job, which perhaps took form in this period. One of the common explanations of the situation, offered by those who were unwilling to confess that they were sinners, was that they were paying the penalty for the sins of an earlier generation. The argument took the form of a proverb, "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge."

The effect of this assertion was to relieve the consciences of the people, to produce a sense of the uselessnss of effort to attain better things, and to charge God with the mismanagement of the world in allowing such things to happen. Against this perversion of the facts Ezekiel set his face like a flint. And perhaps this chapter, chosen for this reason as the theme of special study, is the best statement of the doctrine of individualism and personal responsibility. It will be noticed that the first nine verses contain the thesis that a man is held accountable for his own sins alone, and in connection with it the prophet gives an interesting list of the acts which constitute right conduct. It is noticeable what a large proportion of these acts are of moral and social rather than ritual character.

The remainder of the chapter developes this theme of personal righteousness and responsibility, and denies totally the old fatalistic idea that the sons bear the iniquity or are credited with the virtue of their fathers.

To be sure there is a sense, both physical and moral, in which the entail of an evil or a good life becomes the possession of those who come after. To that extent it is true that the iniquities of the fathers are visited upon the children. And this Ezekiel would have affirmed as well. But he saw the havoc that the popular application of the doctrine was working in Israel, and he set himself to its correction. In a very true sense it may be said that the doctrine of solidarity was overthrown by the events of the exile and the preaching of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, the first discoverers of the individual.

5. WARNINGS OF THE END.

During all the early years of the exile there was a general impression among the people that their stay in Babylonia would be of short duration. Prophetic voices of the popular sort assured them that the return to Palestine would soon begin, and that they need not take seriously the hardships of their present condition. This was a pleasing assurance. But the greater prophets knew that a long and hard discipline was required before the time of redemption could be expected. Even if it had been possible, through any change of political fortune, to secure the return of the exiles to their homes, these two great leaders felt that it was far from desirable. The nation was too worldly and frivolous to make such an experience wise. So through all these years they sought to make clear the reasons why an early termination of the present unhappy conditions was neither desirable nor possible. Even in Jerusalem itself the old practices of idolatry had been revived. Ezekiel had received word of these facts, and hastened to make them known to his countrymen (see chap. 8). When the elders of the people came to consult with him and to beg of him a lighter and more cheering word, he told them, as Jeremiah told King Zedekiah, that only the fall of Jerusalem could be expected.

With all the force at his command he tried to make this clear. Even his domestic activities and sorrows (chap. 24) were pressed into the service of his great messsage. It was only when the fatal news came that the city was smitten that the awful truth came home to the exiles that they were not to return to Zion, but that Jerusalem had fallen and another long procession of homeless and captive Jews was on its weary way to the east. From that day forth the prophet turned all his efforts to the encouragement of his despairing people with the hope that they should ultimately go back. The later chapters of the book are a message of consolation and a program of the revival of Jerusalem.

FOLLOWING STUDIES.

Section XXXIII will be devoted to "Ezekiel's Program of Revival," and XXXIV to "The Prophet of Consolation."

TOPICS FOR SPECIAL STUDY, REPORTS AND PAPERS.

1. The journey of the exiles to their new home in the distant east.
2. The expectation of an early return to Palestine, and the reasons for it.
3. The meaning of the symbolism of Ezekiel's vision.
4. The personal character of Ezekiel.
5. The literary features of the Book of Ezekiel.
6. Relation of Ezekiel to the other prophets of his day.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES.

Small Beginnings of Intemperance. Prov. 23:29-35. (Temperance Lesson.)

Probably no drunkard ever thought he would become a drunkard when he took his first drink. If clothed in his right mind he certainly did not want to become thus habituated. We cannot conceive of one who would look forward to a future which will deny him of friends, and home, and wealth, and position, and honor. Certainly no one would choose such a life.

The ways of beginning are worthy of our consideration because they are so hard to resist. Many a boy has found himself associated with a group of fellows who are thus indulging, and for him to refuse, is interpreted as a rejection of their hospitality. He may be deceived into thinking that that is the way that all men do, and that that is one of the ways of becoming a man and a good fellow. Again he may find himself in the company of a somewhat exclusive set around a banquet table where wine is being served and where it seems again he must either partake or be guilty of a breach of courtesy. When we stop to think how we all shrink from the frown and disapproval of companions we realize how very easy it is for us to be partakers of things for which we have no real desire. If then we suggest to such ones that they are in danger of forming a habit that they will have difficulty in throwing off they are very sure that we are unduely alarmed and assure us that they do not drink as a regular thing and that they have no desire for it, etc., etc.

But just because the beginning is small there is reason for alarm. Its deception lies in the fact that it is small. Because a thing is small is no reason for being despised. A snow ball the size of a walnut far up on the mountain side easily becomes an avalanche large enough to bury a city. James Watt was but a man, but his invention of the steam engine has revolutionized the modes of transportation and instituted a new industrial order. Socialism not many years ago was looked upon as the raving of a few blind fanatics, but today it is looked upon by some as a threatening calamity, and by others as the hope of the oppressed, while by all it is regarded as a mighty factor in the future experiences of the race. The fact is we have no means of telling the significance of a thing by observing its size. We cannot thus measure its possibilities.

The fact is, nothing is more insidious than habit. Though it works silently and invisibly it is none the less real. This is especially true when we couple with it the creation of an appetite which constantly calls for satisfaction. Unconsciously we yield to its incessant and insistent demands and when we awake to realize its danger and seek to release ourselves from its toils we find to our dismay how helplessly we are bound. Many times we must try to break up a habit in order that we may realize just how firmly it holds us. If you have some habits—and especially the one of an occasional drink—just try stopping it to see how securely it holds you. You are in more serious danger than you realize. Do not be deceived because you think your habit of drinking is a slight one. Even though it be slight now, remember that it is sure to grow great and destructive.

Chicago

On Wednesday evening, July 5, occurred the marriage of Miss Virginia Watson, one of the efficient workers of the Memorial Church of Christ in this city, to Mr. Francis Allen of Ellsworth, Ohio. Dr. Willett officiated.

The Second Presbyterian Church has rented and taken possession of a residence on Michigan avenue near 18th street, in order to meet the growing demands of the church. The yard is used for playgrounds and tennis courts.

Work will be started in the near future on the new German Lutheran University at River Forest. The Lutheran schools of the Dakotas, Minnesota and Wisconsin are uniting in this enterprise. Upon grounds comprised of six square blocks about fifteen buildings will be erected at a cost of $250,000.

Gault Court, a thoroughfare called "Little Hell," running through the heart of the lower North Side congested district, has been converted into a play zone by order of Mayor Harrison. If the plan is a success this court, the scene of many alleged Black Hand crimes, will be permanently closed to traffic.

The Des Plaines Methodist camp meeting held its last service Monday evening, July 31. Bishop Quayle was the chief speaker for the last Sunday services. The opening sermon was delivered July 19 by Dr. Ostrom. Other speakers of note upon the program were Dr. Morrison, Rev. Joshua Randall of Sheridan Road Church, and Bishop McDowell.

A unique meeting was recently held in the First Italian Methodist Church of Chicago. A memorial service in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the unification and liberty of Italy, was held by members of the "Circolo Educativo Sociale" of the church. The chief speaker was Dr. Luigi Alfieri, a captain of the navy of Italy, visiting America on leave of absence. A tablet was unveiled at the close of the services in memory of Mazzini, Garibaldi, Cavour, and Vittorio Emanuele II.

VAUGHAN DABNEY.

Sometimes we pray with all our might to God to help us have our own way. We do not care what His will is—we want our will fulfilled. Would an answer to that prayer be what God has promised? Prayer is not meant to exalt our own will, but to bring us into communion with God, and into line with His purposes for us.—The Way.

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

L. B. Appleton has concluded his pastorate at Christopher.

There were sixteen additions at Coldbrook church July 16. C. H. Shipplett is pastor.

George Duffey, until recently pastor at McLean, has been called to the church at New Boston.

St. Joseph Church will begin a revival meeting August 13, with W. W. Sniff, pastor at Paris, as evangelist.

There were two additions on a recent Sunday at Mt. Hebron, near Mendon, where C. B. Dabney preaches.

Edward McKinney will assist George W. Wise, pastor at De Land, in evangelistic services in September. Mr. McKinney will conduct the music.

Major Griffith will hold a meeting beginning the latter part of August at Julyan, where he preached recently to an enthusiastic congregation.

Norman H. Robertson, pastor at Stanford, is to spend the month of August in Canada. He has been unanimously recalled by his church for next year.

The church at Clinton has called J. F. Rosborough, formerly pastor at Centralia, to become its minister. The call has been accepted, and the pastorate will be assumed by September 1.

The church at Cisne, where W. H. Kern ministers, gave to foreign missions, $10; home missions, $12, and benevolence, $15, during the past year. There were two additions by confession of faith July 16.

H. D. Williams of Danville Fourth Church exchanged pulpits with S. S. Jones, pastor of Third Church, on a recent Sunday. There have been four additions in recent weeks at Fourth Church, and there are prospects for other increases in the membership.

E. E. Hartley has been preaching at Westville for about six months, and has done a very acceptable work. His pastorate will close in a short time, and it is hoped that the church will become the living link mission of some of our larger churches.

Churches near Arrowsmith in need of a pastor will do well to correspond with Charles D. Hougham whose residence is near that place. Mr. Hougham is not giving all of his time to the ministry, but can be used with great profit to a church on Lord's Days.

B. H. Cleaver is to return to Lewistown. His resignation will take effect the first of October. Announcement has not been made regarding Mr. Cleaver's future field of labor. It is to be hoped that the Illinois churches will not allow the removal of so excellent a pastor from the state.

The church at Hurst is without a pastor since the resignation of W. F. Mott. The congregation here has a splendid building without indebtedness. The town is rapidly growing and affords an excellent opportunity for accomplishing a good work. W. H. Waggoner has just closed a missionary institute here.

A union evangelistic campaign is being planned for at Arthur, where H. H. Peters recently became pastor. This is one of the results of an inter-church federation. Union services are being held in town during the summer months, and the Sunday Closing Committee of the Federation is petitioning the town board to close all business houses on Sunday, in accordance with the state law.

Galesburg Church is prospering since the Scoville meeting. Congregations and Sunday-schools are so large as to make advisable continuing in the tabernacle instead of returning to the old church. It is probable that a new building enterprise will be initiated in the near future. The pastor, J. A. Barnett, is esteemed highly, both by his own congregation and the people generally, of the city.

George W. Knepper, for five years pastor at Wilkinsburg, Pa., a suburb of Pittsburgh, has been called to the pastorate of First Church, Ann Arbor, Mich.

An offering of $100 was given for missions by the Sunday-school of South Joplin, Mo., on a recent Sunday. J. R. Blunt is pastor of this church.

F. E. Day, pastor at Falls City, Neb., has closed a series of successful meetings with the church at Shubert, Neb. There were sixteen additions.

I. N. Grisso, of Fairmont, W. Va., will remove to Indianapolis, Ind., September 1. He will be available for half or fourth time service in that vicinity.

First Church, Oklahoma City, Okla., which is being erected at a cost of $100,000, is rapidly nearing completion. Work is also progressing rapidly on University Church.

Claude J. Miller, of Des Moines, Ia., has been called to the pastorate of First Church, Maryville, Mo., to succeed L. O. Bricker, who has taken the work at First Church, Atlanta, Ga.

The annual meeting of the churches of Clay county, Ind., was held at Bowling Green, July 28-31. L. E. Murray, state corresponding secretary, was present and gave several addresses.

A site adequate for the erection of a church and parsonage has been purchased by the newly organized church at South Hutchinson, Kan.

The contract has been awarded for the construction of the new church at New London, Mo., and work will begin at once. It will be erected at a cost of $13,000 and will be well-equipped in every particular.

A Sunday-school institute was held recently at First Church, Norfolk, Va., where Charles M. Watson ministers. J. Walter Carpenter of Uniontown, Pa., gave a number of interesting and helpful addresses.

The corner stone of the new church, being erected at Bonham, Tex., was laid recently with impressive ceremonies. This is to be a beautiful structure of brick and stone, and is being built at a cost of $25,000.

E. L. Hand has closed a successful year's work at Cortland, Ohio. There has been a net gain of forty in the membership which numbers about two hundred and every department of the church is active.

Central Church, Canadian, Tex., has had a successful meeting with Percy G. Cross, of Little Rock, Ark. L. W. Thompson, the pastor, has closed his work there and begun at his new field, Platte, So. Dak., July 30.

Harry G. Hill, pastor of Third Church, Indianapolis, Ind., will spend his vacation with his family on an automobile tour. They will go as far east as Buffalo, N. Y., and have planned several side trips to points in Ontario and along the Great Lakes.

A church has been organized at Greentown, Ind., and a temporary tabernacle erected. It is expected that a permanent edifice will be built next year. T. J. Legg, of Indianapolis, recently conducted an evangelistic meeting there.

Woodland Church, Lexington, Ky., is holding union services with neighborhood churches. The pastor, Richard W. Wallace, has returned from a visit to Valdosta, Ga., and Meridian, Miss., where he had formerly held pastorates.

P. L. Schuler has been extended a call by the church at Mt. Pleasant, Ia. He has accepted and will succeed M. J. Nicoson, who resigned some time ago and removed to Memphis, Mo. N. E. Cory, of Keokuk, a former pastor, has been supplying the pulpit.

D. S. MacDonald, minister at North Fairfield, Ohio, was recently married to Miss Aves Ferguson, of Rushylvania, Ohio, the groom's brother, C. A. MacDonald, of New York, officiating. Mr. MacDonald is supplying the pulpit at First Church during the absence of the pastor, W. L. Fisher, who is spending his vacation at his old home, Frankfort, Mo.

W. S. Johnson, pastor at Waterloo, Iowa, has concluded his work there and will hereafter be associated with D. G. Dungan in the evangelistic field as leader of song. His present address is Eureka, Ill. During Mr. Johnson's pastorate at Waterloo, the past year, 156 persons were received into the church and $1,400 raised to meet an old indebtedness. Previous to this pastorate Mr. Johnson was engaged for seven years in state evangelistic work in Iowa.

Leonard G. Thompson, of Denver, after a residence of twenty-four years in Colorado, is at present in Los Angeles, California, and his address is Box 450, Y. M. C. A. Biulding. He has been a member of the Colorado state board for twenty-three years, serving eleven years as recording secretary and twelve as corresponding secretary. For seven years he edited the Colorado Christian Herald. His is the longest residence of any of our Colorado ministers. During his residence in Colorado he has missed but two state conventions. He has not yet fully determined upon his plans for the future.

Pres. Harry Pratt Judson, of the University of Chicago, has left for a two months' tour abroad. President Judson will attend the exercises at St. Andrews' University, Scotland.

The Wide-awake Superintendent Says

Bethany Graded Lessons are

Absolutely the Greatest Achievement in the History of Sunday-school Literature.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have coöperated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

preached the gospel on Sunday. It all told its wonderful story in the transformation of the lives of the people. Just the day before the tragedy, one of the men who lost his life with him wrote me that he came to the settlement a whiskey distiller, but he came to see the light when he came under Jacob Kenoly's teaching and he is now determined to live and die for the cause. The boy who is now at the Southern Christian Institute from his school is the incarnation of Jacob's spirit.

It seems like such a sad disaster for him to go in just the beginning of his greater usefulness, but we were slow in coming to his rescue. We paid him a small salary, We denied him help until just recently and we denied him rest in a furlough. Maybe, in the providence of God his life could speak more for the call of Liberia in this tragic end than in his continued work. A mission planted with such splendid seed will certainly bring an abundant harvest. Other hearts will be touched and the ranks will be filled up.

Foreign Society Notes

We are sorry to report that the receipts are still falling behind. All the churches and Sunday-schools were urged to send in their offerings before the Portland convention that the partial report made there might be as encouraging as possible. As a consequence there was a gain in receipts from churches and Sunday-schools for the month of June of $1,300. But since that time the loss from the Sunday-schools has been rapid. They are now, July 26, $9,655 behind last year. We had hoped for a great gain. There is loss both in the number of schools contributing and in the amount per school. We urge the Sunday-schools that are holding the collection to remit at once and that those not observing Children's Day arrange to take an offering at the earliest possible moment. Remember the patient missionaries at the front, with their lack of funds, toiling in our stead. Call to mind the deficit of last year, now increasing. Let every loyal supporter of the work leave nothing undone that might aid this great cause. Two months are left before the year closes and much can be done in that time.

News comes from Batang on the Tibetan border, that J. C. Ogden has closed a deal with the government for land on which to build our mission buildings. It has taken three years to secure these property rights. Red tape abounds on the Tibetan frontier. It has been much harder to secure property than to make converts.

A good woman in Ohio sends the work a direct gift of $2,000 for the work in the Philippines. This is the second large gift from the same source this year.

The Endeavor Societies aside from the support of the work at Damoh, India, have taken up the equipment of the new hospital to be built at Batang by Dr. A. L. Shelton. The responses have been very encouraging. The necessary $1,000 has already been pledged.

On May 21st the new chapel at Wawa, Cavite Province, Philippines, was dedicated. It is an inexpensive little bamboo structure, but represents much sacrifice and devotion on the part of the native Christians. The joy of the people in their new church home was unbounded.

Dr. C. C. Drummond, of Harda, India, says: "The work is promising. We have opened a branch dispensary in Rabetgas, one of our out-stations. The work in the field is promising. Sampson Power, a Hindu Christian medical man, is in charge of the dispensary.

F. M. Rains will speak on his trip around the world at Bethany Park, Indiana, on August 17; and at Carlisle, Ky., the Eastern Pennsylvania convention, Johnson City, Tenn., and Frankfort, Ky., during September; and at Hopkinsville, Ky., in October.

The Life of Jesus

IN FIFTY-TWO LESSONS

By Dr. Loa Ermina Scott

A NEW TEXT BOOK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'S AND ADULT BIBLE CLASSES

This book comes nearer meeting ALL the demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions—all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportion. It is the product of experience. Dr. Scott is teacher of a successful Sunday-school class in the Disciples' Church, at Chagrin Falls, Ohio. She has been developing this book for years. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

INTRODUCTION BY PROFESSOR E. B. WAKEFIELD OF HIRAM COLLEGE

"In her home congregation Dr. Scott sought in an unpretentious and resolute way to work out her ideal. With such opportunity as has been given her, her work has never been surpassed. For years she has held the largest and most interested class that her community has ever known; and to this very hour the solid interest has grown.

"If her published lessons will only extend her work and help to get more of real Bible teaching into our congregations, they will most surely bless the world."—PROFESSOR E. B. WAKEFIELD, of Hiram College, in the Introduction.

WORDS OF PRAISE.

I know of no book on the subject so admirably adapted to its purpose.—J. H. GOLDNER, Euclid Ave. Church, Cleveland.

I shall take pleasure in introducing the work to my next class in the Life of Christ and in commending it to others.—F. W. BURNHAM, First Church, Springfield, Ill.

It contains just the kind of work we ought to be doing in our Young People's and Adult classes.—O. W. LAWRENCE, Central Church, Decatur, Ill.

Her unusual ability and her practical experience have helped her to meet the new and growing demand for just such a course of study,—HARRIS R. COOLEY, Cleveland.

Its arrangement is excellent. Its choice of material remarkable—as much for what is omitted as for the rich material included. The questions at end of each of the fifty-two lessons reveal the teacher.—JOHN R. EWERS, East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa.

The beauty of the book is that it is an outline and cannot be used apart from the gospels themselves.—A. W. FORTUNE, Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati.

These fifty-two lessons may well serve as a training coures, and as such, the book is superior to any I have seen.—PERRY J. RICE, El Paso, Tex.

The Life of Jesus

In Fifty-two Lessons

BY DR. LOA ERMINA SCOTT.

A manual for young peoples and adult classes. It is conceded to be the most practicable text for its purpose on the market.

The book grew in the actual experience of teaching. From the moment it came from the press it has been in great demand. Another edition is now being prepared for.

It is just the thing for classes of young people of high school age. But it is equally well adapted to adults.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The graded lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' grade was complete the past year. The Primary grade will be complete for the opening of the new year—October 1. Three of the four years of the Junior grade will be complete October 1. The second year of the Intermediate grade (ready October 1) supplies boys and girls of 15 and 16 years.]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

Every lesson writer is a recognized authority in the Interdenominational Sunday School world!

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that coöperation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

A NEW YEAR BEGINS OCTOBER 1

The Sunday-school calendar is made to conform to the public school calendar. While the graded lessons may be begun at any time, there are obvious advantages in starting at the beginning of the new cycle.

Send today for Price List, Order Blank and Prospectus!

If you state which grade you are chiefly interested in, we will send, in addition to prospectuses of the entire series, a teachers' and pupils' text for that particular grade. We do not send a complete outfit as free samples.

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Volume XXVIII. August 10, 1911 Number 32

To Every Member

The present readers of The Christian Century in the church at Evanston, Ill., have determined to send the paper to every home of the congregation on the basis of the "TEN WEEKS FOR TEN CENTS" special offer described on page 2. This same thing will be done in many congregations. Mr. Jordan says they will canvass the members for subscribers, "as those who pay for a paper are more likely to read it. The remnant, if there be any, will have their papers paid for by the pastor and the present readers." This is the kind of response which we believe hundreds of our pastors will make to this splendid offer. We shall be glad to hear from other readers saying what plans they have on foot and how we can co-operate with them.

CHICAGO

Silver Bay Conference

We, the undersigned representatives of the Christian Church from different parts of the Nation, in attendance at the Silver Bay Conference of "The Men and Religion Forward Movement," consider it our high privilege and imperative duty to make known as widely as possible to the men of our beloved Brotherhood our opinion of this Movement, after this close contact with it, and to give a few brief suggestions about how our Christian men may be effectively connected with it.

We are amazed at the wisdom and amount of work done, which is shown in the program before us, and in the reports of work already done in many centers throughout the Nation, and in the great sweep of the Christian effort already planned, which is to be carried out over the continent. The phases of the Movement—Evangelism, Bible Study, Missions, Boys' Work, Social Service, Community Extension—provide a range of appeal and a range of service which commands the assent of our judgments and the enthusiasm of our hearts.

This great Movement is pervaded with prayer. It is full of intense loyalty to Christ. The Christian church is exalted.

The ten great Christian Brotherhoods of the Nation are all a part of the Movement, as are these great and splendid organizations—the Gideons, the Young Men's Christian Association and the International Sunday-School Association. Business men, lawyers and physicians are giving their trained ability to help on this Movement; and a host of men of experience and training in Christian work are giving the whole or a part of their time.

We cordially endorse the Men and Religion Forward Movement. We commend it to our brethren everywhere. In this most general and most widely organized evangelistic movement, that our Nation has ever known, our beloved churches, with their great historic record in evangelistic enterprise and achievement, should take their proper place of cordial coöperation and great power.

Among the coöperating Christian Brotherhoods and other organizations of Christian men, we note with glad appreciation that the Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ has its proper place.

We earnestly recommend a speedy organization in every church, wherever practical, of a Bible Class, Brotherhood, or some other organization of men, if not now existing, and that these relate themselves to the Movement. Such organizations will greatly help to conserve the results.

Literature about "The Men and Religion Forward Movement" will be sent to those whose names may be furnished from any Christian Church, to E. E. Elliott, J. K. Shellenberger, Secretaries of the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ, R. A. Long Building, Kansas City, Mo.

Disciples' Group at Silver Bay Conference.

We greatly rejoice in the privilege of delightful fellowship that we Disciple men of different congregations have had at the Silver Bay Conference, and we covet for others the privilege of participation in the further progress of the Movement. Also that they will not over-look RALLY DAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1911.

Ten Weeks for Ten Cents

In order to introduce The Christian Century into new homes the publishers propose to send the paper ten weeks for ten cents,

Beginning With the Issue of September 21.

Names for this offer must be sent in before September 15. These trial subscriptions will be positively discontinued at the expiration of the ten weeks unless ordered continued by the subscriber.

We expect to gather a list of several thousand names for this period. One subscriber to whom the plan was explained declared that he had ten dollars to spend on that proposition and would send us the names of 100 persons whom he wishes to become acquainted with The Christian Century and its vital message. Others will send smaller lists; still others, perhaps, larger lists. This is on behalf of their paper. Let every present subscriber think over the names of the fellow-members of his church and his friends and make up a list. A good set of names would be your Sunday School teachers and officers and your board of elders and deacons. If your pastor is not now a reader be sure that he is not overlooked. We Believe Every Reader Will Send in at Least One Name.

BEGIN NOW TO MAKE UP YOUR LIST

Send it in at once. Use separate sheet or sheets of paper for your names. Put your own name at the top as the sender. Keep a duplicate copy of your list. Be sure to make addresses plain. Remittance must accompany all lists.

Leading railroads throughout the country are preparing to combat, with all the forces at their command, the widespread demand for a general slash in express rates. Their position, which heretofore has been a subject for speculation, was made clear last week at the second day's hearing of express charges and express company methods, before the subcommittee of railroad commissioners, representing the National Association of Railroad Commissioners, in session in Chicago. P. S. Eustis, passenger traffic manager of the Burlington Railroad, declared emphatically that his company will resist all attempts to force a lower scale of prices upon the express carriers. "We are going into the subject thoroughly," he said, "and intend to be present at every express hearing from now on—pleasantly, if possible, and obnoxiously, if necessary." According to a statement made by Mr. Eustis, the Burlington deals with three express companies, the Adams, Great Northern and Northern Pacific. The Burlington, he asserted, was compelled to take the best rate for service it could get from the Adams company, while in the case of the two other carriers a demand for a greater compensation for services was made. "I may add," he said, "that we are seriously considering the organization of an express company of our own. It is my opinion that the big express companies didn't want the railroads to dig into this question.

Religion in the Hawaiian Islands

In our Hawaiian possessions Christian men becoming wealthy at growing sugar continue to take the same personal interest in their churches and missions that they took when they were poor, as Christian men in the United States proper, grown wealthy in other ways, often admittedly do not. The Rev. William Oleson, superintendent of missionary work under the Hawaiian Evangelical Board, has been in New York and Boston for some months, and is just returning to his island work. He does not say that American rich men leave their churches, but he does affirm that wealthy Christians of Hawaii work at their religion and give to missions in a most encouraging fashion.

According to this missionary leader, native Hawaiians are increasing in numbers, not dying out as formerly, and membership in their churches is also increasing. Japanese churches in Hawaii, of which there are a considerable number, and growing rapidly in membership, and the union churches, of which there are ten, are more prosperous than ever. The Hawaiian Association receives from Congregationalists in the states $10,000 a year, but Hawaiians themselves contribute to the Association for missionary purposes $40,000 a year.

Mr. Oleson is encouraged over the educational and political situations in Hawaii at the moment. There was opened three years ago the Mid-Pacific Institute, consisting of two splendid buildings, one for young men, the other for young women. They are stone buildings, large and handsome and fully paid for. Besides, the Institute has an endowment of $250,000. The whole Institute is an island development. Politically the last legislature, with many difficult problems before it, adjourned after having arrived at many wise conclusions, showing its members to be progressive, patriotic men.

Four religious bodies are at work in the Hawaiian Islands. These are the Congregational, the Episcopal, the Methodist and the Roman Catholic. It was the Congregational body that sent the first Christian missionaries from Boston to the islands, but long ago the American Board, which sent them, withdrew support and supervision, leaving control to native Christians. Now, under a new arrangement, American Congregationalists through the American Missionary Association, give aid to the extent of $10,000 a year.

Presbyterian Showing Last Year

The large Presbyterian body, that of the North, has just issued its report for last year. In membership it has regained all it lost following the Cumberland Presbyterian merger, and 14,000 members besides. In 1907, when the Cumberland people came in, there was a jump in the membership figures of 183,000, followed the next year by a setback of 41,000. Some Cumberlands, notably some in Tennessee, refused to stay united.

Now the membership has reached 1,354,453, or much higher than ever before. The net gain last year was 15,500. The whole number of churches is 10,051, the highest number ever reached. The Sunday-school enrollment is now 1,205,130. In proportion to membership of the Church this is the highest obtaining in any of the large religious bodies. A few small bodies have as many children in their Sunday-schools as members in their churches, but the larger bodies have often hardly more than half so many. The proportion of Presbyterians is 1,205,130 to 1,354,453.

Contributions of Presbyterians last year amounted to $25,909,000, or next to Methodists, the largest of any religious body in America. This is $19 and a trifle more per member, which is the highest average save one, Episcopalians averaging almost exactly $20 per member. This Presbyterian showing of gifts for last year is $3,000,000 in excess of the previous year, and 1910 was the largest total up to that date. Of the nearly $26,000,000 given by Presbyterians last year to all causes, $6,300,000 went to missions. In even figures $4,000,000 went to missions under the regular boards, and $2,000,000 to other missionary work, such as colleges, the Negroes, American Bible Society and temperance. To foreign missions alone was given $2,500,000.

Candidates for the ministry, who have been scarce and are still smaller in numbers than needs of the Church require, show a slight improvement. There are now 1,205, as against 934 five years ago, and 1,152 last year. There was, however, no increase in the number actually licensed as ministers last year, and there was little increase in the number of men ordained. The number of Presbyterian ministers is now 9,128, the highest number ever reached.

Two men in actual leadership among the Presbyterians, one minister, the other layman, are the Rev. Dr. W. H. Roberts of Philadelphia, and the Hon. John W. Foster of Washington. The former is stated clerk. Moderators come and go, but the stated clerk holds on, as he has done for many years, a great power in Presbyterianism, and also great power in many other religious and educational lines. Mr. Foster, once Secretary of State and member of Hague and a dozen other peace tribunals of world scope, is a type of the layman who now, as not heretofore, takes personal interest in Church work, especially in Sunday-school and missions.

Unitarians and a National Church

Inquiry among Unitarians brings out some opposition to the plan of a great Unitarian Church to be erected in Washington. President Taft suggested, some weeks ago, the erection of such a church there. The suggestion grew out of local conditions, and did not represent a national movement by the Unitarian body.

The one Unitarian church in Washington is an old organization, dating from the early part of last century. When President Garfield attended the Disciples Church, or President Roosevelt attended the Reformed Church, these Washington organizations took new life, and gained, for the time at least, national attention. The same has happened now that President Taft attends the Unitarian Church of Washington.

Crowds come in such numbers that a new Unitarian church is a necessity. Furthermore, under the present minister, the Rev. N. M. B. Pierce, the institutional work has grown in a way comparable with the Sunday attendance. Hence the proposition to erect in Washington a new and larger Unitarian church, and that it may be great in size and in the scope of its work, it has been proposed that Unitarians of the whole country join in the expense.

There is some response to the proposal from Unitarians in general, but the opposition comes from some who say that Unitarians should seek to liberalize other bodies, not imitate them by erecting cathedrals. They say that unless Unitarianism does this it has no reason for being. That the Washington Unitarian church, expensive and imposing, will greatly contribute to this liberal evangelization is denied in some quarters. Besides President Taft and the local congregation in Washington, former Governor John D. Long of Massachusetts is taking active part in the Washington project. It is the conviction of the President and of the Washington Unitarians that the project can be carried through.

Methodist University in Washington

The American University, which is a Methodist project, located at the National Capital and intended for advanced education and research, has just come into possession of property worth $150,000 at least. Recently the trustees authorized a campaign to raise $1,500,000. When $500,000 of this is secured the institution is to be opened to students.

The late Bishop Hurst of the Methodist Church was the father of the University plan, and the Methodist Church formally approved it in 1892. Exceedingly valuable property, well situated, has been gotten together. There have been, however, many criticisms, both that such institution is not needed, and that if it were Methodists cannot provide it. It has even been said that Methodist bishops ought to do the work for which the Church chose them, not to engage in visionary educational schemes.

In 1908 Dr. Franklin Hamilton became chancellor, and under him some advance has been made. Criticisms have well nigh ceased, and the project of the $1,500,000 new fund has been entered upon. The Washington University is the only educational institution for which the General Conference specifically appeals to Methodists for financial help.

The Moroccan Crisis

Europe is not a little disturbed over the action recently taken by Germany in sending a war vessel to Agadir, the southern port of Morocco. This country, 313,560 square miles in extent, is situated in the extreme northwest portion of Africa and includes the territory just across the strait from Gibraltar. It is practically the last of all the "unprotected" territory in the hemisphere. "There is hardly another tract of country to which any one of the great powers can turn a wistful glance without discovering that it has been anticipated." The demands of modern trade are not less imperative than were those of former centuries, and it is not strange that Germany should seek to establish a military and mercantile base for herself in this convenient location. Nothing but the balance of power has prevented the Moroccan sultanate from falling into the hands of the powers long since. Sir Harry Johnston, the famous African explorer and administrator, writing for the Nineteenth Century, feels that the Moroccans are entitled to little commiseration. "The population of the country is pitilessly cruel, tribe against tribe, warped and spoiled by twelve centuries of civil war." This authority is of the opinion that the best thing for Morocco would be the establishment of a protectorate by France which has had such marked success in the supervision of government in Algeria and Tunis, just northeast of Morocco. However, this writer feels that Germany has just grounds for grievance against French control. France has persisted in a strict policy of high protection for French subjects in Algeria and Tunis, much to the discomfiture of Germany and, it is said, the indignation of the natives themselves. Great Britain, he states, has received compensation for any harm which may have come to her commerce through French control of Algeria and Tunis, while Germany has not, hence the basis of the latter's demand that Morocco must be under a free-trade régime. For the sake of world peace and for the development of the world's resources in barbaric countries, Sir Harry pleads that careful attention be given to the demands of Germany and German commerce. What the final solution will be is a matter of conjecture. Germany was at first inclined to be defiant in her attitude, but in the face of protests of all the principal European powers and of the United States, she has adopted a less belligerent mood, and negotiations are now pending with France, which it is expected will end the controversy. Latest reports from Europe state that while the situation is less serious than a week ago, Great Britain and France may use emphatic means to show their attitude. Unless Germany discontinues her warlike policy, France and Great Britain will send to Agadir vessels of the same size and armament as the German vessels.

A Reciprocity Victory

Since the passage of the Canadian reciprocity bill, many commendations have been received by the president and congressmen who, as they believed, were able to place the demands of the nation above local interests in their attitude toward the question. Now that the bill has been passed, the press of the country seems to have largely determined that the measure is for the best interests of the people. Papers which at first were lukewarm are now cheering with their triumphant contemporaries. Here and there is heard a prediction that the plan will fail and soon will be repealed. President Taft is sanguine of the future of reciprocity, however. "To those who opposed the bill on the ground that it would do harm to the farmers, we can only say that we who have supported the passage of the bill look forward to the test of the actual operation of the reciprocity agreement to disprove their prophecies and to allay their fears. . . . The satisfaction that actual experience in its workings will give, we confidently hope, will secure its permanence." The New York Herald is not alone when it strikes a note which is even more confident for the success which awaits the operation of the measure: "It is safe, however, to predict that the benefit that will accrue to the American and Canadian peoples from this lowering of the tariff will be so great that public sentiment on both sides of the border will further mutual concessions." One of the first results of the adoption of Canadian reciprocity has been the elevation of Mr. Taft in the public estimation. Friends and foes alike join in admiration of his resourcefulness. His friends extol him. The Sioux City Journal bespeaks the sentiments of those who opposed him in this fight: "As a Taft victory the adoption of reciprocity is the neatest and cleanest that has ever been scored. This newspaper is not fond of the bill, but it likes the resourcefulness with which President Taft fought the fight." Premier Laurier is now having to fight the same battle in the Canadian parliament. The Conservatives have lined up against it formidably, but Minister Laurier is not to be daunted. He has given them the ultimatum of an early vote or a new election in which this question will be a principal issue. The example of non-partisanship of President Taft and the Democratic party and the demonstration of the strength of public opinion in the United States are factors which the premier is confident will turn the scales in favor of reciprocity in the final vote. Then will we await, with smiling satisfaction, the fulfilment of President Taft's prophecy: "In a decade its benefits will contribute much to a greater United States and a greater Canada."

A Dilemma for Mr. Taft

The manufacturers of deleterious patent medicines, soothing syrups and candies, and the sellers of rotten meats and over-ripe eggs have worked great harm to the country. Attorney-General Wickersham recommended dismissing from the service Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, chief of the bureau of chemistry, at Washington, because of technical irregularities in the payment of a noted expert on drugs. For many years Doctor Wiley has prosecuted the perpetrators of fraud in foods and drugs with such unremitting zeal that he has made a host of enemies. The New York World declares that supporters of Doctor Wiley "have evidence to show that the prime mover is the whiskey trust, aided by manufacturers who have been fined for violation of the pure food and drugs act. There is some suspicion in the mind of the house committee on expenditures which is to investigate the charges against Doctor Wiley, for Chairman Moss stated: 'We are going to the bottom of it; we want to see who is behind it.' The facts of the case against Doctor Wiley are these: Dr. H. H. Rusby (considered the country's foremost pharmacognacist) was formerly paid $20 a day for laboratory work and $50 for court work as an expert witness. But a law was passed providing that compensation to experts should not exceed $3,500 a year, or later, $4,000 a year. Without loss to the treasury or injury to the service, but in violation of the strict letter of the law, Doctor Wiley entered into an agreement with Doctor Rusby. In the words of the New York Times: "This law was construed by the law officers of the department as meaning that the compensation of any such person employed should not exceed $9 a day, or later, $11 a day. Doctor Rusby said he could not continue his connection with the bureau at such compensation, and after much negotiation, the evidence showed, an arrangement was made whereby he was put on a basis of $1,600 a year salary, and it was left to him to do such an amount of work for the bureau as would make his salary cover an allowance of $20 a day for his expert work and $50 a day for his court work." Because he made this arrangement, the committee on personnel of the Department of Agriculture recommends that Doctor Wiley be given an opportunity to resign, that Dr. L. F. Kebler, chief of the drug laboratory, be reduced, and Doctor Rusby be dismissed. The actions of Doctor Wiley were without doubt merely the results of mistaken enthusiasm in the prosecution of his work. The country cannot afford to lose his services. We echo the words of the Philadelphia Public Ledger: "We much mistake President Taft's judicial temperament or his sense of justice if he shall permit a dereliction of the sort thus laid at Doctor Wiley's door to weigh against his great services to the government and the public. His dismissal, under the present circumstances, will be hailed as a direct triumph of the adulterators and the food fakers, who have been making every effort to bring about his downfall; and the federal government cannot afford to allow itself even to seem to be used in the interest of those against whom Doctor Wiley's official activities have been directed. The chief of the bureau of chemistry has displayed many of the faults of excessive zeal; if he has done worse, as his enemies declare, let the truth be known. But his removal on such a slender pretext as that shown in the present indictment would make a martyr of him and prove an embarrassment to the administration."

Equal Suffrage in Australia

J. S. T. McGowen, Premier of New South Wales, has arrived in this country en route home from the coronation, via the Pacific. He said that the system of equal suffrage in his Australian state had been operated most satisfactorily during the ten years it has been effective. "A higher morality has resulted," he said, "and the home life, on which the vitality of any nation depends, has been strengthened. More women vote now than do men, and, contrary to much argument, the franchise does not unsex them. It makes our women more womanly, and the result has been that there is a great decline in the infraction of laws, although the population has wonderfully increased."

Methodist

The Genius of the Wesleyan Movement.

There are three ways, according to Bishop E. R. Hendricks, in which every true Methodist church helps in the happy effort to make the material obey the spiritual. The hymns of Methodism have carried the gospel to many hearts. The example of a strong organization has been contributed by Methodism. But the first contribution of John Wesley was a theology. The bishop's statement, as given in the Central Christian Advocate, is:

The first contribution was Methodist theology, a theology of experience that can be preached. Harnack said of Luther: "The greatest thing about Luther's character was his theology—his knowledge of God." It was this personal acquaintance with God that made him such a power. Men who knew him intimately felt that they were but one remove from God. What was called Wesley's "genius for godliness" was simply this intimate acquaintance with God. He lived and spoke as one who was God's mouthpiece as he gave a "Thus saith the Lord" for his teachings. His preaching was eminently scriptural and so was sharper than any two-edged sword. It convicted and then comforted. He taught that man was sinner but that God was love who could never forget his own. He believed that there was a mansion in the Father's house for every returning prodigal, and that Heaven was big enough for all the repentant sons of God. He taught the doctrine of assurance and the witness of the Spirit. In commercial England where men were prone to say, "the world owes me a living," Wesley taught, "I owe the world a life." The Fellow of Oxford University had a consuming zeal to tell the gospel story to prisoners and outcasts, to mobs and savages in North America. By preached and printed sermons he helped to change the preacher theology of Christendom until now from whatever pulpit a glowing, tender message is given it is spoken of as a good Methodist sermon. Other churches like Methodist preaching so well that the leading pulpits in many other great churches today are filled by pastors called from Methodist churches. Moreover, it makes converts for all the other churches and still keeps itself larger than any of the rest and increases at a faster rate. Other churches claim a scarcity of preachers, but Methodism largely supplies her own needs and the needs of other pulpits. This very fact explains in part the growing spirit of Christian unity and the essential identity of the theology as preached today. Whatever the academic treatises the theology that is preached is substantially the same. This may account for the fact that in nearly all the other churches we hear of some reformed branch. But whoever heard of a reformed Methodist church? Have the Methodists no need of reforming, or are they beyond hope of being reformed?

Roman Catholic

Religion in France.

"Catholicism has lost its material domination, and has no longer any place in the state. It has lost the masses. Its temples in a thousand places are deserted." This is the opinion of a distinguished French Catholic. Does it mean that France has become indifferent to religion? Professor Jean C. Bracq thinks it does not. He is quoted by the Missionary Review of the World as saying:

The churchless are, however, far from indifferent to religious problems, and any able religious speaker will find hearers outside of the church more easily than in America. In the early part of 1907 the Mercure de France organized an extensive inquiry, asking eminent men "whether we are witnessing a dissolution or an evolution of religious thought?" The overwhelming majority of French contributors decided for the second alternative, that we are in the presence of a religious evolution. The editor of that interesting symposium wisely says it is undeniable that religious studies have taken of late years an extraordinary development; never, perhaps, since the Reformation has there been such a display of curiosity for all that concerns religion, such labors of erudition, of criticism, and of propaganda.

The feeling grows that religion has been one of the most fundamental determinants of the character of various civilizations. * * * There was never, during the preceding régime, such an intellectual zest for the problems of religion. The philosophers have given—and are still giving—a large place to this subject. They admit more and more the importance of religious feeling in the evolution of society and in comparative psychology, as well as the bearing of those feelings upon the various aspects of metaphysics. The majority of them are ready to concede the practical value of the idea of God in ethics as well as the great action of religious forces upon sociological phenomena. In the philosophical teachings of the secondary schools there is a general insistence upon the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. * * * "Atheism," says M. Georges Lyon, "is exceptional in the French philosophical world." This opinion of the distinguished rector of the Academy of Lille has been again and again endorsed before the writer by other prominent speculative thinkers.

One may say of the clergy, both secular and regular, that they have grown in intensity and earnestness where they are dominant, in intelligence and moral power where they have been in touch with the philosophical and scientific life. Politically and socially they move in a narrower range, but their real, lasting spiritual influence is greater.

Huguenots history renders to the Christian Church and to historical science a great and lasting service in being a complete refutation of the historic theory of races as the ultimate determinants of religion. The study of the rise and development of French Protestantism shows us how untenable is the assertion that Germanic nations are Protestant and that the Celtic are Catholic.

Miscellaneous

A Tribute to the Missionary.

Former Vice-President Charles W. Fairbanks was one of the speakers at the Atlantic City Endeavor convention. Mr. Fairbanks recently made a trip around the world. Unlike some other travelers, he found the missionary and he found the converts of the missionary. He was pleased with what he saw. This is his testimony given before the Endeavorers of America:

One of the most significant movements of the day is the widespread interest shown among the Christians of all denominations, in all quarters of America, in behalf of our foreign missions. There has been nothing like it since our first missionaries were sent out into heathen lands. There is much hope in it—not only for those who are the primary objects of the solicitude and effort of our own people, not alone because of the benefit which will accrue to millions in other lands, but because of the good which will come to our people as a result of their activity in work of such broad humanity. As we devote ourselves to others, as we tend to lift them up into new dignity and new life, we inevitably exalt ourselves; we strengthen our Christian fibre; we quicken our own sympathies; we give an added impulse to our energies in the cause of well-doing.

The foreign-missionary movement is awakening our churches to an appreciation of their larger duties and limitless opportunities, and they become in a very especial degree its beneficiaries; with an increasing sense of their responsibility and with an added realization of their duty will come deeper and broader consecration and increased purpose to meet them.

Missionaries from American Christian churches are among the foremost in the missionary field. They are to be found everywhere, devoting themselves to the betterment of others, to the advancement of their spiritual, intellectual, and moral welfare, with a zeal which challenges our admiration. They are carrying to the most distant parts of the earth the blessings of the Christian religion and the principles of American liberty in government, which are exerting a profound influence upon those in whose behalf they labor. They sacrifice the comforts of home and fellowship with their own countrymen in order that they may advance the welfare of people who are alien to them, and not infrequently they are the victims of the ignorance and superstition of those for whom they leave country and kindred. Many of our missionaries in years past suffered martyrdom; they placed all they had willingly upon the sacrificial altar of Christian service.

The Preacher's Subjects.

Dr. Robert F. Horton, of the Lyndhurst Road Church, London, has ceased to admire the sort of preaching that draws the crowd. There is something more important for the preacher to do than to prepare sermons to please the church tramp. Dr. Horton says:

As a young man, I chose subjects that would attract the public; but I do so no longer. I have learned to distrust crowds, and the sight of a crowded church gives me no pleasure. These crowds consist largely of people who go after the preacher who happens to be in vogue, and, after deceiving him into thinking he is doing really good and lasting work, leave him to follow a newer star. True success consists, in my own mind, in the training of individual character and in the cohesion of the church as an organized spiritual body.

Governor Wilson's View of the Church's Business.

The notion that because a man has succeeded in getting himself elected to a high office he is qualified to give advice to the church is not always held by those who know our governors and our representatives in the national congress. But most people are ready to consider what Woodrow Wilson has to say. He is a scholar, an able executive, and a man of character. His high estimate of the church is thus expressed:

The business of the church is not to pity men, because it knows that men, if they would take it, have the richest and completest inheritance that is possible to conceive, and that rather than being deserving of pity, they are to be challenged to assert in themselves those things which will make them independent of pity. No man who has recovered the integrity of his soul is any longer the object of pity, and it is to enable him to recover that lost integrity that the Christian church is organized. To my thinking, the Christian church stands at the center not only of philanthropy, but at the center of education, at the center of science, at the center of philosophy, at the center of polities; in short, at the center of sentient and thinking life. And the business of the Christian church, of the Christian minister, is to show the spiritual relations of men to the greater world processes, whether they be physical or spiritual. It is nothing less than to show the plan of life and men's relation to the plan of life.

The Personal Religious Life of Jesus

It has been a common habit to designate certain acts as religious and certain others as secular. A preacher who was insisting that a church pay his back salary said, "This is not a matter of religion; it is purely a business proposition." There are many protests against putting religion into one set of actions and of excluding it from others. These protests are strengthened by a study of the life of Jesus. It is impossible to say of him: "This act was religious and this was secular." The spirit of religion was displayed in all that he did. We may, however, select certain exercises and study them with a view to learning what they meant to him and what they may mean to us.

Prayer was an important part of the life of Jesus. It was not a question of stated seasons but of daily need. His God was always near and was ready to hear the petition of his children. When popular opinion ran in one direction and duty lay in another, Jesus withdrew from the multitude to pray. Those who thought they were his friends and the friends of God saw in him at one time a wonder worker who could feed them and who could deliver them from the oppressor. They turned their thought away from morals and religion as manifested in transformed lives and in patient acceptance of the will of God and cried out for the externals of religious and political power. Jesus sent away the misguided multitude and sought the presence of God in prayer.

Jesus prayed when the cross was just before him. Not long ago the people of one of our states petitioned the governor to appoint a day of prayer for rain. The editor of a daily paper very properly raised the question as to what these people had been doing, whether they had not thought of praying until the danger of crop failure confronted them. Spasms of prayer in the presence of threatened personal or national loss are not very edifying. But one to whom communion with God is habitual will frame his prayers to fit his circumstances. We ought to ask God to help us in time of need. Hence we find the Master agonizing in prayer on the night of his arrest.

It was the will of God and not a private ambition that Jesus put first in his petitions. The lesson of submission to the divine will is hard to learn, but once it is learned many heavy burdens are lifted from our shoulders. The laws of this universe are beneficent. We are a part of a spiritual order. We get our importance from our connection with this realm of spirit. If we attempt to ignore it or to live in opposition to it, we have nothing but anxiety and weariness for our reward. The Master has taught us how to act when our inclinations run counter to the will of God expressed in the on-going of the universe and in the progress of man.

The Jewish Scriptures were studied with care by Jesus. He was not bound in his interpretations by scholastic rules. He had the spiritual insight which enabled him to bring out the truth in a passage. Ability to quote Scripture is not the same thing as ability to understand it. Many a scriptural sermon does not have a single exact quotation from the Bible. It has the thought and sentiment of the Bible in it. On the other hand some of the most unscriptural sermons ever preached have consisted largely of verses from the Bible. Jesus knew the words of Scripture and he knew their import.

The synagogue service in the time of Jesus was doubtless often lacking in sincerity and inspiration. Yet Jesus was regular in his attendance. It is easy to find good citizens who believe in the religion of Jesus and who stay away from the church because they think formality and mediocrity control it. The error of these men is that they do not recognize that there is a good deal of drudgery in religion as well as in business and that the strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak even in the worship of the house of God. It is the business of the strong to lead and to give spirit to worship. If any one might have been excused from attendance upon the services of the synagogue, that one was Jesus. But he came to minister, not to be ministered to, and he went where the people were trying to worship God.

The liberality of Jesus is that of one who gives himself. Some men give in order to rid themselves of the importunities of solicitors. Others given because the entanglements of business leave them no choice. Still others build churches and schools and give to public enterprises that they may have a name among men. The disciple of Jesus who knows the mind of his Master is liberal with his possession and his talents because he delights in seeing human beings pass from the bondage of ignorance and sin into the light and liberty of the sons of God. Conditions of the Filipinos

Civic, social and religious conditions in the Philippines are dealt with by the Rev. J. L. McLaughlin, field agent of the American Bible Society at Manila, in his report just to hand. In the civic situation Filipinos are pushing, he says, the Filipino independence idea, but Mr. McLaughlin believes that not so much anti-United States as pro-Filipino. He thinks the latter not wholly ungrateful for all that has been done for them.

In social affairs the cockpit still rules, the government permitting it, although the old dances are beginning to give place to literary societies. The independent Filipino Catholic Church, founded by Aglipay, seems to have reached its high-water mark and does not grow. American bishops have been placed over Roman Catholic dioceses, and French and Belgian friars have come in, until it is the belief of this Bible Society representative that the Catholic Church, the regular one of three hundred years' service in the Philippines, was never stronger there than today, and that there were never so many friars and nuns as now.

Presbyterian, Methodist, Episcopal, and other churches have the Luzon and northern field well covered, and are now looking into southern islands. Baptists are in the south, but all of Samar, Masbate, Palawan, most of Mindanao, and several small but important islands are as yet untouched. Immediately following American occupation large numbers of Filipinos flocked into the Protestant churches. Not by any means have all of these been held there. They have gone into infidelity, agnosticism and other isms and ologies. Yet on the whole, thinks Mr. McLaughlin, the evangelical work has been encouraging and has accomplished much.

In the early days many Filipinos bought very cheap editions of the Bible, largely to gain some idea of what a book so long prohibited contained. Enormous sales in numbers of copies were recorded. Curiosity being satisfied, sales will decline. Editions of Old and New Testaments in Tagalog, Ibanag, Pampanga, Ilocano and Panayan are to be printed at once, and it is found that Japanese printers are best for the work. So marked are differences between Filipino dialects that no classical or standard edition of the Bible for the whole islands may ever be possible. The society is working on the task of "A Bible in every home in the Philippine islands," and claims to have accomplished this in seven of the largest cities.

Mr. McLaughlin concludes that only the best preachers and teachers must come to the Philippines hereafter. Some not the best had to answer six or eight years ago. Today, so marked is the improvement from the public school training, that the average ability of religious teachers must be higher than formerly. The Catholic Church is doing zealous work, and Protestant churches must, if they succeed, throw in their best men and literature.

Texas' Struggle for Freedom

BY EDWIN C. BOYNTON.

The state of Texas has just closed the most tremendous battle of the ballots ever waged upon her soil. On July 22, a prohibitory amendment to the state constitution was passed upon by the voters with the result that out of a total vote of 47,299, the saloons and their allies were victorious by the narrow majority of 6,037. It is all but certain, too, that this result was achieved only by dint of enormous frauds in some of the southern counties where a heavy Mexican and negro element invariably lends itself in all such contests to illegal manipulation. This factor eliminated, and we have the gratifying assurance that the legal electorate of the state has registered a prohibition majority of from 20,000 to 30,000. It is indeed not improbable that the election will be contested by the friends of the amendment, and the saloon yet banished from Texas' soil.

The campaign just closed was unique. For over ten years the prohibition banner has been advancing in Texas along local option lines, until 166 counties were wholly "dry," fifty-eight partly "dry" and partly "wet," and only twenty-one wholly "wet." More than one-half the population of the state were living in territory wholly under prohibition, four-fifths of the remainder in mixed territory, and the remaining one-tenth given over to the delights of the presence of some 3,575 saloons. In such a situation, the antiprohibition leaders had to abandon to a large extent the old battle cry of "personal liberty," and in order to keep any of the "dry" counties in line against the amendment, were compelled to become the out-and-out champions of a form of prohibition. Whereas, in elder days, we had been met in local option campaigns by the contention that if successful in the same we "could not make prohibition prohibit," the very platform of the anti's in this state-wide contest declared that in such local option territory the law had been enforced and drunkenness was on the decrease. This pronouncement compelled every anti-prohibition orator in the state to defend local prohibition on the one hand and a state-wide license regulation of the traffic in "wet" territory on the other. The exposition by prohibitionists, of this Mr. Facing-both-Ways attitude, was merciless, and so grew upon the consideration of the masses that, had the campaign continued two weeks longer, it is unquestionable that not even fraud itself could have prevented a decisive prohibition victory on the very face of the returns. As it was, only one "dry" county of importance was lost by the advocates of state-wide abolition, and that by a narrow margin. They, furthermore, during the pending of the amendment itself, invaded some four or five "wet" counties and carried them for prohibition under the existing local option law.

The change in Texas in sentiment and conditions has been marvelous in the past twenty-five years. In 1887 only four counties were under local option. The prohibitory amendment was that year defeated by 92,000 majority, the antis polling some 222,000 votes. The prohibition vote alone this year was nearly 231,000. In 1887 the state tax rate was twenty-five cents on the one hundred dollars; last year it was four cents. As county after county has carried prohibition the local tax rate has steadily declined until today, the average county tax on the hundred dollars is forty-one and one-half cents for the "dry" counties, forty-three and three-fourths cents for those partly "dry" and forty-six and one-fifth cents for those wholly "wet." Anti-prohibition figures submitted a few days prior to the election show, on analysis, an average of fourteen convicts per each "dry" county, nineteen per each mixed county and eighty-five per each license county. The day has passed when Texas can be written down as the land of the desperado. Her four millions of people have learned or are learning the way of freedom from crime, insanity and exorbitant taxation.

The contribution of the Disciples to our great temperance movement has been notable. The father of the present local option provision of the state constitution was E. L. Dohoney, a member of the Disciples church at Paris, Texas. The great defender of the local option statutes on the floor of the Texas senate was W. K. Homan, later editor of the "Christian Courier," who, as lawyer and preacher, battled for both local and state prohibition, and in almost every issue of the "Courier" had an editorial argument closing with the slogan, "The Saloon is Doomed!" Sterling P. Strong, of the Oak Cliff Christian Church of Dallas, after serving two years as superintendent of the state Anti-Saloon League, was the general of our forces in Dallas County in this campaign; Arthur W. Jones, of Texas, a former pastor of the same congregation, was our county secretary. Every pastor among us, was, without exception, a known friend of the amendment.

Prohibitionists here are not discouraged but rather hopeful. We have shown the forces of liquordom a strength they had doubted we possessed. Tarrant County, with the saloon city of Ft. Worth, of 90,000 or more population, went against the amendment by only 1,700 majority; Dallas County, with the license city of Dallas of over 100,000 population, gave a meager 255 majority to the liquor cause; McLennan County with licensed Waco, of 30,000 inhabitants, registered an adverse majority of only thirteen. The great prohibition counties in some instances went for the amendment in ratios of two and three to one. We are united, vigorous and aggressive. We believe that of the states of the union now facing the liquor problem as a question of legislation Texas will be the first to solve it in terms of constitutional freedom.

Living Conditions Among the Poor

The poor on the great West Side of Chicago, according to recent investigations, are about as wretchedly housed and living in as filthy condition as are the down-trodden in some of the big Eastern cities. The housing and public health standards on the West Side are characterized as indecent, illegal, and grossly inadequate in a report just completed by two women investigators. That the living conditions in the densely populated tenement and lodging-house districts are a public menace and shame and must be alleviated by municipal action is their assertion. The women sociologists made a house-to-house canvass of ten West Side blocks, including districts near Hull House and in other sections. They found the following specific violations of the tenement code: That 207 cellar apartments were used for living purposes. That 2,703 rooms were each under seventy square feet in area. That 3,132 rooms were under eight and one-half feet high. That in 431 rooms the window area was less than 10 per cent of the floor area. That 54 rooms were windowless, and 258 practically windowless. That 1,433 families were without toilet facilities in their apartments. That 3,855 sleeping-rooms were crowded beyond the legal limit. The investigators declare that "the appropriation made for the inspectional purposes of the health department in Chicago is grossly inadequate, and, if it is compared with appropriations for similar work in New York, little short of ridiculous. Hull House has made a great reputation for itself by giving dances and dramatic entertainments for the lowly of the neighborhood; perhaps it would be a better move to improve their living and sleeping quarters so many of them would live longer.

FAULT BROUGHT HOME.

Dr. James T. Docking, the president of Rust University, once discussed, in a Fourth of July addess at Holly Springs, Miss., the treason of Benedict Arnold.

"Arnold's fault," he said, "was as plainly brought home to him as the fault of Fenimore Cooper's friend.

"Fenimore Cooper gave a friend a copy of his last work, inscribing on the fly leaf the words:

"'To John Blank, with the author's affection and esteem.'

"A few months later Cooper came upon this same book at a second-hand dealer's. He bought it in and sent it back to his friend again with a second inscription:

"'This volume, purchased at a second-hand shop, is re-presented to John Blank with renewed affection and reiterated expressions of esteem.'"—Los Angeles Times.

GIVE NO CHECKS.

On one of the big Chinese railroads (Pekin-Hankow) they refuse to give checks for the trunks in the baggage car, writes Frederic S. Isham, the novelist, from the Celestial Kingdom. The reason given is ingenuous.

"When the road first opened we gave checks, all right, American fashion," said a "high-up" Chinese official to the novelist. "But we had to stop."

"Why?"

"One man, he lost his trunk, and made trouble for us. After that we no give checks."

Rome and Naples

The Eternal City and the City of the Flaming Mountain

BY J. S. DICKERSON.

ROME sets the imagination on fire. What a city it was! What a city it is! What a city it will be! To wander among its ruins is to reveal the grandeur which ruled in this imperial capital of the ancient world. The Romans may not have been great inventors in art and architecture, but they were masterly imitators, and they were magnificent builders! Even after Goths have destroyed and Vandals have ruined and Romans have burned and Time has gnawed these temples, whose columns stand as monuments to Rome's genius for construction, they still are profoundly impressive. The Roman citizen who stalked through the huge arches, between the rows of Corinthian columns, and who climbed to his seat in the Colosseum, must have been a man of power. It required a man of power to conceive such buildings as those whose ruins even now proclaim their dignity and impressiveness. It called forth the energies of a powerful man to set up those great piles of marble and brick, and having erected them, there to plan for their retention in a world where every nation's spears were pointed, like its roads, toward Rome. Rome appears commanding and great in history, but more commanding and far greater when one reads her history told in triumphal arches and many-columned forum and blood-stained amphitheater. "Rome stands for so many things enveloped in such tranquil and serene majesty," wrote Charles Gounod in 1839, "that it is impossible at first approach to suspect its prodigious ensemble or it inexhaustible riches. Its past as well as its present, its present as well as its destiny, make it the capital not merely of the country but of humanity."

There is almost nothing in modern Rome to remind one of old Rome—save old Rome itself. That is hardly true either, for the "tawny Tiber" still flows through the city, the eternal hills remain, and the old roads lead out to the campagna, and the names of avenues call to mind at their every turn the days when Rome was mistress of the world. But the Rome of today, aside from the heroic ruins of the city of the Cæsars, is not, as a rule, built upon the models of classical architecture. The majority of buildings are Italian, not Greek. Undoubtedly there are more banks in New York built like Greek temples than there are buildings of this kind in Rome. The newer public buildings are thoroughly modern. The immense monument to Victor Emmanuel II., although pure Greek in its architecture, yet in its adaptation of this style to its purpose is as modern as the buildings one sees on the Champs Elysées, in Paris. This great structure, 428 feet long, 440 feet wide, and 266 feet high, with its sculptures and decorations, only partly visible when the writer was in the city, is the most noteworthy architectural triumph of modern Rome. It cost over $8,000,000.

Old Rome and New Romans.

To be in Rome on the fiftieth anniversary of new Italy, when soldiers were marching, and bands were playing, and the king and queen were driving through the flag-decorated streets, and everybody with his wife and children, and all the relatives besides, were out in their best "Sunday-go-to-meeting" clothes, was a most fortunate coincidence. The modern Romans appeared happy and good-natured and well-dressed. The king, as he drove out to the grounds of the international exposition, was cheered by enthusiastic thousands. The exposition was formally "opened" on that day. The exposition was "opened," but none of the buildings were open, as many of them had not progressed far enough even to be roofed over!

But visitors do not cross the seas to study the new city which surrounds and surmounts the old capital. It is the stained Arch of Constantine, the Arch of Titus with its bas-relief showing the Jewish captives bearing the seven-branched candlestick from the Temple at Jerusalem, the Forum, the temples, and the Colosseum where our Christian ancestors fought with beasts, these are the places where the very stones have been worn hollow by pilgrim feet. The Parthenon gives one a lasting impression of the ancient world, but the ruins of ancient Rome, although they do not reach back so far into the past as those which remain on the Acropolis at Athens, even more sensibly take back the beholder into the dim past. They extend over so much more ground and are related to so many phases of life, not only religious, but political and social, that one feels that he gets even nearer to the ancients here in Rome than in Athens. But none of the high enthusiasm called forth by Athens' noble hill diminished even when one stood enthusiastic and enthralled beneath the Arch of Septimus Severus and looked across the wide-spread foundations and gazed upon the royal fragments of royal buildings that once were the pride of Rome.

The City of a Thousand Churches.

If Rome was once the political capital of the world, even to a greater extent was the Eternal City the religious capital of the world. Although the political power of the Catholic Church has been curtailed with the growth of religious freedom, Rome remains a religious capital, if no longer the religious capital. Here the pope lives in a palace such as no king occupies. Here are Catholic schools of many kinds. Here are the fountain heads of innumerable streams of papal influence which flow to every corner of the world. Here, most noticeable of all, are almost numberless church buildings. Some of them were built centuries ago. Some of them are new enough to be incomplete, although, for that matter, even the older ones are still in process of construction and reconstruction, of decoration and redecoration. Upon them all countless millions of money have been lavished, and upon them millions are still being expended. They do not impress one as places of worship so much as temples built to commemorate events and to mark supposably sacred spots. They are to be found all over Rome. They occupy some of the most imposing sites in the city and they face small and insignificant streets. They perpetuate improbable legends; they recall mediæval superstitions; they enshrine palpably fraudulent holy relics. Some of them are architecturally attractive, some of them almost attractively ugly. The interiors of some of them are bare and repulsive, some of them brilliantly beautiful. Some of them are decorated with priceless statuary, paintings, and mosaics, and one at least with dead men's bones—various parts of the skeletons of monks being arranged in fantastic patterns upon chapel walls and ceilings.

St. Peter's.

Most magnificent of all, of course, is St. Peter's. It has been described again and again. Yet no description has told it all, for no description can tell it all. It must be seen. And yet it cannot be seen, at least no one, even with oft-repeated visits, can begin to comprehend its vastness and its size, or can fully realize the bewildering multiplicity of its monuments and mural paintings and carved pillars. One may lose himself among its many chapels—and one invariably loses all sense of time as he studies the meretricious Bernini sculptures, the beautiful marbles, the rich altars, the mosaic reproductions of the masterpieces of world-famous painters, the elaborate monuments, and above all the magnificent dome whose lantern is over 400 feet above him. And if one recovers himself sufficiently to notice how many hours have slipped by since last he knew he possessed a watch, he is apt to forget himself again as he stops to study the thousands of people who appear to be forever wandering among the 148 columns and to be continually traversing the 600 feet of pavement extending from the imposing central entrance with its brazen doors, through the many chapels, around the great altar, nearly 100 feet in height, to the furthermost tribune, where rests the bronze throne said to enclose the episcopal chair of Saint Peter.

Although the building is doubtless the most magnificent in the world, although its stupendous size almost benumbs one's powers of adequate admiration, the feeling cannot be repressed that, after all, $50,000,000 is too vast an amount to remain invested in one pile whose primary object is to impress the world with the power of Roman Catholicism, and $40,000 a year too much to maintain its magnificence. But, no matter what doubts rise in our Protestant minds, St. Peter's is impressive beyond words to describe.

Then there are the other 999 churches, more or less. A month might be spent in visiting them—St. Paul's Outside the Walls, the finest of the modern churches; the Pantheon, with its wonderful dome, built by Agrippa and consecrated as a church in 609; Santa Maria in Aracœli, where is the bejeweled Bambino (the alleged health-giving doll); St. John Lateran, the principal church of Rome in the day of Constantine; St. Peter in Chains, where Michael Angelo's Moses, the most wonderful piece of sculpture in Rome, if not in the world, may be seen; Santa Maria Maggiore, the largest of the eighty churches dedicated to the Virgin; and others which fairly reek with antiquity, oppress with superstition, disgust with tawdry adornment, or carry the beholder to the seventh heaven of æsthetic joy.

The Pope's Boarding House.

A whole chapter might be given to the Vatican, which houses the feeble, benignant Italian peasant, who is at the head of the great, powerful, politico-religious organization we know as the papacy. In this palace of twenty courts and a thousand rooms, a building 1,151 feet long and 767 feet wide, are famous religious paintings known the world over. Raphael's "Transfiguration," Titian's "Coronation of the Virgin," Murillo's "Marriage of St. Catharine;" not to speak of the famous Apollo Belvedere and the Laocoön, and numerous other canvases and sculptures, are shrines before which artists stand with awe and laymen with enthusiasm flaming in their souls.

The Sistine Chapel contains Michael Angelo's famous frescoes—marvels in size, miracles of drawing and composition, evidence of almost superhuman industry and painstaking. They have unquestionably lost much of their original effectiveness as paintings. As works of art, intended to afford æsthetic pleasure, they are most depressing and sometimes almost grotesque. If this be artistic heresy, make the most of it!

And then the art galleries—they must be left undescribed by even a few sentences. So, too, must pass unnoticed by this "feeble, faltering" pen the obelisks, the fountains, the parks, the museums, the catacombs, the Protestant cemetery, the Castle of St. Angelo, the American missions, and the art schools.

"It is said" that if one drinks of the pure water from the campagna which flows continually through the Trevi Fountain, near the Palazzo Poli, and piously tosses a coin into the basin, his return to Rome is absolutely ensured. The writer has drunk from the fountain, he has a faithful and beloved witness to prove that his soldo safely fell into the sweet water which blesses and cheers the Romans. He, therefore, may surely expect once more to visit the Eternal City and then, let him hope, that he may be permitted to tell of some of its seductive sights, of whose charms rigid column rules, if not editorial rules, will not permit him now to enlarge.

Naples has made a virtue out of a calamity. The cholera, which scared away people, and, what is worse to a city's prosperity, scared away tourists' money, led to a general cleaning up, and digging up, and tearing down, and whitewashing up and down, so that what was once known as the dirtiest city in Europe is now fairly clean. When one has seen the famous Bay of Naples—and he sees it to good advantage as the "Arabic" steams to her dock—and has visited the wonderful aquarium, with its octopus, as real as if it had just come swimming out of a newspaper cartoon, and has seen the noted museum with its treasures from Pompeii, he has about "done" Naples.

As the man who lives on Manhattan Island says about Boston: Boston is a fine town; it has so many ways by which to reach New York, so with reference to Naples: the most interesting Neapolitan sites are Pompeii, Vesuvius, the Island of Capri, and the towns along the sea. Everybody has either seen Pompeii and Vesuvius or read about them, but everybody has not ridden by motor-car to Amalfi! No more magnifique and wunderbar (stock of English adjectives exhausted in previous paragraphs) half-a-hundred-and-more miles of road may be found in all Europe. The trip consumed a day, no minute of which was without its thrill, as the rare vision extended over the blue, sail-dotted Mediterranean, up the many-hued mountain sides, which buttressed the smooth road, winding over bridge-spanned gorges, through tunnels and into little villages that cling to the rocks or nestle at their base near the sea. The view from the old Capuchin monastery at Amalfi photographs itself on the memory like the scenes of joyous childhood.

A day amid the beauties of the Riviera, upon the Corniche Road, and in the enchanting and hellish Monte Carlo, where nature smiles and good morals weep, where sunshine ever beams and where bankrupt gamblers with awful regularity take their lives, and then the "Arabic's" bow is headed toward Liverpool.

"The rare vision extended over the sail-dotted sea, up the many-hued mountain sides, which buttressed the road, winding over bridge-spanned gorges and into little villages that cling to the rocks."

God's Immanence in Nature

And I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean, and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man;
A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things. Therefore am I still
A lover of the meadows, and the woods,
And mountains: and of all that we behold
From this green earth; of all the mighty world
Of eye and ear—both what they half create,
And what perceive; well pleased to recognize
In nature and the language of the sense,
The anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse,
The guide, the guardian of my of heart, and soul
Of all my moral being.

The Moral Leaders of Israel

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XXXIII. Ezekiel's Program of Revival

August 20. Text for Special Study, Ezek. 47.

1. JEHOVAH AND THE NATIONS.

It was stated in our last study that the first half of the Book of Ezekiel, chapters 1-24, is occupied with the ministry of the prophet in Babylonia, between the date of his call in 592 B. C. and the fall of Jerusalem in 586. In this period the exiled Judeans in Babylonia had manifested an unwillingness or incapacity to understand the meaning of their unhappy experience as bearing on the future of the nation. Some of them were resentful and sullen, declaring that God had forsaken his own people and was ungracious and indifferent. Others of them insisted that the journey to the east was only a light episode in their career, and that they would soon return to their land.

Against both of these moods Ezekiel had protested. He felt himself to be a watchman and shepherd of the exiles. Their welfare was upon his heart. Their mistaken views he sought to correct. He taught them that they were not suffering needlessly nor in vain. He tried to make them understand that the evil practices which had weakened the city of Jerusalem and led to its overthrow were still the habit of its people, and that yet further discipline was necessary before they could hope for the approval of their God.

But such efforts were in vain. The people gave the prophet no heed. They were filled with their own false optimism, and took lightly the events of the time. Then it was that Ezekiel abandoned the work of public preaching, and remained quiet. It would seem that for many months he withdrew himself from the direct attempt to accomplish his purpose, and waited for hastening events to bring his word to pass. He knew that it was only a question of time when Jerusalem would fall. All the signs of the times assured him that the end could not be delayed long. If the people would not believe, but persisted in their foolish optimism, there was nothing to do but to wait for the blow of disillusionment to fall.

In the meantime, however, the prophet occupied himself with a series of messages relating to the neighboring nations and Jehovah's rulership over them. Like Amos of old, Ezekiel tried to make clear the world-wide rule of God as over against the opinion, so prevalent among the Hebrews, that He was only the God of the territory and people of Palestine. In a series of oracles against the kingdoms of Ammon, Moab, Edom Philistia, Phoenicia and Egypt, he made clear the divine purpose to vindicate his authority and righteousness in all the world. He taught that nations could not practice injustice and cruelty without paying the penalty, and that the rule of God was as direct and searching among the so-called heathen as in Israel.

It is not probable that these national messages were ever delivered to the people who are named in them. Rather were they intended to warn the exiles over the heads of their former neighbors. They may have been spoken to some groups of the people, but it is more probable that they were merely written and passed about for such effect as they might create by their reading and discussion. (Chapters 25-32.)

2. THE FATAL NEWS.

It was in the twelfth year of the captivity, and therefore some months after the actual fall of Jerusalem, that a messenger arrived at Telabib with the direful tidings that the city was smitten (33:21). No doubt he had been a long time on the way, and perhaps he had visited other exile communities before he came to this one. The effect of his evil news was such a shock as could hardly have been imagined. The word of the prophet predicting this event had never been taken seriously. Ezekiel had been deemed a dreamer and misanthrope. Now the worst had happened, and there was no spirit with which to bear it. The people were prostrated with the tidings. It was too awful to be believed. Instantly their hopes were dashed to the ground. The bitter cup of disappointment and despair was held to their lips.

From this time forth the prophet began a campaign of encouragement and reconstruction. He affirmed that there was no occasion for despair. He showed them that their future depended wholly upon themselves and their loyalty to God. The fall of the city had shown him to be a true prophet, and they might count as confidently upon his promise of their revival as upon his former prediction of disaster. More than this, he insisted that the claim of those who were left in Judah by the fortunes of war, the claim that they were the rightful owners of the territory, was invalid, and that the true Israel, which should possess the land in the future, was the obedient and righteous part (chapts. 33, 34).

3. GLOWING HOPES.

At once the prophet took up the task of preparing the minds of the exiles for the happy future. As soon as Jerusalem fell those enemies, the neighboring people, particularly the Edomites, had crowded in to take advantage of the ruin wrought by Babylon. Ezekiel now asserts that these foes shall be driven out and the land purified in prospect of the nation's return. Prosperity was to come back, the population to be swelled to great numbers, and the fruitfulness of the soil increased far beyond its former condition (chapts. 35-36:15).

But even more urgent is the need that the nation shall be cleansed and made worthy to become the masters of the renewed land. Their conduct for generations had been such as to defile it. All that must now be changed. It was only a clean, holy people who could come to the possession of a holy land like Judah. The water of lustration was to be poured upon them, as in the ceremonial defilements of their ritual life. A new mind and heart must be given them, if they are to be accepted in the new era.

And the despairing reflection that the nation was past hope, dead and dispersed the prophet answers with the weird and wonderful picture of the valley of bones, dry and scattered, on which the breath of God was breathed and they instantly came together, and a host of men stood up (chap. 37). With such vivid promises of cleansing, restoration and protection Ezekiel closes this urgent portion of his message (36:16; 39:15).

4. THE IDEAL SANCTUARY.

But it was not enough to give such general pictures of the bright days to come. The prophet goes further, and provides the people with a sketch of the new sanctuary, that is to arise upon the ruins of the one now lying desolate and forsaken. It was to be greater and more beautiful than the one reared by Solomon of old. And it was to be the center of a worship far more elaborate than any hitherto known. In a vision Ezekiel looked upon this fair building, and in imagination measured its courts and rooms, and marked the location of its various features. In the vicinity of this great building the tribes of the reunited and purified nation were to have their cantonments.

With careful elaboration our author describes the details of the new religious community. The use of the various parts of the sacred building, the duties of the Levites and the priests, the apportionment of the land, the rights and duties of the ruler, the offerings of the new state, and the coming of Jehovah in power to reoccupy his temple, are set forth with enthusiasm and definiteness.

The boldness and force of this prophecy of Judah's revival cannot easily be overestimated. It was nothing less than audacious, in a time when Jerusalem was in ruins, her foes in possession, and her people scattered, to affirm with such confidence the rise of the city to even more than her former glory, and to an architectural magnificence which she had never known. Such a prediction is to be compared only with Isaiah's bold affirmation that Jerusalem should not fall, at the very moment when the forces of Sennacherib were thundering at her gates; or with the boldness of Jeremiah, who bought property at Anothoth at the very time when the enemy seemed about to make all holdings in Judah worthless.

5. THE RIVER OF GOD.

(Chap. 47.)

Perhaps one of the most beautiful and significant parts of the message to Ezekiel regarding the revival of Judah is the picture of an ideal river, flowing forth from the sanctuary of God to sweeten and fertilize all the region to the east. At first it was but a little stream. Then it grew deeper and mightier till it swept onward into the wilderness, making fruitful all the land, and even freshening the salt and stagnant depths of the Dead Sea.

No more suggestive symbol of the grace of God, of which the source is the church through the ages, can be found in holy Scripture. It is worthy of a place of note in the classics of religion, and rightfully forms the basis of the conception of the River of Water of Life in the Revelation.

"East the forefront of habitations holy Gleamed to Engedi, shone to Eneglaim:
Softly thereout and from thereunder slowly
Wandered the waters, and delayed, and came.

Then the great stream, which having seen he showeth,
Hid from the wise but manifest to him,
Flowed and arose, as when Euphrates floweth,
Rose from the ankles, till a man might swim.

Even with so soft a surge and an increasing,
Drunk of the sand and thwarted of the clod,
Stilled and astir and checked and neverceasing
Spreadeth the great wave of the grace of God.

Bears to the marshes and bitter places
Healing for hurt and for their poisons balm,
Isle after isle in infinite embraces Floods and enfolls and fringes with the palm."

—F. W. H. Myers, "St. Paul."

Notes From the Foreign Society

James M. Tisdale, of Covington, Ky., gives $1,200 for the erection of a chapel at Chuchow, China. This is to be for the native Chinese Church. He gives this in memory of his brother, Walter Scott Tisdale. This is the second gift Brother Tisdale has made this year. He gave $5,000 for the erection of the Tisdale Hospital at Chuchow. This has been built in memory of his two sisters, Mrs. Aria and Mrs. Mary Tisdale. O. G. Hertzog, who is visiting his daughter, Mrs. Osgood, at Chuchow, has superintended the construction of the hospital, and will likewise construct the chapel. Dr. Elliott Osgood is the medical missionary in charge of the hospital. He is the only physician among 2,000,000 people. The hospital and chapel will be the evangelistic center for that great district. These generous gifts have brought much joy to the missionaries, and no one can measure the good that these institutions will accomplish. Brother Tisdale is very happy in this investment in the cause of China.

Dr. Royal J. Dye, of Africa, landed in America on July 11. He is now at home with his family at Eureka, Ill. He has improved in health, but we are sorry to report a very serious accident which happened to him since his arrival. He was opening a box in unpacking his goods, and a piece of flying steel penetrated his eye. He hurried to Chicago and had the particle removed. The accident threatened the destruction of the sight of one eye. The last reports are more favorable and the doctor hopes to save the vision.

A good woman in Ohio sends $2,000 on the annuity plan and another woman sends $700 from Indiana, given in the same way.

The following from Professor H. B. Hulbert in the Missionary Review of the World, is so good and true that we copy it: "Take out of the Bible the Deity of Christ, the virgin birth, miracle and atonement, and the resurrection, and the foreign missionary might as well pack up his effects and come home. Open a Bible before an educated Chinese, and tell him that these great doctrines, while apparently taught in the Book, are interpolations or mistakes or myths, and he will tell you to take it home and revise it until it says what it means, and then bring it to him for consideration. Or more likely still, he would say that with these doctrines removed there is nothing left but pure Confucianism. If Christ was not the very Son of God, he was by the statement of the book less than Confucious, for the latter never claimed divine sonship."

D. E. Dannenberg, F. E. Meigs and Miss Nina Palmer will sail for China in October. Brother Meigs hopes to be entirely restored to health by that time. He goes back as dean of the Bible Department of the Nankin University. Mr. and Mrs. Guy W. Sarvis sailed for China on July 26. After learning the Chinese language, Brother Sarvis will teach in Nankin University. The Chinese language is very difficult and very little can be done in the native tongue under two years.

A good woman and her husband in North Tonawanda, N. Y., take up the support of their own native evangelist in China at $75 a year. They are people of very moderate resources, and the support of this evangelist takes a tenth of their income. This good sister writes as follows: "Your letter came yesterday and it brought tears of joy to know that we could do this little part for the Master, who did so much for me." It would add to the happiness of thousands to do some specific work like this in heathen lands.

The Foreign Society is soon to issue two very important books, one by Professor Alva W. Taylor, on "The Social Victories of Foreign Missions," and one by Mrs. A. L. Shelton on "The Tibetan Work at Batang." Mr. Taylor's book will be a mission study volume.

The regular receipts of the Foreign Society at this writing are $15,000 behind those of last year. There is also a heavy loss in annuity gifts. We trust that the month of August will see an excellent gain. Less than two months are left before the year closes. Let everyone help.

A Jew's Tribute to Christianity

JULIUS ROSENWALD.

There may be something more than mere philanthrophy in Julius Rosenwald's gifts to the Y. M. C. A. to uplift the colored youth of the country.

It may be that he remembers the slur that Miriam cast upon the Ethiopian wife of Moses and is seeking in this way, to wipe out an old score which has stood against the colored race for centuries. At any rate, Mr. Rosenwald is greatly interested in the uplift of the colored race and finds that Jews and Negroes can enter with sympathetic relations for both have been in slavery and both alike have suffered because of race prejudice.

Mr. Rosenwald is at the head of one of the greatest business organizations in the world. He is president of the Jewish Associated Charities of Chicago and is said to devote more than half of each working day to philanthropic enterprises. Some time ago the company of which he is president gave $100,000 toward meeting the expense of erecting a Y. M. C. A. building near its establishment in Chicago. He has lately made a personal offer of $25,000 toward the construction of a Y. M. C. A. building in any city which will raise $75,000 additional for a building for colored men. Prefacing this offer, which was made at a large meeting of colored men in Chicago, Mr. Rosenwald said: "You may think it strange that I, a Jew, should encourage the building of Y. M. C. A. institutions, but I do not believe there is a better work done anywhere in the world than the work done by the Y. M. C. A., and for this reason I am glad to see the Association prosper."

The Negroes of Chicago met the conditions of his offer in ten days and other cities have fallen into line so that Mr. Rosenwald has written his check for $25,000 each month since this offer was made.

It is evident, however, that there are not many cities in which a building of such dimensions can be erected or is needed, but it is hoped that when the limitations of this type are reached Mr. Rosenwald may make a corresponding offer for cities on a smaller scale or whose colored population falls below this specified limit.

Mr. Rosenwald's latest offer to the Young Men's Christian Association is a gift of $50,000 toward a men's hotel to be conducted under Christian auspices. On announcing this gift Mr. Rosenwald said: "What better work can there be than to take the young man who comes to Chicago from the country, give him a decent place to live until he finds himself, and then find a home for him out in the remoter parts of the city? Just think of what that means to the young man. Why, it is simply appalling when you think of the number of young men who, with the best of intentions, get into the worst kind of environment in these terrible lodging houses, driven there because there is no possibility for them to go anywhere else, the only place that is open to them. And then to find this place, if the ideal is ever realized, which I am sure it will be, and to have these young men come in and find this kind of a home and the welcome that they will get in a place of this kind; to my notion, it is one of the best things that could happen to Chicago or any other city."

This gift of $50,000 has prompted N. W. Harris and James A. Patten to subscribe $50,000 each to the hotel project. It is planned to raise at least $500,000 before beginning the actual work of building.

Amazed at Dr. Sweeney's Position

Editors, Christian Century: I am led to write the following lines from reading Mr. Sweeney's letter that appeared in your issue of July 13.

I am really surprised that a man of his reputation should have become so belated as to still travel in the old legalistic ruts, that were formed more than one hundred years ago. He seems to entirely overlook the fact that the human race as a whole is progressive; and that their moral progress has been brought about by the discovery of new truths of a moral nature, and the method of their operation in the production of moral results in the lives of those who believe and practice them.

To my mind, Bro. Sweeney's mistake consists in supposing that the commission to the Apostles was the organic or constitutional law of the new spiritual kingdom.

What I wish to call to your special attention is the horrible result of Dr. Sweeney's reasoning, for he advances the idea that no person can be a Christian who has not been immersed in water, and all such unimmersed persons are guilty of treason, and have secured the penalty of death; and as this penalty is never executed in this life, he leaves the impression that, to his mind, it must be eternal damnation in some other world. Now, there is such a thing as disproving a proposition by its unreasonable results; and all The Christian Century has to do to knock out Dr. Sweeney's basis of Christian union is to disgust all affusionists, by pointing out the result of Dr. Sweeney's reasoning. Illinois Department

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

The Sunday-schools, of Christian churches of Edwards County, held a picnic August 3, at West Salem.

Four additions were received to the church at Decatur, where C. M. Smithson is pastor, on July 23.

There have been five additions in recent weeks at Pontiac Church, where B. W. Tate preaches.

DeForest Mullins, who concluded his pastorate at Mechanicsburg recently, has accepted a call to Detroit Church.

Evangelist Sword is conducting a tabernacle meeting at Potomac, where E. M. Norton is minister.

J. W. Larrimore is pastor at Riverton, where, during recent months, there have been sixteen additions, all of whom were by confession of faith.

J. M. Francis is pastor at Newton, where a union meeting is being held by five churches of the town, under the direction of Wallace Tuttle.

W. S. Gamboe and the congregation at Olney, are co-operating in a successful work. Excavation was recently begun for a basement under the edifice, to accommodate a growing Sunday-school.

The church at Flanagan has secured E. E. Hartley for the pastorate. The new pastor has already undertaken his duties in connection with this church. He succeeds C. H. Hands.

Union Prairie Church, in Moultrie County, is making extensive improvements on its building. The Sunday-school and other departments of work are improving under the ministry of W. P. Wall.

At Sailor Springs, in recent weeks, there have been five additions by confession of faith. The pastor is O. M. Eaton, who is holding a meeting in a school-house, near West Salem.

A three weeks' meeting was closed the last Sunday in July at Texas Church, near Clinton, Illinois, by Guy L. Zerby and Ernest Higdon, who are pursuing their college courses in Eureka. There were several additions and excellently attended services.

George W. Schroeder is using a stereopticon in the Sunday evening services at Bridgeport. The congregation is using a theater for its services during the construction of its new church, which will be under roof in a short time.

It is not too early to be making preparations to attend the state convention, to be held in Danville, September 4 to 7. The Illinois conventions are always a joy for their fine fellowship, and frequently there is a program which would do justice to a national convention. The Danville Church expects a large delegation. Their expectations ought to be exceeded.

The first anniversary of the dedication of the new church at Latham was celebrated in conjunction with the third anniversary of the pastorate of Clifford S. Weaver, the first Sunday in August. A roll-call of the entire membership, and an unusually fine fellowship, was part of the program. The work here has prospered continuously since Mr. and Mrs. Weaver became the leaders.

The cornerstone of the new Virden Church was laid the last Sunday in July with exercises including addresses by J. V. Clark, and John R. Golden of Springfield, C. H. Metcalf of Girard, and others. This building is costing about twenty-five thousand dollars, and will prove a valuable addition to the worthy edifices being erected in central Illinois.

It was announced in the Christian Century last week that Adam K. Adcock would remove to Duequoin. His congregation at Carbondale has prevailed upon him to reconsider his decision to go, and announcement is made that he will remain with Carbondale Church, where he has done a work of genuine value, beside fulfilling the duties of the office of secretary for the Eighth District.

A short meeting by Vawter and Marty, held at Catlin in June, resulted in eighteen additions. This was the second meeting held by Mr. Vawter, the former having added a large number to the congregation. The church had the pleasure, recently, of a day spent with them by the evangelists, at which time dinner and supper were served in the basement of the church, and addresses and music by the evangelists made the occasion one of delight to the whole community.

C. H. Hands has accepted the pastorate of Fairbury Church. Mr. Hands is a recent addition to the Disciple ranks, and is proving himself a worthy minister of the Gospel. His pastorate at Flanagan was terminated with the regret of a very large number of people, both within and without the church. He is being appreciated as a man of very much more than ordinary pulpit ability. He has taken up residence already and begun his labors at Fairbury. His continuance, however, in that field is conditioned on the future health of his daughter, whose weakened condition may, in the near future, demand a change of climate, which will compel the family's removing from the state.

The cornerstone of the new edifice, being erected for First Church, Springfield, was laid with imposing services, August first. A temporary floor had been laid on the foundation and seats placed for a large company of people. The chief address was delivered by Finis Idleman of Central Church, Des Moines, and the stone was laid with Masonic ceremonies. O. W. Lawrence of Central Church, Decatur, H. H. Jenner of Stuart Street Church, Springfield, and several other ministers representing the local Ministerial Association, assisted in the services. The building is rapidly rising, and its proportions are evident from the portion already constructed. The structure will cost in excess of one hundred thousand dollars, is constructed of smooth Bedford stone, and will be second to no structure of the Disciples in Illinois. The pastor, F. W. Burnham, is serving the congregation in the fifth year of his pastorate.

The resignation of C. R. Wolford, pastor at Blandinsville, was tendered on last Sunday morning, July 23rd, to take effect on or before Oct. 29th. By that time Mr. Wolford will have been there three years and two months, which have been among the most progressive, if not the most progressive, years in the history of this church. During his pastorate the Sunday-school was trebled, over 100 new members were added to the church, and a new building erected and practically paid for, at a cost of over $22,000. When Mr. Wolford came he organized a men's class with an enrollment of seven, which increased so that the average attendance for 1910 was fifty-six. This class has enrolled more than two hundred different men; and through the enthusiasm furnished by it the entire school built up until it ranks among the largest and best in this part of the state. Mr. Wolford has been a highly successful pastor and preacher, an indefatigable worker and a man whose influence for good is not confined to the members of his congregation. Mrs. Wolford also has come up to the high standard expected for a minister's wife. She has been active in all the departments of the church and will be missed. Mr. Wolford's resignation was wholly voluntary and is a matter of general regret. As to his future field no arrangements have as yet been made.

Chicago

On Wednesday evening, Aug. 2, the Jews of Chicago met in the various temples to observe the Hebrew day of mourning for the two falls of Jerusalem. During these services the scrolls of the law are draped in black. Prayers were offered for the restoration of Jerusalem as the capital of Palestine.

It is reported that James Edward Quigley, archbishop of Chicago, is to be created a candidate by Pope Pius X. at a consistory of the sacred college to be held early in the fall. This means the acknowledgement not only of the zeal and sagacity of archbishop Quigley, but also of Chicago as a strategic and powerful field of the Catholic church.

Dr. George R. Young, health commissioner, does not think that the state law and city ordinance relative to the common drinking cup, applies to the communion cups in the churches. Many city churches have adopted the individual communion cup, but in the Episcopal and Lutheran churches the common goblet at the altar rail is still in use. Until Chicago is completely evangelized Dr. Young does not think those churches now using the common goblet should be unduly excited.

An International colonization scheme was launched by the directors of the Catholic Colonization Society of the United States at a meeting held recently in the Woman's Temple of this city. The plan is to promote desirable immigration and to form Catholic colonies in this country. Already these colonies have been started—two in Florida, three in Minnesota, and one each in Missouri, Colorado and Arkansas. An effort is being made to protect the immigrants from certain dangers, arising from their ignorance of our language and customs. This protective work is cared for by a division called the Racial Societies. These societies coöperate with the European clergy, and appoint "chaplains of immigration" to care for those Catholics who are setting out for America.

Church Life

R. N. Parrent has resigned his pastorate at Culdesac, Idaho, and will remove to Portland, Ore.

E. W. Corn has accepted a call to Piqua, Ohio. Mr. Corn was one of this year's graduates at Bethany College.

William A. Young of Hiram, Ohio, has accepted the pastorate of College Hill Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, which was recently erected in a day.

Secretary E. W. Allen has recently visited the conventions of the Northwest and reports deep interest in the missionary cause in these quarters.

R. A. Long, of Kansas City, made the offer at the Portland Convention to pay half the salary of twenty-five new missionaries for two years.

J. A. Longston, for ten years pastor at Independence, Kan., who resigned recently, has accepted a call to Fairfield, Ia., and will open his work there August 13.

George B. Stewart, for the past two years pastor of First Church, Colorado Springs, Colo., has resigned to accept a call to Muncie, Ind.

Lewis A. Pier who has occupied the pastorate at Los Gatos, Calif. for nearly three years has received a call to Palo Alto, Calif. It is reported that he will accept this call to this new field.

H. F. Ritz, pastor at Boone, Ia., has resigned his charge there and will leave shortly for Anaconda, Mont. which was his field four years ago. Mr Ritz has been in Boone two and one-half years.

Dr. and Mrs. C. L. Pickett are returning to their work at Laoag, Phillipine Islands, after their furlough spent in this country. They will spend a month at California and a month in China on the way.

Frank M. Moore, for the past year pastor at First Church, Redondo Beach, Calif., has closed his pastorate there. Mr. and Mrs. Moore will attend Hiram College for a three years' course in advance work.

A temporary building was built in one day by the congregation at Greentown, Ind., which was recently organized through an evangelistic meeting held by T. J. Legg of Indianapolis, Ind.

George A. Campbell, pastor of First Church, Hannibal, Mo., preached in Chicago at Austin and Englewood churches on his way to Pentwater, Mich., where he will spend his vacation.

Nebraska State Convention will be held this year, August 14-20 at Bethany Park. Among the speakers from out of the state are: R. P. Shepherd, C. M. Chilton, Fred Kline, A. L. Shelton, Miss Olive Griffith, Geo. E. Lyon and John H. Booth.

The semi-annual meeting of the ministerial association of the seventh district of Missouri was held recently at Camden Point, Mo. It was largely attended and those present report a delightful and profitable meeting.

Granville Snell of Mound City, Mo., is in a short meeting at Rothville, Mo. Mr. Snell has just concluded a two weeks' meeting at Faucett, Mo., where the church had been closed for seven years. The congregation was reorganized with thirty members and regular preaching was arranged for.

W. A. Haynes is in a good meeting at Anson, Tex., with a number of confessions. Mr. Haynes wil be one of the evangelists at the Northwestern Texas Camp Meeting beginning August 28 at Crowell, Tex. This meeting which is held annually, is largely attended.

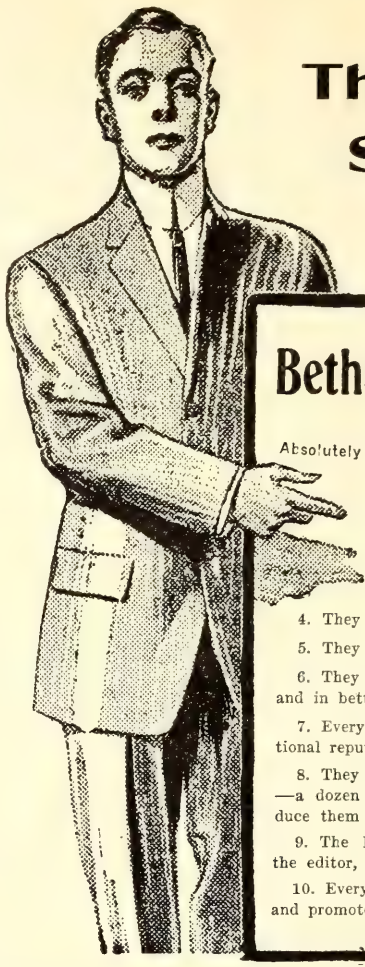
Earl Wilfley formerly of St. Louis, Mo., and now pastor of Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. D., was the principal speaker at a meeting of the Missouri Society of Washington, held there recently. Mrs. Champ Clark was also on the program, reading the new state song "Missouri."

Robert A. Sickles, pastor at Illiopolis, Ill., escorted a number of children from tenement district of Chicago to his home town recently, where they will enjoy an outing of two weeks in the homes of members of his congregation. Mr. Sickles is coöperating with the outing department of the United Charities in this work.

J. Boyd Jones, pastor of Central Church, Anderson, Ind., has started a movement to equip the basement of the church for the use of the men of his congregation as a club room. Mr. Jones is spending some time in Chicago in the study of sociology with special observation of Hull House and Chicago Commons Settlement work.

By a unanimous vote the congregation of Highland Street Church, Worcester, Mass., has extended a unanimous call to William C. Crerie, who has been acting pastor since April 1. He was engaged by the church to fill the pulpit temporarily until September 1, and his permanent pastorate will begin at that date. Mr. Crerie has been very successful in his work at Worcester, there being a large increase in attendance at all the services.

Leslie Wolfe, of Manila, P. I., sends the following report: "Simon Rivera baptized two at Singalon recently. R. Bardemorilla baptized one at Sisiman May 14. P. Mondocdoc baptized a woman 60 years old at Mariveles June 4. Mateo Noble baptized one at Pagsanhan June 8. During May and June I conducted Bible institutes at the towns of Caridad, Lilio, Rizal, Singalon and San Roque, of five to six days in each place. About fifty in all made a creditable showing in the examinations and in recognition thereof were given certificates."



The Wide-awake Superintendent Says

Bethany Graded Lessons are

Absolutely the Greatest Achievement in the History of Sunday-school Literature.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have coöperated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

The following interesting item of news is clipped from a New York daily paper: "A whole church—congregation and property—in Borough Park, Brooklyn, left the Presbyterian communion yesterday and entered the Disciples of Christ, a denomination strong in the Middle West, and in membership the fifth Protestant body in the whole country. Six years ago a union church was started in Borough Park. Success attended the work, and property worth $30,000 was accumulated. The location was central and the work had the advantage of being early in a new field. Methodists, Baptists and some other bodies built their own places of worship, however, and the pastor of the union movement, the Rev. W. C. Pettit, who had Presbyterian leanings, practically made the union church a Presbyterian one. Some weeks ago, because of dissensions, the pastor resigned. Financial help was secured from R. N. Fielding, who had been a member of the Disciples of Christ in St. Louis. Last Sunday, all legal requirements having been fulfilled, the congregation voted formally to quit Presbyterian allegiance and formally become a Disciple church. At a meeting of the Disciples Missionary Union, the local Disciples organization, held in Manhattan yesterday, the congregation was received, and steps were approved by which the $30,000 property will be transferred to it or to its general supervision. From the People's Church, as it has been called, but holding to the Presbyterian doctrine, it is to become the Borough Park Christian Church. The pastor will be the Rev. Roland J. Nichols, of Ohio."

Ohio Secretary's Letter

At New Washington in Crawford County is a small band of disciples that are remarkable for their enterprise and courage. New Washington is a village of some 1,200 inhabitants where church life has languished to a degree. Two or three years ago J. H. Donaldson who had been superintendent of the Sunday-school at Mansfield moved to New Washington. He at once took up Christian work in one of the churches of the town but their pace was too slow for him and in the course of a year he was conducting a Sunday-school all his own in his residence. There are not more than ten disciples in the community but these meet with regularity and are planning vigorously for the future. Throughout all these months they have been paying diligent attention to the finances of their work, looking forward to enlarging the scope of their endeavor. They have set their stakes at $5 per Sunday, an unusual attainment for so small a band. They have contributed liberally to various missionary enterprises and have religiously hoarded their precious fund until it has assumed dignified proportions. They have completed arrangements for a tent meeting to be held in August. C. R. Oakley of Mansfield will do the preaching. J. E. Sturgis will be the leader of song. All expenses are to be paid by this little band. They have asked from the state board nothing but friendship and counsel. It is not the purpose necessarily to establish an additional church in the community but to prosecute the work of the Lord. The form that the work shall take in days to come will be decided later but these people are determined that New Washington shall have a series of earnest gospel sermons attended by live, vigorous, personal work. Watch New Washington.

Not in years has the Ohio Society been confronted by so many wide open doors of splendid opportunity. Groups of disciples in nearly a score of places are not simply capable of being organized for work; they are actually at work for themselves. This vigor and life together with the open opportunity in many of these fields are an irresistible call for enlarged Ohio work. We cannot do other than push on for bigger and better things in Ohio work.

The secretary met with the church at Bethel, Clermont County, July 23, on the happy occasion of the dedication of their new church building. They have a fine and beautiful house of worship made by doubling the size of the old house. Large audiences assembled at the three services of the day and the best of feeling prevails among the good people who have planned for larger work in the days to come. There remained an unpaid balance of something like $2,000. Gifts and pledges were made aggregating $2,345—enough to cover adequately interest shrinkage and leave a balance sufficient to add a coat of paint to the exterior of the building which will effectually disguise the difference between bricks old and new and make the building all new. It was a delightful experience and the brethren go forward with strong hope under the capable leadership of J. G. Quinlan. A. A. Sebastian, a former minister, under whom the enterprise was started, was present at the evening service and was warmly greeted by his many friends.

The state board through a special committee, George Darsie, Akron, chairman, is diligently prosecuting the matter of securing a competent Bible-school superintendent as leader for our Ohio forces.

In accordance with the recommendation of the Portsmouth convention an advisory committee of ten have been appointed to meet with the state board twice a year. This committee is state wide in its distribution and is composed of H. Newton Miller, Columbus; W. J. Henry, Portsmouth; R. A. Doan, Nelsonville; T. W. Pinkerton, Kenton; Dr. W. G. Rhoten, Mowrystown; L. G. Batman, Youngstown; J. N. Scholes, Bellaire; Chas. R. Oakley, Mansfield; E. W. Thornton, Cincinnati; John P. Sala, Dayton. These brethren have been called to meet with the board in its regular session Thursday, Aug. 3. At this time plans and methods will be thoroughly discussed for a great campaign for a bigger and better Ohio Day, Nov. 5.

Studies in Social Reform And What to Do

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one man to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the two years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature.

Beginning Next October.

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that have ever been offered to Sunday Schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Look at These Live Subjects for the Fall Quarter!

DECEMBER: Tuberculosis.
1. The Tuberculosis Crusade.
2. Economic Causes of Tuberculosis.
3. The Need of Education.
4. What the Church Can Do.
5. Review of the Progress of the Kingdom During the Year.

These lessons are published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to see the work start off in the autumn with zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these classes in the study of Social Reform.

A Suggestion To Others

A Sunday School teacher sends in a list of all the teachers and officers of her school, asking that The Christian Century be sent to each one on the "TEN WEEKS FOR TEN CENTS" special offer. She says, "I have found the paper very helpful to me as a Sunday School worker. Not the weekly lesson only, but all the departments are a constant inspiration. My outlook has been broadened especially during the past year by your treatment of live questions in a way I had not been accustomed to. I wish our superintendent and all the teachers to have The Century and I enclose $1.50 to pay for the fifteen names." This is the kind of spirit which we confidently feel a great host of our readers possess. From now on similar lists of names will be coming in fast from hundreds of loyal readers who wish their friends and co-workers to know the vital message of The Christian Century. Read the advertisement on page 2.

CHICAGO

Notes From the Foreign Society

O. G. Hertzog has been traveling among our mission stations in China, and is much pleased with the work. Dr. Paul Wakefield has been his guide and interpreter.

D. E. Dannenberg and wife will return to China from their furlough about the first of October.

Frank Garrett of China reports the baptism of four men and six women, among them the mother and wife of Dr. Liu. Their ten year old son asks for baptism and will be received ere long. Mistress Liang of the official class, whose husband was baptized over a year ago, was among the number. M. Chang and wife were baptized. Their small son asks for baptism. It is a step forward when we get the whole family enlisted in the church.

W. R. Hunt has been at all the stations in the vicinity of Chuchow, and has baptized believers at four of these places. The number baptized was twenty-one. The evangelists gave him a very cordial welcome. During his stay in Shanghai and Wuhu he kept in touch with them by correspondence and by sending them the best books he could secure.

John Johnson of Nantungchow, writes that during the progress of the convention seven were baptized. The baptistry at Nantungchow is a large wooden bath tub. It was made by James Ware many years ago. The church there needs a new baptistry. Four of those baptized were partly the fruit of the special meetings held by James Ware in February. Two were scholars from the day school, and the remaining three have been inquirers for some time. Others are very near the kingdom.

F. E. Meigs and family are preparing to return to China in October. Miss Ruth has been married to David Teachout of Cleveland, Ohio.

Miss Rose Armbruster of Akita, Japan, writes: Today is a happy day in Akita. Four of the women who have been attending meetings in my home were baptized this morning and others will follow soon.

Leslie Wolfe of Manila, P. I., reports fifteen baptisms in the Tagalog Provinces. He reports four days Bible Institute at Waa. Twelve took the examinations.

Dr. C. C. Drummond of Harda, India, writes that a Parsee architect has drawn the plans and specifications for the new hospital. He would make no charge for his work as the building is to be used for charitable purposes. The building operations will begin in October. Nothing can be done while the rainy season lasts.

W. B. Alexander reports that one of the teachers in the day school was a temple priest whose work was to cause people to worship idols of stone and wood. He has gone thus far into the light that he has denounced the lucrative craft of his fathers and is trying to help his race by teaching secular subjects in the schools. There are hundreds like him in India. They have no faith in their old religions, but have not yet heartily accepted the new faith.

In India the rains have started. They were late in coming this year and for a while there was considerable anxiety lest there should be another famine. If the rains continue as they have begun, the crops will be good.

D. O. Cunningham writes that the Christian students, teachers and preachers in Harda are all out doing itinerating work. In addition to their preaching they sell portions of the Scriptures. This part of the work is much more encouraging than in former years.

R. Ray Eldred of Africa writes that the work in the back country seems to be in good shape, judging from the letters he occasionally gets from the native evangelists. He hopes to visit that part of the country within two months. The work at Longa is divided as follows: Mrs. Eldred has her house to look after besides the work for the girls and the women in the church. This includes visits in the village as often as she can find the time to make them. Mrs. Eldred also helps in the school, but the rest of the mission work falls to Mr. Eldred, the workmen, the lumber sawyers, the carpenters, the school and church work and the training of the evangelists.

Ten Weeks for Ten Cents

In order to introduce The Christian Century into new homes the publishers propose to send the paper ten weeks for ten cents,

Beginning With the Issue of September 21.

Names for this offer must be sent in before September 15. These trial subscriptions will be positively discontinued at the expiration of the ten weeks unless ordered continued by the subscriber.

We expect to gather a list of several thousand names for this period. One subscriber to whom the plan was explained declared that he had ten dollars to spend on that proposition and would send us the names of 100 persons whom he wishes to become acquainted with The Christian Century and its vital message. Others will send smaller lists; still others, perhaps, larger lists. This is on behalf of their paper. Let every present subscriber think over the names of the fellow-members of his church and his friends and make up a list. A good set of names would be your Sunday School teachers and officers and your board of elders and deacons. If your pastor is not now a reader be sure that he is not overlooked. We Believe Every Reader Will Send in at Least One Name.

BEGIN NOW TO MAKE UP YOUR LIST

Send it in at once. Use separate sheet or sheets of paper for your names. Put your own name at the top as the sender. Keep a duplicate copy of your list. Be sure to make addresses plain. Remittance must accompany all lists.

A Russian Baptist Hero

Pastor Fetler of the First Russian Baptist Church of St. Petersburg, who was also the founder of it, makes a heroic appeal to Baptists of America. He came here to attend the recent Baptist Alliance in Philadelphia, putting up $2,500 in money that he would return to Russia by October next to stand trial for having started, in Moscow, a Baptist Church and winning to it some Russian Orthodox Church members.

Before quitting St. Petersburg last March he bought a site and he and his Russian Baptists, numerous but poor, began the construction in St. Petersburg of a Baptist Church to seat 2,000. The structure is partly built and funds are exhausted. Pastor Fetler looks with dismay, not upon any trial at Moscow but at returning to his St. Petersburg congregation without money to complete his big church. Hence his heroic appeal.

Over one thousand belong to the St. Petersburg Church, and there are six subsidiary halls in various parts of the city, all crowded. A preachers' training class has forty members who go out as lay evangelists.

St. Petersburg University students crowd a Thursday night weekly lecture. The Czar is cognizant of the work, and himself gave permission for the purchase of the site for the now unfinished "Prayer House," as it is designated.

Pastor Fetler asks American Baptists for $45,000, not to be given to the St. Petersburg Baptist Church, but to be used to complete their "Prayer House," and later to be paid back and to become a Baptist church building fund for Russia. Pastor Fetler's efforts in Moscow have resulted in a flourishing Baptist work in that city, as yet without property of its own. He says he will keep his word and face the government in Moscow for trial, although it is not unlikely to result in banishment to Siberia for a series of years.

Will Negro Methodists Withdraw?

There has just been held a conference of recognized leaders among colored Methodists, and from it comes the report, credited very generally, that negroes now belonging to the Methodist Church, the large northern body, will withdraw and form a new Colored Methodist organization of national scope and aim. Bishop Scott of Monrovia, who represents colored Methodists in Africa, is known to have attended this conference, but states that the time has not yet come to make plans public.

Methodist leaders, white, admit that colored Methodists within their body contemplate such action, and say that such course might not prove wholly unwise. They say, frankly, that were the negro to withdraw, and do so voluntarily, the greater union would follow of the Methodist South with the North, and so there would result a Methodist Church of national size, having a membership of 4,500,000. For years it has been acknowledged that white Methodist unity in America is impossible so long as the northern body contains 300,000 colored members.

Apart from the comparatively small number of colored people in regular Methodist Church membership, there are three large Methodist bodies of negroes, the Zion with 545,000 members, the African with 452,000, and the Colored with 235,000. Negroes now in the regular Methodist body will not, they say, unite with any of these three, but form a body of their own. Some efforts are making, however, to bring about union with the Zion body.

White Methodists maintain for their 300,000 negro members twenty-three schools of high grade, at a cost of $360,000 a year. Besides there are eight Methodist colleges for colored people. It is declared that not all of this missionary work will be cut off if divison comes, but that white Methodists North will continue to help colored Methodists, as they are helping others.

Final action cannot be taken until May, 1912, when the Methodist General Conference meets in Minneapolis. Advance steps to such action can be taken at once, and indications are that such will be taken. Race prejudice does not, however, so much obtain as do the convictions on the part of colored people that they can work in their own way as they cannot now, and on the part of white Methodists that the larger Methodist union will then be possible. Indeed, so far as can be judged, both sides seem gratified that negroes themselves are likely to act.

A Great Campaign

Men of prominence in the professions and business of the United States and Canada are lending their names and giving personal attention to an effort to put into heads and hearts of men and boys more knowledge of the Bible, higher ideals of conduct, and greater inclination to work at their religion. Their common plan is the Men and Religion Movement, which opens its campaign in St. Paul and Minneapolis on the first week in October.

It is not a ministers' plan, but a scheme wholly in the hands of laymen. Its serious character is seen from the fact that behind it are James G. Cannon, the New York banker, R. A. Long, the Kansas City lumberman, C. E. Milliken, the millionaire developer of the Maine forests, Fred E. Tasker and Frank Harvey Field, New York lawyers in Wall Street, James H. Post, with the Havemeyers in the sugar trust, James M. Speer, the greatest linen merchant in America, Edward H. Bonsall, the Philadelphia banker, and men who have helped to make their respective cities like E. M. McBrier of Buffalo, Ralph W. Harbison of Pittsburgh, James D. Husted of Denver and Benj. F. Edwards of St. Louis.

Giving up their vacations, 318 men of the stamp of the foregoing just met for a week on Lake George and day and night throughout that time earnestly planned the campaign. There were present men from the Canadian Northwest, and the Maritime Provinces of the Dominion. Men were also there from New York and Philadelphia. Some even got leave from Washington and its reciprocity bill, not then passed, to go and talk religion.

Men who are leading in this venture include Mr. Fred B. Smith of the International Y. M. C. A., Mr. Hubert Carleton of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, Mr. Fayette L. Thompson of the Methodist Brotherhood, Mr. David Russell, just here from South Africa, and W. R. Lane of London. At the recent meeting a leader was the Rev. Dr. J. W. Williamson of the Third Baptist Church of St. Louis. So striking was his address that it has been printed and is to form a campaign document.

The business plan which these Christian laymen have adopted marks an advance in religious method. The principal cities are reckoned headquarters and in them have been formed committees of business men representing all churches. Between October and May next Social Weeks, somewhat after the plan of Catholics of Continental Europe, will be held in nearly one hundred cities. These include Halifax, St. John, Montreal, Toronto, London, Winnipeg and Vancouver in the Dominion, Boston and all large cities west to St. Louis in the North, Richmond, Atlanta, New Orleans, Nashville and Memphis in the South, and Denver, Salt Lake City, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Tacoma, Seattle and Spokane in the Rocky Mountain and Coast regions. Apart from these main Social Weeks, Auxiliary ones are planned in tributary cities, so that the whole country is theoretically to be covered. These meetings are not mass conventions, with dinners, but are institutes arranged almost as are college courses.

That there may be no duplication, and the most accomplished in the shortest time and at least expense, three teams of specialists in Bible study, Sunday-school work, Missions, evangelism, social service and the rest are provided, and these instructors are given outlines of lectures, so that it is known in advance just what instruction will be given. Nothing more economic, or more certain to carry out determined plans, has ever been devised in religion or in politics. The number of men and boys to come under instruction will, it is calculated, run into the hundreds of thousands. The October to May period covered, follow-up work is to be carried on and the whole scheme made permanent. It is not the aim to advance any particular organizations, but solely to help the cause of Jesus Christ and to bring more men and boys into actual membership and personal work of the churches. Some men said last year, when the missionary campaign was on, that they did not believe in foreign missions. The plan this year is missions at home in its intensest form.

A Moral Struggle in Texas

Returns from elections in Texas indicate a victory for the "wets" of 5,000 out of 475,000 votes cast on an amendment providing for statewide prohibition. But prohibition forces claim victory, nevertheless. Because in one of the greatest states, the fight between forces for saloons and vice and those for prohibition and clean morals was exceedingly bitter. Says the American Advance, official organ of the Prohibition Party: "The facts, which prohibition leaders have in hand, fully justify a flat claim to unconditional victory—victory despite frauds, despite Mexicans, despite Negroes. . . . If effort can make good the ground gained, victory will be held and made more abundant by elimination of the saloon's glaring iniquities against the ballot box." "The decent citizens . . . . have returned a heavy majority" against domination by beer distillers. Even if lost now, prohibition principle almost certainly will triumph in the next election.

Before You Go "Back to the Land"

A new and timely organization in the interest of the future agriculturalist has just been effected, in connection with the meeting of secretaries of agriculture and immigration from about twenty western and southern states, held recently in Chicago. Its aim is to prepare the unprepared and restrain the unfit, when the lure of the land is too alluring. The present "back-to-the-land" movement may not become a "landslide," but it will excite a great many people, unqualified and disqualified, to try the fascinations of the farm. This new organization will prepare and circulate books of information about the resources of the states, prepare short courses of study, organize classes in connection with the Young Men's Christian associations, settlements, and high-schools to take the studies, protect immigrants from imposture by land agents and seek to have uniform laws for the different states. Its aim is large, so are its plans. It has the support of the officials of twenty or thirty states and the railroads, while many educators are giving it their approval. It is not a money-making but an altruistic enterprise. Mr. A. B. Hulit, its commissioner-general, is the organizer, with headquarters at Chicago. The city swindler has sold many "gold bricks" and Masonic temples to "hayseeds." The country swindler, or his representative, has fooled many a city " tenderfoot." The police are attempting to protect the folks from the country; we are glad that some one is now to look after the inexperienced city man who thinks he wants to raise cotton in North Dakota, or wheat in Florida, or "big red apples" on any old ten acres anywhere.

The Controller Bay Blunder

In response to the demand of congress for all the documents and letters and official reports, pertaining to the elimination of 12,800 acres from the Chugach National Forest, on Controller Bay, Alaska, President Taft replied, giving all the material in his possession, at the same time making a general and specific categorical denial of the charges made against him, his brother, and his subordinates. The statement is likely to be accepted as final by the country. The Public, however, reminds us of the mistake the country made in believing too implicitly the denials made by the President in the Glavis case two years ago. That paper does not assail the honesty of the chief executive, however. In fact, an attempt is made to excuse the matter. "We do not imply that Mr. Taft is either a 'crook' or a 'chump.' . . . Anybody who does things by indirection is 'crooked' in the slang of the time, without being necessarily a rascal." Only those persons who are superhumanly wise never have anything "put over" on them. Some one has blundered. The heart of the situation is that the laws governing the public domain are defective. If they were not, the blunder would never have been made. The interests that prefer a bad law were powerful enough to prevent the passage of a good law. Says Mr. Roosevelt in the Outlook: "They wished an unchecked hand, and by their control over a large portion of the press they hoped to create a sentiment so favorable to the immediate development of Alaska, and so bitter against any attempt to enforce the existing law, as to make the government sanction their wrongdoing." Our motive has been in error. Mr. Roosevelt continues: "The aim should not be to prevent big corporations from working or to prevent them from getting adequate profits; the aim should be to give the corporation full opportunity and a chance of ample reward, but to keep such complete control over it as to insure that the reward, though ample, shall not be utterly unreasonable, and shall represent honest work honestly done, and also to see that the interests of all of our people are effectively guarded."

Coming World Peace

An event, the significance of which may not be realized for many decades, took place on Aug. 3. Two treaties were signed, the one between Great Britain and the United States, the other between France and the United States, binding the parties to the agreements to submit all differences which arise between them to arbitration. Only a few hours before, the French treaty was signed in Paris by Ambassador Jusserand, in an equally simple rite. This treaty differs from all previous treaties in that its scope is unlimited, matters involving the honor of the countries being included as justiciable. In deference to senatorial tradition regarding treaties, the text of the agreements is kept secret until they have been ratified by the United States Senate. It is evident that there is a tension over the whole country, anxiety as to how the senate may receive the treaty. It is not believed that body will veto it, yet more or less delay is almost certain. Public sentiment in all three of the countries has steadily grown in favor of unlimited arbitration. The sense that national disputes are as susceptable of peaceful adjustment as are private differences has taken a firm hold upon the heart of these peoples. No amount of eloquence, no amount of philosophizing about world peace could be half as effectual in bringing about general arbitration as the growth of this sentiment. War, like the duel and clan feud, is a relic of barbarism. This is a peace movement which does not involve disarmament, at least until all nations have accepted it, and for that reason appeals even to Germany as worthy of consideration.

Turkish Atrocities In Albania

Nothing less than armed intervention by the powers of Europe is adequate to put an end to the atrocities of the Turkish army in Albania, and such intervention is threatened by so cautious an organ as the London Spectator. The press in France, England, Germany, Italy, as well as of the United States, is vehement in its denunciation of Turkish treatment of the Albanians. Difficult of access, Albania has never been fully under the control of Turkey. Turkey partitioned it into three districts, each forming a part of a vilayet, or county. With the advent of the Younger Turk régime, the new ruler attempted to bring Albania into submission, and to force the Ottoman institutions, including the Moslem faith, upon Catholic Albanians. Against this oppression the Albanians revolted. This precipitated what looks like a campaign of extermination. The 1,200,000 Christian people stand but little chance of escaping alive unless their Christian fellows in other lands come to the rescue. Vigorous denials of such treatment, emanating from official sources in Constantinople, are regarded with little credence. For many months travelers returning from that portion of Europe have brought back tales of atrocities that are almost unbelievable. Miss Edith Durham, an Englishwoman, who has lived in Albania for several years engaged in philanthropic work, escaped across the border when the uprising began, and since then has been writing to the London papers of the conditions in Albania. In June she reported that every vestige of crops was being destroyed by the Turks. Twenty thousand refugees were then in Montenegro, where they found the greater part of the male population in arms to protect the borders. Many thousands of Albanians were not so fortunate in escaping, however. They are crowded in caves or straw huts in the hills, starving and reduced for food to asphodel leaves and stinging nettles boiled in petroleum cans. The torrential rains drench them and disease is ravaging their numbers. The Turkish forces have forced their way through the mountain passes, surrounding the helpless mountaineers and capturing them. Men, children, and older women are butchered outright, and the younger women are taken for the soldiers. In the light of the twentieth century, such a return to hideous barbarism must cease, even at the cost of armed intervention.

—Civilization is going into Afghanistan in an automobile. The strong and capricious ameer, who learned to like motoring when visiting India, has ordered the building of a network of good roads throughout Afghanistan, and has decreed a motor service from Peshawar to Kabul, giving an order for half a million rupees worth of machines. The railway which the British desire cannot be long in following the automobile.

The Recoil of the Evangelistic Gun.

A Boston minister has been spending a few weeks in Kansas City and he is moved to say a few things about the state of religion in that region. The churches in the West, he finds, are very much like those in the East. The congregations are small and the interest is lagging. The growing church with the live evangelistic pastor is the exception. Now and then an attempt is made to import religion by means of the evangelistic campaign. The results of this sort of thing are thus stated in the Watchman:

In the West, even more than in the East, the churches have been depending on the traveling evangelist. All the larger cities have had campaigns led by a Chapman or Torrey or Billy Sunday. Smaller cities and towns have had the same type of meeting. In almost every case the same results have been attined. Multitudes have been reached, thousands have been counted as converts, but a year after the great meetings pastors and churches are not sure of the benefits. The percentage of converts who unite with the churches is discouragingly small, and the recoil of the big gun has done about as much damage to those in the fort, as the shot from the muzzle has hurt the enemy. In the West as in the East the popular cure for all this is to organize a new movement, call a convention, elect officers and set the machine in motion while the dear people pray and give and shout, hoping to generate steam enough to make the wheels go round. . . . . When will we learn that the divinely-appointed organization for saving the world is the local church?

Methodist

Is the Prayer Meeting Bankrupt?

"Well, I must go through the ordeal." This is the remark of an able and consecrated minister as he went in to lead his prayer-meeting. The prayer-meeting was not a source of inspiration to him but something that had to be carried and was a heavy burden. The experience of this preacher is like that of others. On the condition of the prayer-meeting the Central Christian Advocate comments thus:

Is the prayer-meeting going into bankruptcy and out of business? We all remember the prayer-meetings of other days, the clang of the twilight bell billowing over the hills, calling to prayer; we remember the holy quiet of the church, the holy solitude of secret prayer, the sense of waiting for Him to come into His own house and make the place all radiant and precious; we remember the quiet songs, the testimonies often tearful and overpowering. Are they gone? Have they left only the machinery of business, when the capital is bankrupt? In reality is the oasis of the week dead as the desert from the encroachment of the sand and hot winds of modern life?

We wish we knew just what to suggest in all this. We know very well that you cannot build a midweek prayer-meeting on vagaries, on the husks of past experience, on cant phrases, on the preacher doing it all in lectures, on the hurdy gurdy hymns which have no sense, no majesty, no real soul. But who can build anything on negations? on prohibitions?

One thing—yes, two things—we may suggest: the prayer-meeting should have the skyward look, the expectation from the throne; it should have that; it should be saturated with that expectation; and, second, it should belong to the people. It should aim at comfort, at self-examination, at the soul's isolation with the Spirit, at deepening the soul's solemn experiences——and then it should be also practical in touch with Christ's program, with missions, with the city, with neighborhood outlook, with matters germane to the church, such as the church paper, and a hundred other themes.

Thus the prayer-meeting may not become insolvent; it may simply be reorganizing, increasing its capital, widening its market.

Tears and Religion.

The weeping preacher is not popular. If he sheds tears, he must have a solid basis for his emotion else we do not respect him. The Northwestern Christian Advocate thus sums up and comments on an article devoted to songs of a funeral order which are tolerated where doubtless the weeping preacher would be ridiculed:

A writer in the New Music Review finds the Americans the most sentimental people in the world. In evidence he cites the immense popularity of songs dealing with melancholy topics such as "'Tis the Flower from My Angel Mother's grave," and others that readily come to mind. But as a matter of fact the Anglo-Saxon everywhere is rather partial to a good cry if only as a luxury. The same writer quotes Mr. George R. Sims to the effect that not so very long ago even sophisticated Londoners were devoted to songs of the funeral order. Some years ago Mr. Sims took Henri Rochefort to the Moore and Burgess minstrels. Rochefort sat open-mouthed, bewildered, and when some of the songs were translated into French for his benefit, he was still more amazed. The minstrels sang with tear-stained voices, "Close the Shutters, Willie's Dead;" of how they would meet "Belle Mahone" at heaven's gate; the fate of Nellie Gray plunged them in the depths of woe; there were other songs concerning coffins and shrouds. The audience was immensely pleased. After it was over Rochefort said to Mr. Sims; "Who is the proprietor of this troupe? Is he an undertaker? I have been looking on the program for a list of his charges." It is perhaps well to remember that tears as tears have no special virtue and that a relish for melancholy sentiment is not the last test of a sound piety.

Preparing the Churches for Unity.

Unity will not come until there is agreement as to what is essential and what is not essential in creed and conduct. The motto, "In essentials, unity," is a fine one, but we are still in the fight to determine the essentials. Whenever a man rises and announces that he is going to solve the problem of unity off-hand, it is time to adjourn. The churches are learning how to live together but they will have to attend the school of experience a long time before they can say the lesson without prompting. Concerning the work that is being done to prepare the churches for unity, the Congregationalist and Christian World says:

With Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Disciples, Northern and Southern Presbyterians, Northern and Southern Baptists, committed by the action of their respective national bodies to a joint conference on questions of faith and order, the plan first proposed by the Episcopalians at their Cincinnati convention appears to have made good headway in the six months since it was first broached. During these months many informal conferences have been held and much correspondence exchanged between leaders in the different bodies eager for closer relationships. The only sect that has definitely refused to become a partner to the proposed conference is the Cumberland Presbyterian, made up of those who would not go into union with the Northern church, and are now a "rump" by themselves. But the main trend within the leading denominations in this country is in the direction of a greater unity than is now manifest. Yet a large educational work needs to be done before notable progress will be registered. We heard an address by an Episcopalian the other night which, while starting out with strong professions of desire for unity, confused the matters at issue, introduced irrevelant theological considerations, ended inconsequentially, and was throughout so unbending in its churchmanship that the particular audience for which it was designed, made up chiefly of Episcopalians, could hardly have obtained a fair conception of what the commission of their own church was undertaking to bring about, and how it was undertaking to do it. Because of this state of ignorance, coupled in many cases with indifference, we welcome such an article as that of Dr. Newman Smyth in the July Century, entitled Apostles of Reasonableness. He sketches the effort in the latter part of the seventeenth century to reunite Catholicism and Protestantism in which Bossuet for the former and Leibnitz for the latter were the leaders. He also describes the efforts made by the English Latitudinarians, among them Lord Falkland and John Hales, to reconcile opposing forms of church government. Doctor Smith concludes his articles with these strong words:

"These apostles of reasonableness, of whom their world was not worthy, have not failed. Once understood only by the few, the multitude now would go forth to hear them. The warfare of other days for liberty is accomplished; the once irrepressible conflict between opposing doctrines has given place to an age of church reconstruction. The welcome word among all denominations is "Let us have peace." The higher life of the whole country demands a united Christianity. A whole church is needed to do the work of the church throughout the world. Modern civilization cannot be saved by a Christianity divided against itself."

Build Up the Home Church.

The man who is so busy with great schemes for the promotion of national greatness that he has no time to provide for his family is not a good citizen. The good man attends to the needs of his own neighborhood. There is danger that some who are interested in the larger work of the church will underestimate the importance of the local field. On this the Congregationalist and Christian World says:

Said a pastor in our hearing last week, "It is time to put the emphasis afresh on the work of the local church." We heartily agree with him, not that we are unfriendly to the movements and enterprises that head up in national and international assemblages, and that call into the field secretaries and other official workers. Each movement should be judged by the demand for it and the work it can do. But it is easier to project on paper a large scheme, to get a number of men to assent to it under the influence of effective after-dinner speaking at well spread tables, than it is to do the everyday work of the kingdom of heaven in the local parish, in the Sunday-school, in the neighborhood gathering, on the committee or board whose doings never get into print, but whose faithfulness or unfaithfulness makes or mars the local church. Laymen who give themselves to the larger service of the kingdom should look well to it that their energy and interests are not drained away from the churches to which they belong and where their ability and initiative are doubtless needed. Having said all this, it is fair to add that so far as our observation goes the men most active in interdenominational undertakings are as a rule among the most loyal and serviceable members of their respective churches.

The Attitude of Jesus Toward Public Authorities

Jesus was obedient to the law of the land. Pilate found no fault in him, that is, he found that Jesus had not violated the law. Whatever we may think of Pilate's character, there can be no doubt that he knew what Rome required of her subjects and when men were living according to Roman requirements.

"My kingdom is not of this world." This was spoken in explanation of Jesus' conduct during his trial. He was not expecting to establish his kingdom by the sword and consequently he had not called upon his servants to destroy his enemies. He does not justify the disciple in denying that he has obligations to the state. The kingdom of Christ is greater than any state. The ambitions of rulers are often at variance with the aims of those who understand Christ and are most loyal to him. It does not follow, however, that the Christian is bound to despise the rulers of his country. Jesus gave them the honor that was due to their station.

A bad man in office is restrained by laws and traditions. Nero was a terror to any who seemed to be in the way of his ambitions or whims; in the provinces the law was as well enforced as it was under better emperors. The scribes were hypocritical and selfish; nevertheless, they represented a system of law that was worthy of the Jews' allegiance and the scribes were entitled to respect when they interpreted the law. The governor of an American commonwealth is sometimes an inferior man morally and mentally, but we are bound to honor him as governor when he enforces the laws. Jesus has left us a word on this subject which we need to ponder. We are apt to treat laws contemptuously because we doubt the honesty of legislators and executives.

Herod Antipas was looking for a wonder to entertain him. Jesus did not belong to that class. Hence he declined to gratify Herod's curiosity. The ruler did not know the rights of the accused or else he did not care for the feelings of his prisoner. The king and the governor are men and when they ignore the rights of citizens they must be treated like other sinners. During the Perean ministry Jesus had exposed the cunning of Herod. His silence and his few words before his priestly judges disclosed their animosity and their determination to condemn him in disregard of his innocence. Crooked men in office appeal in vain to the followers of Jesus to withhold criticism, provided the followers of Jesus know what their Master really did and feel impelled to imitate him.

"Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's; and unto God the things that are God's." Jesus plainly teaches that men have obligations to the state. This teaching, we may believe, Paul had in mind when he wrote, "Render to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honor to whom honor." "Rulers are not a terror to the good work, but to the evil." "His is a minister to God to thee for good." The fear that Christianity will weaken patriotic feeling is unfounded. The Japanese discovered this during the war with Russia. Japanese Christians were loyal to the state. Christianity will teach men to despise the patriotism that glories in war and in the ruin of rivals and will give men in its stead a sense of pride in their country's achievements in science and art and in the conquest of disease and in the rights it guarantees to all.

The attitude of Jesus toward public authorities appears in the prayer of Clement of Rome. In this prayer Clement speaks what he believes is the mind of Christ, and he had the means of knowing that mind. It is for secular rulers he prays. "Give concord and peace to us and to all that dwell on the earth * * * while we render obedience to Thine Almighty and most excellent Name, and to our rulers and governors upon the earth. Thou, Lord, and Master, hast given them the power of sovereignty through Thine excellent and unspeakable might, that we, knowing the glory and honor which thou hast given them, may submit ourselves unto them, in nothing resisting Thy will. Grant unto them therefore, O Lord, health, peace, concord, stability, that they may administer thy government which Thou hast given them without failure. For Thou, O heavenly Master, King of the ages, givest to the sons of men glory and honor and power over all things that are upon the earth. Do Thou, Lord, direct their counsel according to that which is good and well-pleasing in thy sight." [Midweek Services, Aug. 23. Matt. 17:24-27; 22:15-22; 23:1-3; 26:62; 64; Luke 23:8, 9; John 18:19-23. Cf. Rom. 13:1-7; 1 Pet. 2:13:17.] S. J.

A New Evangelistic Plan

Automobiles are changing the character of Christian work in many parts of this country and Europe. The changes have been talked about for some time. This summer they arrived. For years autos have been mentioned in sermons of many preachers, always to be deplored and those who ride in them to be condemned when they rode on Sundays, and especially during church service hours. Now autos are returning the compliment by assisting Christian work more than almost anything in these later days.

In this country and Canada, in England and Scotland, and in some measure in France and Germany, the practice has been invented this summer of arranging preaching circuits. At specified hours an auto arrives at church, hall or possibly school house or open air. In it are preachers, singing leader, and maybe lay worker to distribute literature. A service is held, an address made, many hands shaken, and as many goodbyes. An hour later the thing is repeated a few miles farther on. In some parts of England, where villages are near together, as many as ten services a day are reported.

In Rocky Mountain states this month there are at least a dozen autos, some with two evangelists and some with laymen in addition, one of the latter the chauffeur, going from settlement to settlement without previous arrangement, and preaching, praying, talking, selling Bibles and giving away tracts, wherever two or three, many or few, can be gathered. Evangelists report the work productive of much good, and news from communities visited, such news arriving by the way of missionary societies, is in all cases favorable.

Schools are being established to train laymen to speak in public. These laymen are mature men usually, but a few are students on vacation. These laymen supplement the ministers on auto trips. Some religious bodies look forward to vast numbers of volunteer lay speakers.

In Connecticut, Ohio, Virginia and Wisconsin, possibly in some other states, ministers stationed in one town have formed circuits four to ten times as large as they could have formed under the horse-and-wagon era, and this summer are maintaining preaching services on them. The old-fashioned Methodist itinerate system has come in again, a grip under an auto seat taking the place of the old saddle bag. Christian people in small towns, cut off from religious privileges, have heard of the new auto plan and are not only appealing to missionary societies to arrange tours to include their settlements, but in some cases are offering to contribute, in company with other settlements, the auto that will make the plan feasible. America, Canada and a good part of Europe are introducing the automobile.

Pray and read and read and pray, for a little from God is better than a great deal from men. There is nothing that so abides with us as what we receive from God; and the reason why Christians at this day are at such a loss as to some things is because they are content with what comes from men's mouths, without searching and kneeling before God to know of him the truth.—John Bunyan.

"A Book and a Shady Nook"

These lines are written during vacation. I am in old Boone County, Kentucky, and out in the country. These parts for me will wear a halo ever. Here it was I began my ministry, here it was I married and hither every year for a decade we have come for a happy visit with the family at the old homestead.

Very quietly do I spend my vacations here, but I am in the habit of reading a good many books during my stay. "Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife" a good book has even stronger influence over me than amid the distractions and multitudinous noises of the city. I can commune with it better here. I like to read for a quarter of an hour or so, and then look up and out over the quiet fields and listen to my friend, the cardinal, as he whistles blithely. I like much to reflect thus on what I have read, and when after such rest to eye and mind, I come back to the printed page with a sense of serenity and even exhilaration. I have been here this summer but ten days yet and have read some six or seven volumes and as many more await my taking them up. They comprise a variety of subjects: Fiction, biography, sermons (but one volume), and studies in social Christianity out-bulking all the others.

I like good fiction, therefore, I took up first with avidity Arnold Bennett's "The Old Wives Tale." It is a long tale and is full of reminders of Charles Dickens' style. But it is original too. It is really a strong work, as different from the average novel of today as white lilacs from sunflowers. It is a tale of humdrum, every-day life with some successes and many tragedies and defeats. It takes the two chief characters from girlhood, to the grave, marries them and settles them down midst environments, as unlike as Tennyson and Walt Whitman in style,—but this is enough. It will please and repay handsomely any one who appreciates fine character delineation to read this book. Mr. Bennett certainly has an infinite capacity for details.

"The Long Roll," by Mary Johnston, I took up with anticipation of pleasure, and I put it down with keen experience of disappointment. It, too, is a long drawn out tale, but it is mostly a narrative of the campaigns of the civil war in Virginia rather than a work of fiction. As such I should imagine it is valuable. But I prefer to get my history in works purely historical, although a real historical novel, which this is not, may and frequently does illuminate historical events quite wonderfully. However, the author's picture of Stonewall Jackson is fine, though a bit disappointing at first, showing him at it does, gaunt, adwward, given to sucking many lemons instead of smoking cigars, as Grant did, (a habit not less commendable, but just a trifle undramatic); ungracefully mounted on his "Little Sorrel" and not popular with his men in the beginning. But General Jackson is transfigured in the end. Steadily does he grow in the estimation of General Lee and the armies until amid a blaze of glory and overwhelming tragedy his brave God-fearing spirit takes flight.

"Social Solutions in the Light of Christian Ethics," by Thomas C. Hale of Union Theological Seminary, I read with greatest profit. I am giving the book a second reading now. A casual glance at the table of contents indicates its value to one desirous of help in articulating the church with the great social problems of our age. Here are a few chapter headings: "The Social Outlook of Jesus." "What is Our Social Order?" "The Christian Church and a Social Program." "Individualism in the United States." "The Social Proposals of Anarchy." "The Rise of Socialism." "Marxian Socialism." "The City and the Kingdom Dream," etc., etc. Two sentences from the author's preface will show the purpose and spirit of his book. "These pages are especially addressed to intelligent and earnest Christian men seeking light upon the social message of the religion of Jesus. The aim is to arouse interest and discussion, and also to illustrate what seems to the writer should be the Christian adult's way of looking at life." This book is invaluable to the minister. The author's information was obtained first hand. He knows whereof he writes when he defines or seeks to interpret Socialism, Single Tax and the like. He is thoroughly Christian in attitude and spirit and he presents, within the compass of 384 pages, technical matter that one could only obtain by the close reading of dozens of volumes. Especially commendable is the "Selected Bibliography" which constitutes chapter thirty-two.

The book of sermons is by Prof. David Smith of Magee College, Londonderry, Ireland. His writings in the British Weekly and his "In the Days of His Flesh" have given Professor Smith wide and deserved reputation. This volume, "Man's Need of God," is a collection of strong and exceedingly readable sermons preached at Blairgowrie. The one on "The Perseverance of Believers" is the happiest and only popular presentation of the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints I ever read. Professor Smith distinguishes between "falling from grace" and "backsliding." It is indeed an extraordinarily beautiful and satisfying sermon. After reading it I am of the opinion that I am a Calvinist and have been all the time. My friend, the cardinal, is whistling to me and I lay aside pen and paper and go to keep an engagement with him in the woods.

A Tramp Who Was a Hero

I was curled up on the walk one cold afternoon trying to catch a fragment of much needed sleep and to keep warm at the same time. That particular spot was made halfway comfortable by the piping under the pavement. You see, I was what they call a "tramp" dog. I confess I had no home, but that was no fault of mine. I had a master once and a comfortable home and I was happy. But master was one day called away on a long journey and made provision for my lodging at a neighbor's whom I knew from the start I could not succeed in pleasing. In less than a week he had nailed up the door of my kennel, and shut off my source of supplies. I took the hint and deported myself, spurred on by the growing pangs of hunger.

As I lay there huddled up that cold December afternoon I wondered how long this fast was going to last. The memory of my few months of happiness when I was at home and knew how fresh meat and clean table-leavings tasted, and received encouraging words and gentle patting—all this had faded through the loneliness and misery of trampdom.

If I could only prove my right to live, to a home, to kind treatment and a place in some child's heart! I had made advances enough, only to have my good intentions misinterpreted. I had gone so far as one day to pick up a scarf a child had let slip from her shoulders, and proceeded to restore the same, but before I could do so a half-dozen pedestrians were chasing me across the street, and in the shuffle the scarf was ruined by the feet of one of my pursuers. The child burst into tears, and imprecations followed me, even far up the alley. That sort of thing had completely discouraged me and I concluded that dogs understand men a great deal better than they understand us.

I do not know how long I lay there thinking of man's inhumanity to dogs. I know I fell asleep, and from my sleep was sharply aroused by the sound of breaking glass. Looking around I caught sight of a man thrusting his arm through a hole in the window of the jewelry store near by. No one was passing and it was plain the burglar was succeeding in his work. I knew what it all meant. I leaped to my feet and as the fellow turned to run I was at his heels barking furiously. He cursed me and kicked at me, but that only made me more determined. He darted into a dark alley, I being close behind.

On through the length of the narrow way he ran. By the time he emerged into the next thoroughfare where he hoped to have some chance of mingling in the holiday throng, he found me close upon him. My gatling-gun bark finally attracted the attention of passers-by. They surmised the situation and joined in the chase. I gave way to no one, and when at last a big policeman nabbed the fleeing man and brought him to a standstill I had him by the trousers-leg.

"It's no use, gentlemen," he said with the short breath he had left. "If it hadn't been for that dog and his yelp I'd have got away. He's worth more than the whole bunch of you."

Well, there the lane turned and I came into my own. Things happened so quickly after that, I really lost track. Mr. Williams, the jeweler, actually took me, dirty as I was and steaming from exertion, and carried me into the store. There I met his wife and the sweetest little girl I had ever seen. I was the hero of the hour.

When finally it came time to close the store, visions of dark alleys and cold retreats came back with double force after this little taste of heaven, but, to my astonishment, I was bundled up and actually carried out to the waiting automobile and away we sped.

"Listen!" said the sweet little girl, laughingly shaking her finger in my inquiring face. "Just as soon as we get home I'm going to tie a pretty pink ribbon about your neck and you are going to be my playmate forever and forever. And how does that suit you?"

I suppose in answer I embarrassed them all, for I barked all the way home, and danced about so that my mistress could hardly keep my wrap about me. My day of grace had begun.—Our Dumb Animals.

Materialism; The Way Out

BY KARL E. GUTHE.

EDITORS' NOTE—The impression prevails among uninformed people that the higher institutions of learning, and especially the state universities, are hostile to religion in their temper and teaching. This impression has been deepened and cultivated to the point of injustice by the provincial and sectarian religious press. The universities have been conceived of as a sort of heathen mission field to be evangelized by the churches from the outside. Now at last they are waking up to the task of teaching religion from the inside. That this is possible despite sectarian sensitiveness is one of the good signs that sectarianism is fading out. At the University of Michigan a plan has been worked out for certain instructors, representing every department of the university to co-operate in offering courses on religion. For some of these regular credit is given. Others are of a more popular character. We have in hand three addresses given recently as part of this plan. The first of these by Professor Guthe, rich with significance because of its author's authority in the field of physics, we are giving our readers this week. The other two will follow in subsequent issues. Certainly they will do much to redeem university life from the charge of "godlessness."

1. With great hesitancy I speak to you upon one of the great problems of humanity, because I realize fully that I lack a thorough knowledge in philosophical as well as in biological and physiological matters. Such knowledge seems to me to be essential for one who wishes to speak with authority upon the subject. However I have thought a good deal about it and now have found a solution offering me a certain satisfaction, though it may have been obtained by passing along a road which many of you would not follow.

I sincerely believe that each man must solve the problem in his own way by a method best adapted to his temperament, his scientific and religious attitude. So I present what I have to say, simply as a personal view without claiming that it is the only correct view. But I wish to impress you with the importance of the problem and to show that it is your duty to devote earnest thought to its solution. You have during these years of university life wonderful opportunities, offered only to a small percentage of our American youth.

Unfortunately the university is by too many looked upon only as a sort of tutor who drills you for a certain profession and gives you the small amount of book learning needed in later life. But only he is a true student who combines with a serious preparation for his chosen profession a yearning for knowledge as a means of developing his mental faculties and of reaching a position of thoughtful independence in scientific matters.

Back of human culture and civilization we find as the moving power this desire to find an answer for the many questions presented by the varied experiences of our life. Two widely different methods have been employed towards their solution.

a. The purely contemplative method of ancient and medieval times, with its attempts to construct a satisfactory world picture by deduction from general abstract principles.

b. The much younger scientific method which applies the reasoning power, first to the investigation of simple phenomena or of a small, evidently similar group of phenomena, and starting from these, tries to reach the goal by systematic generalizations. With this latter method as the parent of materialism we have mainly to deal today.

2. The method of science is simple and sure. It builds up a system of laws, tested by experiment and applicable at first in limited fields only. But as it advances, it is found that some laws which have been established for apparently dissimilar phenomena can be combined into a larger law. Every now and then a genius arises with clearer vision than all his predecessors possessed and he at once lifts us to a higher point of view. I like to compare this constant advance with the exploitation of an unknown land. We climb from hill to mountain and on to still higher peaks. The greater an elevation we reach the more distinctly we see just how the mountain ranges connect the different points reached by our predecessors; and our delighted eye enjoys views which they could hardly imagine as being possible.

Let me remind you how by the discovery of the law of gravitation the great Newton comprised within the one, marvelously simple mathematical relation all those restricted laws, known up to that time, the law of freely falling bodies, of the periodicity of the tides, of the motion of the moon and Kepler's laws of the motion of the planets. The 19th century is especially noteworthy for the rapid advancement of science. It seemed as if mankind were reaching by leaps and bounds the highest goal, the discovery of a single formula whose application would in every case lead to a satisfactory solution of any given problem.

There was the law of conservation of energy which suddenly revealed the closest relation between different branches of physics formerly considered as being entirely disconnected. The nature of heat was satisfactorily explained by the assumption of irregular motion of the smallest particles of a body; and thus the science of thermal phenomena was closely linked to that of mechanics and the theory of gases.—Maxwell gave us the electromagnetic theory of light, a set of equations, governing electric phenomena as well as those of light. Chemists were able to produce by synthesis in the laboratory organic substances found only in living bodies.—Darwin's immortal work supplied the biologists with the principle of evolution.

The great success of the physical sciences called for an application of their laws in other fields. Physiological research showed, that mental processes are closely connected with the development of the structure of definite organs, that pleasure or pain follow the stimulating of certain nerves, that the removal of gray matter from the brain is accompanied by a cessation of intelligence. I remind you also of the interesting results in psychological reactions, that, whenever mental operations are concerned in physiological reactions, a relatively much greater time is required for a nerve center to perform its adjustments, than when a merely mechanical or non-mental response is needed. In short, it has been proven beyond any doubt that there exists a close connection between brain reaction, measured by physical and chemical means, and mental effort.

Can we blame the scientists of those days that, fired with the enthusiasm, born by recent discoveries they hoped for an explanation of every phenomenon in nature on the basis of a molecular hypothesis, that they expected to be able to prove how definite combinations and arrangements of material particles can produce and are the only cause of life, consciousness and mental processes?

But right here the question must have arisen: "How is it possible that personality, this by-product of physical and chemical reactions of the brain cells, remains one and the same, while as we know the originators of the mind, the cells, die and disappear from the body, while new ones take their place?" or "How is it possible that this product has such a profound influence upon the material world that it can chain the forces of nature and compel them to do its bidding, though it owes them its existence?"

3. Before proceeding to a discussion of this problem of matter and mind, let us first consider just what physical science in its widest sense can actually do and what it can reasonably hope to do, without encountering serious opposition from anyone who has a knowledge of the subject.

Scientists have an unbounded belief that this universe is a reasonable universe; they are convinced that every phenomenon in the outer world must proceed according to definite unchangeable laws. Wherever the same conditions are produced, independent of time and place, the same results must follow. Thus certain laws of nature, expressed in mathematical terms have been discovered in physics; for example, that of universal gravitation, the laws of reflection and refraction of light and the various laws governing electric and magnetic action. They have been found to be exact under whatever conditions they have been tested. But let us keep in mind: These laws are mathematical expressions for the quantitative relations between physical concepts. They do not explain the nature of these quantities nor the ultimate cause of the phenomena.

From the first, provisional explanations have been attempted, but they had to be remodeled as science advanced. It is of especial significance that in all the many changes of theories, the experimental laws remained unchanged.

Though we need hypotheses in our work, science is not a system of hypotheses, but a system of experimental facts. We consider hypotheses simply as embellishments, which, like garments, may be takekn oT and changed, as soon as they do not longer fit growing science. We have always been able to substitute for the old theories better ones, of wider scope, and often simpler and more reasonable. And with all this, the more we know of the universe and the better we learn to measure the quantitative relations between different phenomena, the more numerous become the suggestions of order and the more excitingly near do we come to a satisfactory demonstration of this feeling that the universe as a whole is subject to law and order. I believe it is the hope of every true scientist that mankind will in the end be able to discover the world formula, the expression as well of the minutest as of the grandest physical phenomena known to mankind. The great mathematician Laplace told us what the human mind would be able to accomplish, after this discovery had been made.

Having a knowledge of the exact positions and motions of every material particle in the universe, we could by an application of this law, not only predict the future, but by working backward, clear up the mysteries of the past, just as the astronomers from a study of the orbit and motion of a comet can predict the day of its appearance or tell us just when it must have been visible in former centuries.

Let us not say that this beautiful dream can never become reality. I myself believe that every scientist should work towards the solution of this grand problem, even if it seems now to be forever beyond our reach.

4. Now materialism will say that when this utopian state of intellect has been reached, and perhaps long before that time, we shall be able to explain consciousness, our hopes and fears by the molecular arrangements of nerve cells and by a measurement of their physical and chemical reactions. Such a conclusion, however, seems to me to be unwarranted and at this point I must part company with the materialist. I believe that he has a much higher opinion of the power of explanation of the physical sciences than the physicist himself, though after what I have just said about them, you can hardly accuse me of being very pessimistic in my estimate of the possibilities of science. Since my main argument hinges on this point that the materialist overestimates the value of scientific explanation, let us consider for a few minutes just what we actually know about the physical world, this combination of matter and motion, upon which the materialist bases his faith.

I have mentioned the law of gravitation as one of our great laws and asserted that a law is simply an expression of scientific facts. How do we explain gravitation? Well, at the present time we do not attempt to do it, and the great Newton himself did not do it. It is true, some people thought they found an explanation by saying that mass had an "innate" power of attracting other masses. But we do not longer believe in such a mysterious, soul-like longing of matter for matter. All we know, is, that a certain equation governs the interaction of bodies, separated in space. And even if we could show that it is a result of a certain strained condition of the ether, we would not have solved the question.

Matter is a valuable concept and tool for the expression of physical equations. We may measure certain phenomena connected with it, for example the weight of a piece of lead. We may even, in course of time, be able to show how an atom is made up of electric charges, the electrons, which by their arrangement in space and by their relative motion, determine the properties of the atom. But then, how about these electrons and the properties with which we must endow them?

Or let us take the law of conservation of energy. We believe in the existence of energy and know the exact relations between what we call the different forms of energy. It presents itself to us in different ways, kinetic energy, potential energy, electrical energy, heat, etc.; and we can measure it as such, i. e., from the particular point of view under which it appears to the limited range of one of our sense organs.

An electric cell,—for example a dry battery,—produces an electric current and it is usually stated that the cause for the current is the chemical reaction going on in the cell. On the other hand, if a current is sent through a solution of sulphuric acid, we notice that it is accompanied by a production of hydrogen and oxygen, and it is usually said that in this case the current is the cause of the chemical reaction. Now, have we any right, except perhaps for didactic reasons, to call anyone of these reactions, all of which are going on at the same time, the cause of the others? We can measure each form of energy with great exactness, and have found that there exists in every phenomenon an equivalence between the different forms; but that is all and indeed it is all that is needed in physics.

I cannot help but feel that this so-called transformation of energy, one form being the cause of the other, is only a crude interpretation of the actual phenomenon. I much rather believe in a cause lying behind the phenomenon as a whole, and that on account of our limitations it appears to us only under different aspects and that we have been unable so far to understand its whole meaning.

I have given these examples in order to emphasize my point that we may understand the exact mechanical movement of the world machinery; we may, as science advances, get a clearer insight into the minutest details of this marvelous system of matter, force and energy, but even the most advanced mechanical theory will only enable us to see the machinery, measure the size of its parts, determine the exact time when one part will interlink with another and calculate the effect upon other parts of the machinery.

Our body with its sense organs I take to be mechanical instruments given us for the examination of the material world, to help us in an understanding of its working. Do not let us attempt to use them for the investigation of a world for which they are blind. As any other mechanical instruments they cannot and will not see anything, beyond the material world.

5. The materialist will doubtless pity me for making such futile attempts to understand the nature of matter and energy. "Why," he exclaims, "it is all so simple, there is nothing whatever behind these concepts; they are here, that is all. It is folly to try to see something which does not exist at all."

But just this negative attitude is the weak point of the materialistic theory. A power to state fully, not only what is, but also what is not, has not been acquired by any of the sons of man. It is indeed the greatest stimulus in research that in course of time so many things have been discovered of whose existence nobody in former times ever dreamed.

6. Now let us turn to the most important point of all, the cause of mental processes. The materialist admits the existence of the mind, but considers it merely as a by-product of the physical and chemical reactions of the brain cells. It seems to me that we cannot afford to have a by-product appear in our world machinery. As I have said before the whole attitude of science reflects our conviction that there is order and unity in the world, that the physical universe is at least a rational unity whatever else it may be, and that it works according to a definite plan. A by-product would make the whole plan an unsatisfactory one. I cannot see how a materialist can get around this difficulty. I agree fully with him that there is no room for the soul in his mechanical world picture. But why shall we be content with looking at it only from one point of view?

Energy in a physical sense is observed and studied from one point of view only, but it has nothing whatever to do with the mind. Energy is due to the motion of particles of matter or due to certain strains in material bodies or in ether filling all space. It is a phenomenon of extension, i. e., it must have space at its disposal before it can reveal itself. How about the mind? If it is a form of mechanical energy, where is the space it occupies and how would it affect the law of conservation of energy, if there were any measurable interaction between the mind and physical energy? I for one do not wish to have quantity of life interfere with physical measurements. The mind cannot by itself move things; physical energy is a thing entirely apart from it. As far as scientific investigations of the material world are concerned we should undertake them from the materialistic point of view. But with as much right may we demand that life and consciousness shall not be measured by physical instruments nor by such mechanical contrivances, as our eye, or other organs of our body.

The great German physiologist DuBois-Reymond says very correctly: "Even the unattainable ideal of Laplace's mind will be unable to understand consciousness on a mechanical hypothesis."

Haekel by his unwarranted assumption, that small material particles have a kind of mind, an undeveloped memory, simply relegates the inexplicable to the atom, instead of tackling the difficulty where it actually occurs. Even, if we admit this proposition, is it not still more wonderful and inexplicable, that from the conglomeration of these innumerable "molecular" minds, there results an idea of our personality as a complete unit? No introspection can lead us to a recognition of different subdivisions of our "Ego."

7. I do not see the slightest reason for quarreling about the two aspects under which the world appears to us. Just as in the study of transformation of energy the most satisfactory view was obtained by the assumption of the existence of something larger than the different forms under which it appears to us, so let us also in this case place personality, including both body and mind, above any one-sided view of it. Are we not constantly met by experiences which show that this is the only reasonable attitude to take?

Only a few days ago most of us listened to a fine concert in University Hall. Let us describe just what we experienced. There was a combination of vibrating strings, of compressions and rarefactions in the air, transferred from the instruments to our ears. They, in their turn, produced certain molecular vibrations in our nerves and possibly some material changes in the mechanism of our brain. Is that, what we enjoyed? I think we all forgot for a time the material aspect, in spite of the importance, absolute necessity and undisputed reality of the physical phenomena. As a physicist I am a materialist, interested in the waveforms and their numerical relations, as a lover of music I am an idealist, delighted with the harmony of music and feeling the pleasure, which it produces. No one has the right to tell me that, because I am the one, I cannot possibly be the other one too.

Our intellect may understand every one of the mechanical processes which lead to the development of a plant from the seed, which make it flower and fruit, but all our knowledge, as much as is needed for a full appreciation of nature cannot give us the pleasure which even the most unscientific person may experience in his admiration of a beautiful flower.

Naturally the question will arise: "Which of the two aspects is the more important?" This I cannot answer definitely; it seems to me to be a matter of taste. To the question: "Which is more valuable, the beautiful shape or the fragrance of the rose?" I can only answer by stating which I personally prefer.

If you see a beautiful picture, is it the patches of paint which you admire? Only

From a Presbyterian Point of View

An Editorial in The Presbyterian Advance (Nashville), With Some Editorial Correspondence

A CONSISTENT "CAMPBELLITE" CONTEMPORARY.

Let it be said, first of all, that we use the word "Campbellite" in no offensive sense, but simply because it is the word by which that body of Christian people called Disciples, or simply Christians, is best known in the territory in which this paper circulates.

If consistency is a jewel, then The Christian Century, a weekly paper published at Chicago in the interest of the Disciples, will have its crown well studded, for it is the only "Campbellite" paper of which we know that stands consistently for the great "plea," which was the very center of the movement inaugurated and promoted by Alexander and Thomas Campbell. That "plea" was for unity, and our brethren of the "Campbellite" persuasion continually have much to say about their "plea." They preach it on all occasions, but, we regret to have to say, they seldom furnish good evidence of a sincere effort to practice it.

The very existence of the Disciples is an appeal for Christian unity. In the early days they insisted upon the Bible as the only creed. They recognized no ecclesiastical authority. Each Christian must take his stand upon the Bible alone and, there being no human organization which had the right to furnish an authoritative interpretation of the Word of God, it followed that each Christian was to be left to interpret it for himself. Throughout their history the "Campbellites" have insisted that all sects and divisions are contrary to the Word of God—for which position they have good ground in such passages as I Cor. 3-4—and that, as in the beginning, there should be but one spiritual brotherhood. We are ready to say, too, that in our judgment this body of Christians has done more than any other to hold before Christian people generally the conception of Christian unity, and it has led the rest of us to see that divisions based upon narrow interpretations are harmful.

While all this is true, it must be admitted that, as a whole, our "Campbellite" brethren have not practiced and are not practicing their plea. While proclaiming against sects and sectarianism, they have become almost if not quite the most sectarian of all the sects. While insisting upon the Bible as the only creed, they have come to insist upon a specific interpretation of the Scriptures as absolutely essential to fellowship with them and, in its practical outworkings, as essential to salvation. While opposed to all ecclesiastical authority, they demand that as a prerequisite of Christian union all men must accept this interpretation as the only one which is correct and authoritative.

While this is the attitude assumed by "Campbellites" as a whole, it is encouraging to know that some of them are earnestly advocating a return to the principles of the Campbells, and the leader of this party wihin the "Campbellite" fellowship is our Chicago contemporary, The Christian Century. To illustrate the position of our contemporary: Some months ago its editors were asked how a Congregational church and a Disciple church in a certain city could be united, offering a concrete case of possible union. In replying to the question, The Christian Century said: "The only basis upon which union negotiations can proceed is the clear, frank acknowledgement that both churches are Christian churches, that the Congregational congregation is a church of Christ and the Disciple congregation is a church of Christ. The validity of the Christian character and status of the individuals of each group may not be called in question by the other. This equality of Christian status may be granted—is granted—by the Disciples without the slightest compromise of conviction. There is no reason whatever why the Disciples in Milwaukee or any other city may not accept the full consequences of this attitude and give their unreserved fellowship to Congregationalists or any other Christians who may wish to practice union with them, without raising the question of rebaptism."

In a later editorial our contemporary asks the following pertinent questions: "Are the Disciples bound down to denominational practices and traditions, to a human creed—albeit unwritten—to their own private interpretation of the Scripture, in such a way as to render them a further complication of the union problem instead of a potent factor in the solution of it?

"Have the Disciples developed an institutional life which stimulates the same sectarian prejudices as flourish in all denominations, reinforced by a not undeserved pride in the marvelous growth of their body?

"Do the men of light and leading, the officials of the various societies, for example, feel more sensitive in the matter of their adjustment to the 'denominational' consciousness of the Disciples than to the great ideals of unity which the Disciples were born to promote?"

It is evident that The Christian Century thinks these questions must be answered in the affirmative, but it is persuaded that "it is unthinkable that the main body of our people will fall back into the sectarian pit from which they have been digged." It adds: "That Thomas Campbell believed there was absolutely no good or vital reason why even the churches of his day should be divided, is a fact of history. That the apparent excuses for division have greatly diminished since his day nobody will dispute," and it is persuaded that "our ultimate testimony to Christendom will be in harmony with Thomas Campbell's declaration and address and with the ideal which has inspired us since 1809." We believe our contemporary is a true prophet and we congratulate it on both its consistency and its courage.

"My dear Dr. Clarke:—I have just read with much interest your editorial in the issue of July 13. It is certainly encouraging to have not only one's immediate brethren approving the stand The Christian Century has taken but to find such discerning sympathy in other Christian bodies as is represented by your editorial. I cannot, however, repress the prompting to speak to you about your use of the title "Campbellite." Not many papers use that word any more. It hurts our feelings. We do not want to be "Campbellites," we want to be Christians. It has never been adopted or used by our people, although in some regions, possibly, as you say, in the region where your paper circulates, it is the name commonly applied to us by others. I wish you might have yielded to the better prompting which the apology in your opening paragraph discloses and have used some other word to designate us. In certain forms of speech it sounds a bit invidious, perhaps to say "the Christians," as when Methodists, Presbyterians, etc., are mentioned and then come "the Christians." I confess that I do not like to be designated in that connection in that way myself, but the title Disciple is just as usable as Methodist or Presbyterian and is perfectly acceptable to us. Cannot you educate your people to speak of us by our right name by doing so yourself?

"I find much in The Advance to commend. Your paper has outlook and vision and appeals to me as one of the best religious papers I receive. We quote from you many times as you no doubt have observed. Very sincerely yours, CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON."

Dear Brother Morrison: Accept my thanks for your very kind letter of July 18. It is perfectly evident that you discovered that my use of the word "Campbellites" was not intended as a slight or to hurt any one. I knew perfectly well that it might hurt some, yet I deliberately used it—though it is not my custom to do so—for the purpose that I had in view. You discovered, of course, that my aim is to promote the spirit of church union. The thing that I particularly desired to do in that editorial was to impress upon our readers that within the body of people that they know as "Campbellites" there exists the broad Christian spirit which your paper manifests. It was in order to make this point that I used the word which I know is objectionable to many. I considered it for my purposes the least of two evils, the other evil being that our readers would fail to see the point.

Possibly you do not realize what is true—that there exist very many people in this part of the country who think that "Campbellite" and "Disciples" are entirely different sets of people. Indeed, it was a remark to this effect, by an intelligent minister, which led me to the use of the objectionable word in quotation marks. I feel that to speak of your people as "Disciples" would leave the impression that I was not writing about the body of Christian people popularly described throughout this section by the word "Campbellite," and I am sorry to have to say that in this part of the country it is rather difficult to bring our people to see that the spirit which you manifest is to any appreciable extent prevalent in your body. In Nashville, for instance, where there are twenty-seven Christian churches, I understand twenty-five of them have practically no fellowship with the two which represent the broader type, although these two are not as broad as the "Christian Century."

All of this is my apology for the use of the term in this particular case, and, indeed, one of the things which I have been attempting to do is to educate our readers to speak of you by the more acceptable name. I assure you that I thoroughly appreciate your criticism and protest on this point and want you to understand the reason that I used the word. If you have been reading the paper long, you would discover that only in exceptional cases have I used it.

Permit me to reciprocate your kind words about the "Advance" by saying that both Dr. Wigginton and myself feel in some way that The Christian Century is more perfectly in accord with our own spirit and purposes than any other paper that comes to our table. We want you to consider that we are right with you in a broad outlook and in the desire for the promotion of practical Christian unity. Very cordially yours,

JAS. E. CLARKE.

The Moral Leaders of Israel

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XXXIV. The Prophet of Consolation.

August 27. Text for Special Study, Isaiah 40.

1. THE LENGTHENING EXILE.

The formal period of the exile lasted from 586 B. C., the date of the destruction of Jerusalem, to 538 B. C. when the decree of Cyrus gave to the captive nations held within his dominion the privilege of return to their former homes. Jeremiah had spoken of this period as the seventy years of captivity. (Jer. 29:10), and the author of the apocalyptic book of Daniel in later days referred to it as the "seven weeks" of years, or forty-nine years (Dan. 9:25). It was actually about a half century in duration, although for most of the Jewish people who were removed to the East it had no end, for very few of them availed themselves of the privilege of return.

In the early part of this period Jeremiah was the monitor of the scattered Hebrews in Palestine, and later in Egypt. He even wrote letters of counsel to those of his countrymen who had been taken to Babylonia (Jer. 29:1). Ezekiel was the friend and shepherd of a group of the people dwelling in Tel-abib, on the river Chebar. But neither of these prophets survived beyond the middle period of the evile, and meantime the conditions industrial and religious gradually changed and new dangers appeared.

It was natural that at first the people in Babylonia should be depressed and disheartened by their condition, particularly after the news reached them that Jerusalem had fallen. But this mood wore away. Gradually the opportunities of the new land appealed to them, the old homesickness for the hills of Palestine yielded to an appreciation of the land in which their lot was cast. Babylonia was the center of the world in political and commercial interest. The caravans of all nations journeyed across the desert to reach it, and the ships of many lands sailed up from the Persian gulf to dock at its quays. Its palaces and temples were the wonder of the world, in comparison with which the most ambitious structures in Jerusalem seemed insignificant. If the Babylonian dominated the world in matters which pertained to industrial, military and political success, why was not their religion also worth adopting?

The tendency among the more alert and aggressive of Israel's sons in Babylonia was to acept the opportunities which their position opened to them, and to identify themselves as closely as possible with the world into which they had been thrown. Some of them seemed to have succeeded beyond expectations, for if modern discoveries are to be trusted, Jewish merchants occupied leading places in the mercantile circles of the great city. The vision of the old life with its worship of Jehovah, its sacrifies and ritual of the temple and its loyalty to the institutions of Israel gradually faded out in the brilliancy of such dreams of success as were induced in the atmosphere of this great world capital. What would have been the result if these Jews dwelling in the various provinces of Babplon had actually given up their national faith and abandoned totally their interest in the religion of their fathers?

It is difficult to picture to ourselves such a catastrophe, and yet that was the very problem which confronted the more sensitive and loyal spirits as the lengthening exile wore on without promise of return and the people exchanged their look up to the hills from whence their help had come for the horizontal look along the highways of commerce and the roads which offered new adventure in the east.

2. THE UNKNOWN PROPHET.

But God has never left himself without witness. Even among heathen people there have always been those who have caught some vision of the divine purpose, and have spoken it to their fellowmen. Much more in a group possessing the insight and experience of the Jews were there some spirits who watched through the night and waited with hope and confidence the dawning of the morning. To most of their countrymen there was no such future. It seemed probable that the fortunes of war had obliterated forever the name of Israel from the tablets of the world. Why should this little people expect immunity from those laws which had wiped from the record of history so many nations in the pathway of Assyrian and Babylonian conquest? The dominant mood was one of skepticism and fatalism. But the voice of prophecy had not ceased.

Somewhere among these scattered exiles in Babylonia there was a preacher of such insight and confidence that he was enabled to give his fellow Hebrews a series of messages exceeding in force and illumination any that prophecy had yet yielded to the religious life of Israel. The words of this unknown prophet finds record in chapters 40 to 55 of our present Book of Isaiah. The reasons for this decision, which is now held by a very large and incleasing list of biblical students, can only be imperfectly indicated here. It is quite clear to all readers, no matter what their inclinations may be regarding the unity or analysis of the Book of Isaiah, that with Chapter 40 the reader passes from the world of Isaiah the son of Amoz, whose public career lasted from 739 to 701 B. C., into that of the exile in Babylon, more than a century later. There is no variation of opinion from this point. More than this, the change is not merely one of time, but of literary form, grammatical habit, vocabulary and essential ideas as well. There would perhaps be a certain sentimental satisfaction in believing that the Book of Isaiah was a continuous series of messages from one great prophet. But the facts are overwhelmingly against such a view, and it is easier to admit that the writer of the later portions of the book lived in a different time and under different circumstances from Isaiah, than to give satisfactory explanation of the radical differences which appear in the comparison of the two sections of the Book. All that can be said with confidence is that in some manner this anonymous prophetic work became attached to the authentic messages of the great Isaiah, perhaps because it was natural that a great evangelical message like this should be credited to the leading prophet in the earlier life of Israel.

The names by which this section of Isaiah and its author are known are various. It is called the Second Isaiah, the Evangeical Prophecy, the Rhapsody of Zion Redeemed, the Great Unknown, and the Prophet of Consolation. At first sight it would seem strange that a section of prophecy so beautiful and impressive as this should have no name attached to it. But a moment's consideration removes this difficulty. The preaching of this prophet and the group which he represented was essentially hostile to the government of Babylonia, and was the prediction of its early fall. Such statements could not be made public without great danger to the pracher and his friends. It is probable that the messages circulated as more or less confidential and secret documents, like those of the later apocalypses. More than this, it must be remembered that literary possession and authorship were not regarded as important in the earlier centuries of the world's literature. Many of the greatest productions of antiquity are entirely anonymous, and in other instances traditional opinion regarding their authorship has been shown to be erroneous. Even among biblical books the examples of Job and the Book of Hebrews are only two of a conspicuous list of works whose authors are unknown.

3. THE TOTTERING GODS.

The essential elements of this great seciton of the Book of Isaiah are four. They are not organized into separate and detailed statement, but are mingled like the motifs of a great piece of music, recurring at intervals and interweaving themselves in the progress of the work. These four notes or motifs are, (1) the assurance of God's love and his pardoning grace, with the confident expectation that the nation is soon to emerge from its thraldom in Babylonia and to restore its ancient institutions; (2) that Jehovah, its God from the earliest days, is not for a moment to be compared in strength and wisdom with the man-made gods of Babylonia, which the thoughtless Hebrews were likely to invest with a power and dignity far beyond their desert; (3) the confident prediction that Cyrus of Persia, who was even at that moment operating in the north and east, would ere long sweep down upon the decadent Babylonian empire and master its fortresses, thus bringing deliverance to its subject races; (4) and lastly the supreme levels of this great utterance are reached in the prophesies relating to the Servant of Jehovah, whose work is essential to the progress of the kingdom of God, and who though in humiliation and distress, is not to be defeated of his ultimate success and reward.

Of these four notes the first is diffused through the entire work. It is the opening word of chapter 40 which constitutes our special study in this section, and almost every chapter of the great message contains some recurring word regarding the providential and fatherly love of Jehovah for his people and their return to their ancient home. But even more insistent is the emphasis upon the second motif. It was the constant danger that the people would yield themselves to a hopeless acquiescence to their present condition, because of their conviction that the gods of Babylonia were greater than Jehovah. If not, why had they, the people of the Covenant, suffered defeat and spoliation at the hands of these servants of Bel, Nebo and the other gods of the Babylonian pantheon? The gorgeousness of the temples and the ritual with which these gods were honored seemed to throw the figure of Jehovah into complete eclipse. It was the prophet's task to present the real facts in their true light, and to make clear that the gods whom they were tempted to reverence were less than nothing and vanity. In such passages as 40:18-21, 41:21-26, 44:9-1[illegible], [illegible]: 1-7 this theme is given emphatic treatment. With fine sarcasm the prophet shows the laborious nature of the idol manufacture, the helplessness of the gods themselves when confronted with a demand that they should predict the future or even tell something of the past and the present, and the certainty that ultimately they would be carried forth as a part of the spoil of Babylon, utterly unable to save themselves, much less people who put their trust in so worthless a faith. Never was the power of irony more admirably employed than by this prophet.

4. THE COMING OF CYRUS.

The third motif of our prophet is the assurance that there is already appearing the instrument by which Jehovah will secure the release of his people. The career of Cyrus the Great is one of the romances of history. From the little province of Anshan he went forth to subdue the smaller kingdoms of the north and east, and even penetrated to the heart of Asia Minor, taking the city of Sardis the capital of the kingdom of Lydia whose fabulously wealthy king, Croesus, became one of his captives of war. But no one dreamed that even so remarkable a conqueror would have the audacity to attack the formidable Babylonian empire. It was this confidence which made the prophet such an astonishment to his own people and the statesmen of the time to whom his message could have come. With perfect confidence on page after page of his message he speaks of this coming deliverer of Israel, now as one raised up from the east and called of God for this purpose (41:1), again as one from the north and from the rising of the sun who shall tread down rulers like the clay (41:25), again as Cyrus the divine shepherd, chosen of God and anointed, the political Messiah for the deliverance of Israel (44:27-45:3); now referring to him as a ravenous bird from the east who shall perform the counsel of God (46:11), and again as the one loved of God who shall perform his pleasure upon Babylon and her people (48:14). In such explicit and unmistakable words the prophet forcasts the ruin that is to come upon the empire through the activity of a military hero scarcely recognized as yet as of formidable power. It was not strange that such a prophet should lay great stress upon the predictive power of Jehovah and his servants as knowing the outcome of events.

5. THE FOUR VOICES (Chap. 40).

In some regards the opening chapter of the great message of consolation is one of the finest in all prophecy. No one who has listened to the opening music of Handel's Messiah can forget the prophetic words of consolation, "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God." It is as if the prophet were listening to voices that come from the four quarters of the world. There is the voice of consoling love and forgiveness, and the voice of exhortation to the removal of obstacles in the divine pathway and the effort at return to the old home, and this in spite of the fact that the leaders of the nation like grass have withered. Consolation is found in the fact that though the grass withers the promise of God abides. The third voice is that of comfort to Jerusalem to whom messengers are sent to announce that Jehovah is leading his host homeward by a path made straight across the desert.

And then after a splendid description of the power of God in contrast with the futility of idol worship, the fourth voice is heard, giving assurance of the power of Jehovah mediated to his people in the moment of their need. Far greater is that power than any possessed by athletes in the Babylonian field-sports and contests. Even such strong men fall at last, but they that wait upon Jehovah actuary increase in strength. Some of them, the greater leaders, mount up with wings as eagles; a larger number of lesser power may run and not be wearied; but even the least have the assurance that by the strength of God and by his spirit they may walk and not faint.

the most unappreciative will not see at the same time a representation of an idea, a motive which the painter has tried to express. It is this which makes the deepest impression upon us.

Study the motion of a machine, its various parts and the manner in which they are linked together. Do you not wish to know what it is intended to do and inquire about the inventive genius who conceived the idea of building it? Do you not consider the originator as more important than his work?

You have perchance a friend who has the misfortune of being a cripple. You love him certainly not for his form, but you know that in his misshapen body there lives a mind that you admire.

Our admiration of the genius who conceives the idea of a wonderful machine, our delight in a beautiful flower, our desire of helping our fellowman when he is in need—irrespective of our knowledge of sociological laws—a friend's devotion, a motner's love, —all these seem to be experiences of a much higher order, than the satisfaction we can obtain from a study of the material world. In fact I class with these feelings also the enthusiasm of the investigator in science, because—though he may know it or not—he is carried along by a power lying wholly outside that part of the world in which he makes his measurements.

8. It is difficult to discuss all important points, connected with our subject, in the short time of a single lecture; but I cannot close without giving an answer to the following question: "If you claim that personality is both matter and mind, both physical energy and consciousness, are we not completely destroyed when death claims our body?"

Our life is a constant growth of the human intellect, closely connected with the development of the body. The little word "I" is, however, vastly more than the body alone. It seems to me that the most characteristic feature of the consciousness of our individuality consists in the mass of memories of important events of our lives. We know that certain things have happened to us, may they be experiences of our bodies or our minds. But the connection between body and mind is not as close as may at first glance appear. How often is a man's attitude towards life changed quite suddenly by a powerful emotion or some remarkable experience. The body may be exactly the same as before and yet we may truthfully say: He has completely changed.

On the other hand we know that there is a continuous interchange of cells, decaying and forming, and yet, though the living tissue may in course of time be entirely renewed, the individual continues to exist. This matter and energy which has been given off from the living body has not disappeared, but it is still in existence though disconnected from the life-giving principle. Should we not demand that there is a similar law of conservation for the invisible part of our life?

It is difficult to follow this question much farther by applying scientific methods. Physical experiments leave us helpless, the intellect can not tell us, and so I have not the power to describe just what life after death is.

However I do not see any reason why the mind could not form new combinations which are beyond our comprehension, nor, why consciousness in a wider sense should cease with death. During life every personality seems to be distinct from others. But we are liable to place too much emphasis upon this, because our bodies have separate existence. Does not the mind in reality constantly expand, do we not transplant our thoughts, our ideas and aspirations into other minds? Are not in a certain sense our minds the products of those of bygone ages as well as of the time in which we live? Do they not in fact give evidence of a law of evolution in the spiritual world?

Why should we only ascribe personality to those combinations of matter and mind which appear in the form of animals or men? In a wider sense the University has a personality, a spirit; we speak of the will of the people; we find a unity of purpose and feeling in a large assemblage as this.

Many people are greatly concerned about a continuance of their soul after death as separate entities, or even in a human like form. This is not the question which I came to discuss. It has been my aim to show that science does not lead to materialism and that it seems to be a more reasonable and broader view, to assume the existence of a soul as distinct from, though closely connected with the material body during life. Science, I believe, can lead us still farther, namely to the assumption of the continuance of a soul after death, but with this science has reached its limitations.

While I have to content myself with the assertion that mind is as indestructible as matter and energy, my firm belief in evolution and in an orderly plan of this universe leads me to doubt that there can be a retrogression in its development. I believe my spirit will after death be more advanced in all the characteristics of the human soul.

And thus I find no difficulty whatever in believing in a personality embracing the whole universe and intimately blended with this marvelously intricate system of material bodies, a personality, different from ours, it is true; but, since I form a part of it, one of the same nature as my own, only grander, wiser, more powerful and more just.

In conclusion let me state again that I have tried to derive the views, here advanced, without following any philosophical or theological dogma; that they are the result of a purely scientific search after a world picture which would satisfy not only the intellect, but the whole human soul.

MEDICAL MISSIONARIES

Are educated for their work in the College of Medicine of Drake University. This college is one of the 27 high standard medical colleges of the United States. The completion of a four-year high school course and of two years of college work are required for entrance. The degree M. D. is earned at the end of four years' successful work. Scholarships covering a portion of the tuition charges are available. School opens September 18, 1911.

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

John B. Dickson of Albany, Mo., has accepted a call to Hiram, Ill.

F. A. Sword has closed his second successful meeting at Potomac, Ill.

The church at Lynnville is reported in a prosperous condition. There were four additions the last Sunday in July, three of whom were by confession of faith.

Champaign Sunday-school had an average attendance, during the month of July, of almost five hundred with on offering of almost seventeen dollars.

Chauncey Mullens, who is a student at Johnson's Bible College in Tennessee, has been preaching some of his initial sermons at Palestine, during the absence of the pastor, G. S. McGaughey.

The church at Mount Sterling has extended a call to L. G. Huff, of La Harpe, to succeed A. L. Cole who has resigned there. Mr. Huff has accepted and will begin his work there the first of September.

McLeansboro has improved its church building by the expenditure of several hundred dollars. The pastor, H. H. Williams, is faithfully and successfully pursuing his duties as leader of the congregation.

The church at El Dara is now without a pastor, H. F. Kern having closed his pastorate there August 1. Mr. Kern will enter Eureka College this fall and supply the Belle Plain Church while attending school.

At Detroit, where DeForest Mullins recently became pastor, a revival meeting will be held in the fall, conducted by John M. Asbell of Missouri, assisted by Mr. Butler of Missouri, also, the blind singing evangelist.

C. Lee Stauffer is minister at Dallas City, where a new church was dedicated August 6, Evangelist Charles Reign Scoville being the dedicator. The congregation is full of joy over its achievement of a new building, and its successful dedication of the same.

Roy L. Brown of Bellefontaine, Ohio, will assist Charles W. Ross, pastor at Litchfield, in a three weeks' meeting beginning October 15. This church maintains a successful and growing Sunday-school, having an average of more than four hundred in attendance.

R. Sheeler Campbell, pastor at Girard, has inaugurated a change in the church service by which the different organizations of the church and various classes of the Sunday-school are given full charge of the Sunday evening services. This is proving of great interest in increasing attendance.

At Texas Church, where Ernest Higdon is minister, Miss Hornbeck concluded a Sunday-school campaign, in which there was a large improvement in the methods of the school, and a decided advance in numbers. Her work is commended by the entire congregation and the pastor.

A. I. Zeller resigned at Cuba, July 23, to accept a call to the church at Petersburg. His new pastorate will be assumed September 1. Besides carrying forward a successful local work, Mr. Zeller has made a reputation as district secretary through a period of years which places him in the front rank among Illinois district officials.

A reception was held recently at the church at Centralia, as a farewell to the former pastor, J. F. Rosborough, and a welcome to A. L. Huff, who has just come from Lovington, to take charge of the work at Centralia. Mr. Huff was acorded a hearty welcome by his congregation and the members of the ministerial alliance.

O. P. Ellis has completed one year's work at Walnut. The year's report is an encouraging one. The congregation has adopted the duplex financial system, and is succeeding beyond expectations with its current expenses and its missionary offerings. There were forty-nine baptisms during the year, with a total of fifty-three additions.

There are prospects for the organization of a new church at Clay City. O. M. Eaton is now holding a meeting in this town with excellent indications for additions, and the grouping together of a good company of people for an organization. Mr. Eaton will also hold a meeting in October at Mt. Erie, where hopes are entertained of organizing another church.

First Church, Danville, is progressing with improvements on the edifice, preparatory to the State Convention. They have succeeded already in finishing the Sunday-school room, and are now able to hold their services in that part of the church. The entire congregation is working with extra zeal in preparation for entertaining the State Convention during September.

G. R. Southgate has completed a successful year's work at Colfax, and is now enjoying a few weeks' vacation at Bloomington. Mr. Southgate has been in that field for a year, and an aggressive year's work has been done. He has been retained as pastor of the church by the Colfax brethren with an increase in salary which came to him unsolicited. The Colfax church has a splendid Sunday-school and the outlook before it, is for another splendid year's work.

J. B. Holmes, of whose work at East St. Louis The Christian Century has spoken recently a number of times, went to the National Convention at Portland. He intended with such confidence to return to his church that he purchased a round-trip ticket, but once in the northwest country, where he had formerly ministered, he found the insistence of his friends and the temptations of that region were so strong as to inhibit his returning. He has decided to enter the evangelistic field, but will be available for meetings in any part of the country. His work at East St. Louis was remarkable for the number of additions which were reported, and there is decided regret that his decision was to remain on the coast.

Allen T. Shaw of Spencer, Ind., has accepted a call to Macomb, Ill.

Kansas state convention will meet this year at Parsons, October 2-5.

John McD. Horne and Finis Idleman are assisting in a meeting at Clifton Heights Church, Des Moines, Iowa.

Owen Livengood has tendered his resignation to his congregation at Weatherford, Tex.

A tabernacle will be erected soon at Herington, Kans., preparatory to an evangelistic meeting to be held there by W. J. Minges.

Charles L. Wheeler has tendered his resignation at Pawnee City, Neb., to become effective Oct. 1.

Evangelistic services are being held at New London, Iowa, conducted by Arthur Long and J. P. Garmong of Des Moines, Iowa.

Evangelistic meetings are in progress at Mitchell Park Church, St. Joseph, Mo. Good audiences are attending and there have been a number of additions.

R. O. Wickham, pastor of Indiana Avenue Church, South Bend, Ind., who resigned recently, has reconsidered his decision at the request of his congregation.

The church at Uhrichsville, Ohio, celebrated the thirty-fourth anniversary on July 30. This congregation which was organized with eighteen members now numbers 790.

The new church at Norwalk, Ohio, was dedicated July 16, by Geo. L. Snively. More than $3,700 was subscribed. H. B. McCormick is minister there.

R. H. Crossfield presided over a rally held by the congregation of Tenth Church, Bowling Green, Ky., which was held to promote interest in the campaign for a new building.

Geo. W. Buckner of Canton, Mo., is in a good meeting with Fred W. Condit, pastor at Bosworth, Mo. There have been a number of additions and good audiences are attending.

Work has begun on the new church edifice at Liscomb, Iowa. The building will be of brick and stone and will cost $12,000. The equipment will be modern in every particular.

George B. Stewart for several years pastor at Colorado Springs, has accepted the unanimous call of the church at Muncie, Ind., and will begin his pastorate there early in September.

A revival meeting will begin September 3, at Central Church, Springfield, Mo. The pastor, George C. Peters will be assisted by R. W. Abberley of Cincinnati, Ohio, and Leroy St. John of Terre Haute, Ind., will have charge of the music.

Ray O. Miller, pastor of First Church, Fresno, Calif., who resigned recently is being urged by his congregation to reconsider his decision and remain. Mr. Miller is now spending his vacation at Pasadena, Calif.

Ellis B. Barnes, pastor at Richmond, Ky., and S. M. Jefferson of Lexington, Ky., have closed a good meeting at Old Union Church in Fayette County, where John A. Gano preached fifty-two years. There were forty additions.

R. W. Abberley has held a successful meeting at Flint, Mich. This mission which was recently organized under the auspices of the A. C. M. S. is in charge of J. Frank Green, who is the living link of Central Church, Detroit, Mich.

George W. Brown sends the following report from Jubbulpore, India: "We are having a splendid summer school for Indian Evangelists and teachers. About forty are in attendance. They are most enthusiastic and take a great interest in the work. Besides the writer, Brother Cunningham of Harda, Brother Menzies of Rath, and Brother Davis of Jhansi are assisting in the work. The Indian brethren are doing their share in reviewing books, and discussing the problems of their work."

The contract for the new church at San Dimas, Calif., will be awarded in the near future. The completed structure is to cost about $30,000. A fine pipe organ is to be installed, a modern heating and ventilating system put in, and the entire structure is to be ready for occupancy by Thanksgiving day. This church was organized one year ago with a charter membership of but sixty persons. Today it is one of the influential factors in the religious life of the community, having doubled its enrollment and organized all the additional societies which give zest to the life of a church. A splendid Sunday-school has been organized, also a woman's missionary society which holds monthly meetings, all well attended and full of interest. The membership of this organization is more than sixty women. This fine growth has been experienced under handicap. The congregation has had no church building, using a public hall for all services and social meetings. Hence the congregation is anticipating larger results during the coming year with the added impetus of a new building.

Bethany Graded Lessons are

Absolutely the Greatest Achievement in the History of Sunday-school Literature.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have coöperated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.

New England Missions

The New England Board of Missions of the Disciples has called Lowell C. McPherson to be superintendent of our organized work in this section, beginning in September. Mr. McPherson is favorably known throughout this section ever since his successful ministry in Buffalo, N. Y., fifteen years ago. He has frequently addressed the conventions of this section, and has held meetings for the stronger churches, notably those at Danbury, Conn., and Worcester, Mass.

The election of an evangelist-superintendent marks a new departure in the management of New England missionary work. Hitherto, laymen have been in active control of affairs,—the last corresponding secretary having been John A. Gardiner, manager of the American Oak Leather Company of Boston. Since his resignation recently, Harry Minnick, minister of the Main Street Church in Worcester, has been performing the duties of corresponding secretary. The effective manner in which the work has been performed will be continued however, and under the hand of Mr. McPherson, all are hopeful that larger things may be accomplished.

Following the resignation of Dr. D. L. Martin, the pastor-physician who has served the Roxbury church during the past few years, Mr. McPherson has come to Boston to minister as supply in that pulpit. His sermons have been very favorably received, and his presence has inspired a hopeful spirit in the congregation. His residence in Boston will likely determine his membership with the Roxbury people, where his presence will encourage and his counsel be of great value. He will be available frequently for the pulpit, until a permanent pastor is secured.

Under the auspices of the Roxbury Church a reception was tendered to Mr. McPherson, Wednesday evening, July 19, in which members of the churches at Lynn and Everett participated. Although all the churches are greatly depleted by the midsummer exodus to the resorts along the shores, a considerable company assembled. W. S. Nelson presided. Gilbert L. Harney offered prayer. W. A. Parker spoke words of welcome, in behalf of the churches represented, and Mr. McPherson spoke feelingly and strongly in reply. All were convinced of his humility, right-mindedness and of his great capability as teacher and leader.

The work of Mr. McPherson as superintendent will begin with a meeting in the Highland Street Church in Worcester, in September. The New England convention will meet at the Main Street Church during that month. A strong program is in the making. A large attendance is promised. A larger future seems assured to the work of the churches in this section. We are all hoping it may be so.

W. A. Parker.

The Life of Jesus

In Fifty-two Lessons

BY DR. LOA ERMINA SCOTT.

A manual for young peoples and adult classes. It is conceded to be the most practicable text for its purpose on the market.

The book grew in the actual experience of teaching. From the moment it came from the press it has been in great demand. Another edition is now being prepared for.

It is just the thing for classes of young people of high school age. But it is equally well adapted to adults.

Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c.

Write today for a copy.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The graded lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' grade was complete the past year. The Primary grade will be complete for the opening of the new year—October 1. Three of the four years of the Junior grade will be complete October 1. The second year of the Intermediate grade (ready October 1) supplies boys and girls of 15 and 16 years.]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

Every lesson writer is a recognized authority in the Interdenominational Sunday School world!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that coöperation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

A NEW YEAR BEGINS OCTOBER 1

The Sunday-school calendar is made to conform to the public school calendar. While the graded lessons may be begun at any time, there are obvious advantages in starting at the beginning of the new cycle.

Send today for Price List, Order Blank and Prospectus!

If you state which grade you are chiefly interested in, we will send, in addition to prospectuses of the entire series, a teachers' and pupils' text for that particular grade. We do not send a complete outfit as free samples.

Among the subjects to be treated in our series of editorials on THE MEANING OF BAPTISM, to be begun in the issue of September 21, are the following:

BAPTISM AND THE NEW TESTAMENT.
WHO ARE THE BAPTIZED?
WHY IMMERSION ONLY?
BAPTISM AND CONVERSION.
BAPTISM AND CHRISTIAN UNION.
THE SYMBOLISM OF BAPTISM.

The entire series will contain ten or a dozen articles. They will be constructive—written without reference to any controversy. Lists of names for the TEN WEEKS FOR TEN CENTS special offer (described on page 2) are coming in by the hundreds now. Our readers are making this their own campaign for enlisting their friends in the ideals for which The Christian Century stands. Ten weeks for ten cents is one-third the regular price of the paper. Our readers feel that if we are willing to stand the twenty cents for sending the paper to their friends ten weeks they will gladly pay the ten cents for each one. CHICAGO

An Appeal

It is during these summer months definite plans are being made by young people all over the land for their college work in the autumn. There is scarcely a hamlet or town in Illinois or in the middle West which will not send at least one young man or woman to the University of Illinois in September. We are exceedingly anxious to know who these are and so have opportunity to get acquainted with them by mail before they even see the twin cities and "Illinois." We are helpless to do this save through the assistance of pastors and church workers in the communities whence these young people come.

What we want is a list of the young people of the church or who are within its constituency, who are coming to the University of Illinois this year and who might be interested in the church work after coming into our community. Without this definite help we shall no doubt get acquainted with some who come to the University from our church communities, but the work will necessarily be awkward and desultory. If we may have this simple assistance, this work may not only be thoroughly and systematically done so that none need be lost through loose methods, but much of the preliminary work may be done before the prospective student leaves his home, and he will come into the new community feeling he is coming among friends.

Our two assistant pastors at the University, provided by the Illinois Christian Missionary Society, did work of far-reaching consequences during the past year. Our plans for the student work upon which we enter the coming autumn time are not experimental in any sense, we have tried them and know they will succeed. Mildred Seyster of Kempton, Illinois, a senior in the University during the coming year, who was the assistant among women during the past year and who will continue in this work another year, is either sending personally or through some of the young women associated with her in the work, a letter to every pastor of a Church of Christ in Illinois whose name we have been able to secure. Miss Seyster is asking for information regarding the young women who are coming to the University.

Carl Colvin of Olney, Illinois, also a senior in the University and assistant among the men, is likewise sending letters to the pastors asking for information regarding young men.

I need not urge upon pastors the importance of these requests. Every church which has had the experience of bringing young people to maturity with hearts and minds strong and warm for Christian service, and sparing them a few years for their college training, only to receive them back keen of intellect but dull in spiritual and moral preception, will know the importance of this new field of activity of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society. Literally scores of young people were reached and held for deeper, stronger spiritual life during the past year through the work of these helpers. It is an age of "conservation;" what a field for the noblest sort of conservation every student community affords! surely nothing is so worthy of safeguarding as the spiritual life of the men and women of the colleges, being trained to fill practically all the places of supreme responsibility in Illinois and in all the world in the coming years.

To our sister churches we want to say we are exceedingly anxious to return your young people strong and efficient, thoroughly equipped to do the work of the church wherever their life work may be found. We are prepared for this service; the facilities afforded by our beautiful and commodious new building, fronting the campus, a splendid corps of officers and teachers in our Bible school, a strong young people's work in Christian Endeavor, and a healthful growing spirit of regard for the things of religion in this University community all conduce to make possible excellent results. We are helpless to do your work thoroughly unless you lend a hand.

If you would have us serve the churches and seek to return your young people sturdy and efficient for the work of the Kingdom, be sure to send to Mildred Seyster, Kempton, Illinois, assistant among women and to Carl Colvin, Olney, Illinois, assistant among men, the lists for which they ask.

Ten Weeks for Ten Cents

In order to introduce The Christian Century into new homes the publishers propose to send the paper ten weeks for ten cents,

Beginning With the Issue of September 21.

Names for this offer must be sent in before September 15. These trial subscriptions will be positively discontinued at the expiration of the ten weeks unless ordered continued by the subscriber.

We expect to gather a list of several thousand names for this period. One subscriber to whom the plan was explained declared that he had ten dollars to spend on that proposition and would send us the names of 100 persons whom he wishes to become acquainted with The Christian Century and its vital message. Others will send smaller lists; still others, perhaps, larger lists. This is on behalf of their paper. Let every present subscriber think over the names of the fellow-members of his church and his friends and make up a list. A good set of names would be your Sunday School teachers and officers and your board of elders and deacons. If your pastor is not now a reader be sure that he is not overlooked. We Believe Every Reader Will Send in at Least One Name.

BEGIN NOW TO MAKE UP YOUR LIST

Send it in at once. Use separate sheet or sheets of paper for your names. Put your own name at the top as the sender. Keep a duplicate copy of your list. Be sure to make addresses plain. Remittance must accompany all lists.

The Life of Jesus

IN FIFTY-TWO LESSONS

By Dr. Loa Ermina Scott

A NEW TEXT BOOK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'S AND ADULT BIBLE CLASSES

This book comes nearer meeting ALL the demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions—all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportion. It is the product of experience. Dr. Scott is teacher of a successful Sunday-school class in the Disciples' Church, at Chagrin Falls, Ohio. She has been developing this book for years. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

INTRODUCTION BY PROFESSOR E. B. WAKEFIELD OF HIRAM COLLEGE

"In her home congregation Dr. Scott sought in an unpretentious and resolute way to work out her ideal. With such opportunity as has been given her, her work has never been surpassed. For years she has held the largest and most interested class that her community has ever known; and to this very hour the solid interest has grown.

"If her published lessons will only extend her work and help to get more of real Bible teaching into our congregations, they will most surely bless the world."—PROFESSOR E. B. WAKEFIELD, of Hiram College, in the Introduction.

WORDS OF PRAISE.

I know of no book on the subject so admirably adapted to its purpose.—J. H. GOLDNER, Euclid Ave. Church, Cleveland.

I shall take pleasure in introducing the work to my next class in the Life of Christ and in commending it to others.—F. W. BURNHAM, First Church, Springfield, Ill.

It contains just the kind of work we ought to be doing in our Young People's and Adult classes.—O. W. LAWRENCE, Central Church, Decatur, Ill.

Her unusual ability and her practical experience have helped her to meet the new and growing demand for just such a course of study,—HARRIS R. COOLEY, Cleveland.

Its arrangement is excellent. Its choice of material remarkable—as much for what is omitted as for the rich material included. The questions at end of each of the fifty-two lessons reveal the teacher.—JOHN R. EWERS, East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa.

The beauty of the book is that it is an outline and cannot be used apart from the gospels themselves.—A. W. FORTUNE, Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati.

These fifty-two lessons may well serve as a training coures, and as such, the book is superior to any I have seen.—PERRY J. RICE, El Paso, Tex.

A Week at Bethany Park

The Bethany Park Assembly in Indiana opened with a fine attendance of ministers and laymen. The first week is called "preachers' week," the program being taken up mainly with addresses and discussions of particular interest to preachers. Evangelist W. J. Lhamon gave two lectures a day; Rev. W. H. Book of Columbus, Ind., preached in the evenings; Professor Walter S. Rounds, University pastor at the Indiana University at Bloomington, lectured in the afternoons and the writer spoke at eleven o'clock each day.

Mr. Lhamon's addresses were easily the most attractive feature of the week. He gave two courses, one a study and interpretation of Christ as a historic character, the other an outline comparison of five outstanding religious of the world. The two courses supplemented each other in a way, for in setting forth the character of Christ Mr. Lhamon gave an interpretation of Christianity in sharp contrast with the religions of which his other course treated. The people were much impressed with these studies, coming with promptness and regularity to hear the speaker.

There were certain impressions which Mr. Lhamon made upon me quite incidental, perhaps, to his main purpose. One was that his was an evangelical message through and through. His thought seemed to be organized around the person of Christ, not in a dogmatic sense but in a warmly personal sense. The structural symbols of our evangelical gospel—incarnation, atonement, the Lordship of Christ—seemed to form the substantial content of his mind.

Yet he comes as near being emancipated from the thrall of legalism as any evangelist I have heard. These great symbols of religion are taken by him to mean something real in personal experience. Even in so pivotal a matter as the forgiveness of sins, Mr. Lhamon gave evidence of conceiving it in terms of character. It is the sign of a new day for evangelism when it is able to say that salvation is character, defining character, of course, as Christ in us.

Mr. Lhamon shares with most evangelists an intensely critical attitude toward current evangelistic methods and standards, but he is said by those who have been in his meetings to differ from them in that he keeps his own work free of the vices he condemns in others. The severest critics of modern evangelism are the evangelists themselves. But one does not have to be a cynic to observe that in most cases the same critics are guilty of the very faults they point out in their fellow-workers.

I could not help being impressed by the absence in Mr. Lhamon's addresses of the too customary play to the galleries by attacking scholarship. In his dealing with the Scriptures he acknowledged again and again his debt to present day scholarship, frankly declaring in his last lecture that the higher criticism was, in its net result, proving a blessing to the church and making the Bible yet more secure in its place of authority in human life. His statements on this point were greeted with hearty cheers from the entire audience.

Professor Rounds spoke during the week on "The Ideals of the Preacher." His lectures were excellently prepared, revealing a mind thoroughly trained and aware of the problems confronting the present day preacher. More than by anything else I was impressed with the thought of the possibilities in such a work as that which Mr. Rounds has taken up at Bloomington. He is just such a man as can minister to college students. His scholarly point of view is thoroughly worked out. There is an absence of artifice in his style. Sincerity and deep earnestness are written on his face. His personality is of that transparent sort that college students demand in one who assumes to guide them in the things of faith.

The Bloomington Bible Chair marks a distinct development in the Bible Chair idea. Its occupant is not primarily a class room teacher, but a students' pastor. It goes without saying, however, that a students' pastor must have the scholarly qualifications of a professor and possess, besides, the fine art of touching individual souls helpfully. Any one at all acquainted with the temper and needs of college students need only converse ten minutes with Mr. Rounds to be convinced that he is peculiarly fitted to the delicate and far-reaching service involved in his new relation to the state university. It is to be hoped that Indiana's churches and resourceful laymen will perceive the importance of this work and generously endow it with their gifts.

Rev. W. H. Book was announced in the Bethany Park prospectus to preach "in his characteristic style." Before I heard him, that seemed a rather indefinite if not doubtful description. But after listening to his first sermon on Monday evening it was clear why the author of the prospectus had put down just that thing and no more. There isn't any more! Mr. Book is just "characteristic." He is Book, and that's all there is to say. For an hour and a half that evening he held his audience in a vise while he "refuted" certain bogies that he called "atheism" and "infidelity" by arguments "outside of the Bible."

It was a most entertaining evening. There were no atheists or infidels there—at least none of the sort Mr. Book was "refuting." and I do not remember ever having come across a person who held the views combated by the address, but that did not detract from the enjoyment of it. Most of us take our problems in theology in about the same way as we took our problems in geometry—the conditions are hypothetical in either case and the benefit is not in the usableness of the result but in the "mental discipline" involved in working it out. It is almost as interesting to watch a speaker demolish a man of straw as a real man—if he does it artistically. And Mr. Book's "refutation" of the "infidel" and "atheist" left nothing to be desired by the most fastidious.

But W. H. Book is more than an agile defender of orthodox doctrine. He is a preacher of the gospel. Many of his hearers took such offense at his legalistic theology that they missed the strong gospel message. The second night he preached on "Faith." In my judgment he missed the essential quality of faith altogether, identifying it with belief, an intellectual thing, while faith is a moral attitude. But anybody who was not hopelessly critical could see between the ribs of his impossible theology the vitals of true faith. I did so, at least, and went away with a blessing.

I think, however, that I enjoyed Mr. Book more on the hotel veranda than on the platform. He is full of stories and experiences. He has held many debates, but does not believe it is good to debate now. He is a strong missionary man, believing in our missionaries and our Foreign Society wth a loyalty that would as soon doubt himself as to doubt them. He takes strong, high ground against current popular revivalism and allowed himself to be quoted in the Indianapolis papers in defense of the position I took on this subject. He also allowed himself to be quoted against certain other of my positions—and this is to his credit as a man of discrimination!

Bethany Park is a good place to spend a week or two in the summer. It was my first visit there. What with my duties and my attendance upon others' lectures and the delightful and incessant conversation on the big veranda of the hotel I spent the week very humanly with little time left for the mineral baths and the communion with nature afforded by the surrounding country. Many new friendships were formed. A number of men whose names are well known as leaders in all good work of the Disciples but whom I had never before met personally, were there. Old acquaintanceships were renewed. In those conversations on the veranda and in the fifteen minute question period preceding the addresses (this period on Friday was set an hour before the regular lecture time and stretched out to an hour and a half, and then I was inconsiderate enough to keep the people another hour for the lecture of the morning!) there were disclosed many things that greatly heartened me. Of these heartening disclosures I can take space here to mention only one, and that the earnest spirit in which Disciples are facing their obligation to truly practice Christian union. Where there was not already a clean-cut conviction that it is our plain duty to freely embrace in our fellowship the whole church of Christ instead of holding ourselves apart in sectarian exclusiveness, there was at least a disposition to discuss the problem calmly.

And this marks the new day. The appeal to tradition, and to precedent and to denominational self-interest does not strike deep now. On every hand the desire seemed to be to honor Christ, to help answer His prayer, to make the Church the true instrument of His will in bringing in the Kingdom of God. C. C. M.

A Discouraging Crop Report

Conditions that everywhere gave promise of "bumper" crops up to July 1 have suddenly changed. Following the optimistic report which the agricultural department issued in July, the August report came almost like a blow, in spite of the persistent rumors of poor crop conditions. It was rather taken for granted that, while other crops might shrink because of the recent hot weather, corn would thrive and swell the total to normal figures. Now we learn that the prospective corn crop is more than 505,000,000 bushels short of the record crop of last year. But while the heaviest sufferer, the national corn crop is not the only one to shrink during the prolonged heat and drouth. From a total last year of 464,044,000 bushels, the indicated winter wheat yield this year has dwindled to 455,149,000 bushels. Similarly, the spring wheat crop has dropped from 231,339,000 to 209,575,000 bushels; oats from 1,127,000,000 to 818,000,000 bushels; barley from 162,227,000 to 139,342,000; rye from 33,039,000 to 30,677,000 bushels; and hay from 80,978,000 to 49,000,000 tons. Already the indicated shortage is affecting the stock markets and the price of pork and beef has risen. This report seems alarming enough when we compare it coldly with last year's figures, yet viewed in another light, it is not so bad after all. In only five years have the crop totals exceeded that which they will probably attain this season. This much, at least, is encouraging, and is sufficient assurance that, barring unforeseen damage, there is slight danger of suffering even among the poorer people. Besides, the crop report, while as accurate as it can be made, is not infallible. Later unofficial advices seem to imply that unfavorable conditions were exaggerated. Let us hope so.

A New Magna Charta for Britons

Aug. 10, 1911, will go down as one of the most important dates in the history of Great Britain. Scarcely less significant than the granting of Magna Charta in 1215, by King John, is the passage of the government's veto bill in the house of lords. The former placed restraints upon the power of kings. Runnymede was the first milepost on the road from despotism to democracy. Other guide-posts are numerous along the way, but the passage of the veto bill is a clear indication that the nation is well on the road to the broadest liberty, and that progress in that direction is to be uninterrupted. In 696 years the common people of Great Britain have risen from oppression and vassalage to the position of rulers of the empire. This latest victory was gained only after a long struggle. Two years ago David Lloyd-George, chancellor of the exchequer, presented the regular budget which was adopted by the house of commons, but was rejected by the lords. This course was repeated in each session of parliament since. At last, in sheer desperation, the ministry, headed by Premier Asquith, and backed by the house of commons, became convinced of the necessity of removing from the lords the power to place unlimited obstruction in the way of accomplishment of the people's will. This policy crystalized the opposition and, as a result, the people were appealed to in general election. They supported the government. The ministry was repeatedly voted the confidence of the house of commons, and, toward the end, gained strength, the veto bill finally passing that body by a three to two vote. This result was achieved only by the skilful, conciliatory tactics of Mr. Asquith. He secured the support of the Irish Nationals by promising to champion a measure providing Irish home rule. With the coalition of the Irish Nationals and the Liberal elements in the house, the Conservatives found themselves in the minority. The tug came as the lords considered the advisability of committing political suicide by passing the veto bill. This end was attained when Mr. Asquith secured the promise of King George to exercise his royal prerogative and to create enough new peers to pass the veto bill, should the Conservative lords refuse to give their approval. The king hesitated, but rather than lose his ministry he gave his assent. Then the frightened lords pleaded for a compromise, but the time for that had passed. Reform for definite evils was necessary and the Liberal government stood firm in its demands. At the last, unwilling to suffer the humiliation of having their numbers increased by hundreds of new peers, the lords bowed to the inevitable. The law may be reversed at some future time, but their prestige is gone. They still may act as a check upon the lower house, but only temporarily. They cannot delay the passage of money bills, and other bills can only be delayed for two years. This remnant of power will continue to be of benefit in foreign relations and in checking hasty legislation. The chief features of the new veto law are as follows: The veto bill is designed to regulate the relations between the two houses. It provides that if a money bill is passed by the commons and sent up to the lords, where it is not acted upon, it shall become a law upon royal assent. It also provides that the speaker of the commons shall determine what a money bill is. A further provision is that any other bill which passes the commons three times and is rejected by the lords shall become a law on royal assent, providing two years pass between its introduction and final passage in the commons. Revolutionary as was the adoption of this highly important act which changes the British constitution in respect to a time-honored, not to say moss-covered, institution, almost as highly respected by royalty as the constitution itself, even a more democratic change is proposed. There was approved, last week, a resolution by the house of commons, which proposes that hereafter the members of the commons shall be paid a salary of $2,000 annually. This unprecedented proposal is occasioned, doubtless, by the advance in election expenses, and by the fact that the number of labor representatives is increasing, members whose personal income will not permit parliamentary service without pay. What answer the lords will make to this socialistically-inclined measure remains to be seen. Another change in custom which must have caused Victoria Tower to shudder was noted last week: During the extreme heat, members of the commons, mirabile dictu, sat in their shirt-sleeves within their sacred chamber!

Legislative Uncertainty in Washington

If there was anxiety at the beginning of the special session as to what measures congress might not pass, there is now anxiety over what it may pass. President Taft is as determined that tarff reduction measures shall not become law as he was that Canadian reciprocity should receive confirmation. It looks as if he would be as successful in accomplishing his will here as in the former instance. Already the so-called "farmers' free list" bill has been passed by both houses. Shall further changes be made in the existing tariff? Is so, shall they include any other than the reduction in the wool schedule and cotton schedule? The session has now lasted much longer than had been hoped. Should the entire tariff question be opened up, adjournment would probably be lost sight of in the wrangle which would follow. Solution of the question really lies in the hands of the Democrats, and the problem for them is, can anything be accomplished by holding out for revision. There is little doubt they could push legislation through the lower house, but in the senate their prestige depends entirely upon the support of the "insurgents." A hard and fast coalition of these two could undoubtedly carry any measures they desired. But there is much between the two factions to prevent such union of forces. President Taft has done all he can with propriety to end this suspense by declaring his intention to veto not only the free list bill but the wool, cotton, and any other tariff bills which congress may pass. The Arizona and New Mexico statehood bill is another measure that is marked for veto by Mr. Taft. Special messages have been sent to congress, asking for legislation to abate the nuisance of mislabeling medicines and tonics so as to mislead the public as to curative values and properties, and to adopt the peace pacts with Great Britain and France. Delay of adjournment for the purpose of considering these two questions would be endorsed by him, but there is little likelihood that any action will be taken upon either during the special session. If a final decision is reached that it is useless to attempt further tariff revision, adjournment will probably be taken within a few days. With regard to tariff tinkering, Mr. Taft has stated that he would sign no bills until the tariff board has made its report and that will not be during the special session. In the statehood bill the president opposes the clause in the Arizona constitution, calling for the recall of judges. He said he would never give his support to so dangerous a policy. His chief anxiety is to have the arbitration treaties ratified. To force such ratification, an appeal is to be made to the country. He feels certain that the senate's treaty prerogative is not threatened and he will do everything in his power to have the treaties ratified without the change of a comma.

Heroes Whom We Should Honor.

It is often easier to discover heroes among the dead or in some distant land or among exceptional persons than it is to recognize the heroes whom we meet every day. The reason is that the superiority of the dead and of the distant has been reported to us while the insight that is needed for the discovery of exceptional goodness in the persons about us is a piece of mental furniture we do not possess. The man who cannot help others to respect the greatness of quiet service is not fit to be a minister of the gospel of God. On home heroism the Presbyterian Advance says:

This home heroism is not appreciated as it should be, because it is not accompanied by any blare of trumpets and is too commonplace to be mentioned in the newspapers. Indeed, even the reporters cannot find out about it, so quietly are the deeds of heroism performed. It is easy to be a hero in a crisis, to perform some rare service on occasion, but to keep on being heroic day after day when no one knows and no one seems to care is a much severer test of the stuff we are made of; yet all over the land not for moments or for days, but month after month, year in and year out, there are fathers and mothers who struggle on under great burdens and uncomplainingly make sacrifice after sacrifice in order that they may make the best possible provision for the children of the home. The readiness of parents to sacrifice for the sake of their children, especially that those children may have the best possible education, is one of the fine and encouraging traits of our American families, and there is abundant reason to believe that it is one of the outgrowths of the Christian religion. It takes something more than the instinctive love of a parent for its offspring to produce the patient, persevering effort here referred to; it requires a higher type of love than that which inspires men to risk their lives for their country; it needs the kind of love which characterized Him who came not to be ministered unto but to minister; and it will be found that this kind of heroism is especially common in Christian homes.

And there is no heroism which is more worth while. The hero who sacrifices his life is lauded as a great patriot, but his patriotism is not of so high a type as the patriotism of those who for years together deny themselves in order that their children may become good and useful citizens. The men and women who devote themselves to the task of sending forth other men and women, young, vigorous and well equipped to help the world forward, deserve far greater credit than they usually receive. Many in high and prominent positions are not accomplishing half so much for the world as are the weary and obscure mothers who toil and economize in order that they may prepare their children for large service to the world.

Congregational

Discussion, Practical Service, and Christian Union.

We have few friends with whom we discuss all the opinions we hold. We know that we cannot agree with one friend when it comes to certain matters of religion and politics and we refrain from the discussion that would be painful and might lead to estrangement. But we work with him for the welfare of our common country and for the increase of faith in God. We see the good in his life and are inspired by it. Had we not worked together but met for debate, there would probably have never been any friendship between us. On the subject of discussion, service, and Christian union a writer in The Advance thus delivers his mind:

In the first place, we differ immediately we begin to discuss the matter. I believe that the divisions of the church have come about vastly more through debating differences than anything else.

But it is most refreshing to see how blessedly Christians of various denominations unite in an effort for practical Christian service. I have recently attended some committee meetings in which plans for the "Men and Religion Movement" are being formed. The laymen predominated. They were in the majority. But in that group of 100 men of ten denominations there is but one heart and one soul. They are bent on bringing men into the fold of Jesus Christ. There is a recognition of the fact; first, that we are all one, and second, that what we believe in common is the essential element in bringing men into the light of righteousness and truth.

We argue and separate, hopelessly divided. We get together to work and the result is Christian union.

I knew two men who were hopelessly asunder doctrinally. One said to me "We differed at most vital points, but after we had talked for two hours then we got down to pray and it was wonderful how quickly our essential oneness as the servants of Christ was established."

Beyond controversy here is the secret of it all. A ten-days' prayer-meeting got the early disciples ready for Pentecost. "They were together with one accord."

Summer Commingling.

If you want to hate a man, do not become acquainted with him. If you give him a chance to show what he is, you will admire him for his ability, pity him for his weakness, or admit him to the intimacies of friendship. That is, this is what will happen if you are a normal human being. The only way for men to maintain sectarian feeling is to remain in ignorance of the religious experiences of all except persons of their own denomination. If they live in the open and let the facts determine their feelings, they will learn to rejoice in the faith of many whom their theory of religion would shut out from the fellowship of the saints. The advantages coming from the summer commingling are thus discussed by the Congregationalist and Christian World:

A man from another section of the country looked down from the pulpit which he was supplying the other Sunday morning, and in a frank, cordial fashion expressed his delight in the union character of the assembly. "For the life of me I can't tell which of you are Baptists and which Congregationalists, but I consider the arrangement a most gracious and profitable one. My own church in the West is pursuing the same course." It is not the fact that they can thereby speak to more persons that visiting ministers are glad to participate in union gatherings. That is an important phase of the matter, but the largest good from such combination lies in the fellowship which they express and engender. This becomes all the more apparent when the mid-week prayer-meeting is included in the merger. We believe the arrangement as a whole is preferable to the maintenance of separate and poorly-attended gatherings. It is certainly far better than to close an edifice without making any real and attractive provision for would-be worshipers who do not go away on vacations. Out of such fraternizing may grow common undertakings in the autumn and winter, that look toward the greater usefulness of the churches concerned and the welfare of the community. But whether or not anything immediate and tangible results, the more the Christians of any locality can be thrown together in natural ways, the more vigorous and discernible will the spirit of unity become. No more formidable barrier to unity exists today than the unbending parochialism to be found in many a community, large and small, as well as the slight acquaintance which members of one denomination have with one another, that in some cases amounts to absolute ignorance. Such stiffness and isolation ought to be melted away in the warm atmosphere of brotherly love.

Baptist

Just Plain Mr. Meyer.

The English Baptist leader, F. B. Meyer, differs from some American ministers in that he has no fondness for scholastic titles. He has been made a "D. D." twice, but he has never used the degree. He says: "It is a very great honor, but I very much dislike any title that would remove me from my ordinary fellows. Let me be a man among men. I do not pretend to be a great scholar, and I want to retain my simplicity."

Union on the Foreign Field.

It is becoming very evident that the way to Christian union is through common tasks. We have lost interest in debates of the old type. We started out a few years ago to evangelize the world and now we are discovering that we must get rid of our divisions if we are to convince the non-Christian people that we believe what we say. A new organization of Christian churches in Japan has been formed. Of this The Standard says:

It is a league of churches somewhat similar to the Federation of Churches in America, with this difference, that in Japan the league looks to eventual union of churches, while in the United States federation and the elimination of injurious competition only are contemplated. The missionary societies, sooner or later, and it now appears soon rather than late, must face and attempt to solve this whole problem of union and consolidation of churches on the foreign field. The societies must speedily form some policy or the native churches and missionaries may attempt hasty solutions that may jeopardize important interests. Our denomination is moving in the right direction when southern and northern Baptists are beginning to coöperate and consolidate their interests in the Occident. The next move ought to be the active coöperation of English and Canadian Baptists with the two former when all are cultivating the same general field. It is a waste of good missionary money to maintain two to four different Baptist missions in one mission station. We need more Baptist missionaries on the field but fewer organizations.

Self is the only prison that can ever bind the soul;
Love is the only angel that can bid the gates unroll;
And when he comes to call thee, arise and follow fast;
His way may lead through darkness, but it leads to light at last.

The Attitude of Jesus Toward Men as Men

"This multitude that knoweth not the law are accursed." In this manner speaks special privilege. The strivings of the people for better conditions, for intellectual and moral freedom, are ridiculed by men who use the ignorance and weakness of others for their own material advantage.

Jesus has taught us to find the essentially human in all sorts and conditions of men. From him Tolstoi learned that the source of political and social confusion "lies in the fact that men think there are circumstances when one may deal with human beings without love; and there are no such circumstances. One may deal with things without love; one may cut down trees, make bricks, hammer iron, without love; but you cannot deal with men without it, just as one cannot deal with bees without being careful. If you deal carelessly with bees, you will injure them, and will yourself be injured. And so with men."

The exploiter of men rejoices when he finds them in distress, for then he can compel them to pay him two prices for what he has to sell and he can buy from them at half price. The thieving hackman takes all the money of the bewildered and timid immigrant. The rascally real estate agent wins the confidence of the widow and robs her of the money she and her husband accumulated by hard work. The promoter of crooked business of every sort practices deceit at the expense of the inexperienced. When Jesus saw the multitude in distress and without guidance, he was moved with compassion for them. It was their need of help and not the opportunity of exploiting them that Jesus saw. For him every one of the multitude was a human being and as such had a claim upon the compassion of man and of God.

There are classes of men whom custom excludes from sympathy. Such, in the time of Jesus, were the tax-gatherers and the adulterous. It was not enough for the religious leaders to preach against the sins of these persons, they shut the door of hope for them. Man was made for the law, not the law for man. Jesus turned this saying around and made the law secondary. He taught that sin was awful because it ruined human life. And he gave to the sinner an opportunity to recover. Men were made to feel that their mistakes were not eternal barriers between them and God. The worst man was still a man and had a right to experience the quickening grace of God. The appeal of Jesus was made to the good that remained in the bad man. He denounced the self-righteous; the outcast he encouraged.

The attitude of Jesus toward men as men is illustrated beautifully by his welcome to the children. A commercialized nation sends its children to the coal mine and to the factory where they are stunted in body and mind. Its laws are designed to protect property but not the lives of its children. Jesus took the child in his arms and thus symbolized its right to know its privileges as a spiritual being living in the house of the heavenly Father. Everything that tends to keep from the child the knowledge that is the highest freedom is anti-Christian. A system of education that really educates is a most Christian thing.

There was room in the heart of Jesus for the man of wealth and influence. Wealth cannot purchase exemption from sickness, sorrow, and death. Power may still the voice of criticism but it cannot win the favor of God for an unrepentant sinner. Jesus therefore had compassion for the rich man. He showed his concern for the sinner of wealth by pointing out the littleness and meanness of the covetous and the extortioner. It is easier to feel kindly toward one whose sin has brought him into disgrace and has broken his strength than it is to be concerned for the regeneration of the successful scoundrel. And we may think the good man has no need of commendation if he has been successful. Jesus treated the rich and powerful as men having common human needs.

The saying of Jesus that he came not to be ministered unto but to minister will be misinterpreted unless we rid ourselves of the impression left by self-appointed reformers. These men are thinking of themselves. They wish to exalt themselves. Jesus thought of the other's need. He identified himself with humanity and took upon himself the burden of sin and suffering. The sorrow of men was his sorrow and the sin of the world hurt him, for it was destroying those whom he loved. It was the individual whom Jesus loved not man in the abstract. Encouraging Agreements

Dear Brother Morrison: I do not agree with much of The Century's policy, but I agree with you on some things:

1. Your position on silly music (revival), as you outlined it at Bethany Park, meets my approval. I have no special complaint to make of your criticisms on emotional evangelism. Much of our sensationalism is unscriptural and unreasonable. Our anxiety for members causes us to stretch truths and facts.

2. I do not agree with what I think your position is on the "pious unimmersed," but you are consistent. J. H. Garrison said in the April, 1910, issue [of the Christian Evangelist], that "The members of these other religious societies are Christians, and much more so than many who wear the name." Many great men hold the same position. When you told Brother Garrison that if they were Christians consistency must admit them to membership, you had him in a hole. I have never seen him explain since. May the good Master direct us.

Danville, Ind. J. V. COOMBS.

It is encouraging to find so representative an evangelist as Mr. Coombs in agreement with us in even two points. We are sure that a fair, open consideration of our respective views would disclose many more points of agreement and much more vital points than the two he has mentioned.

As to the first point mentioned, Mr. Coombs stands with that group of evangelists which might be called the "old guard." They believe in the truth of the gospel as the power unto salvation. They represent the evangelism for which our fathers stood, and they withstand the manipulative, hypnotic evangelism against which our fathers protested. It is a strange irony that has overtaken the Disciples in these latter days when the very type of revivalism from which our fathers shook themselves free is now holding our churches in its thrall.

But the Disciple conscience will not always tolerate this trampling upon its historic ideals. There is already a widespread recoil. One has only to talk with ministers and church leaders who gather at such conferences as that at Bethany Park, to which Mr. Coombs refers, to discover how wide-spread and how positive the critical sentiment has become.

An illuminative instance may be cited: We were seated on the hotel veranda at Bethany Park one morning, a group of perhaps thirty, mostly ministers, and the subject of evangelism was under discussion. The writer had not yet delivered his address on evangelism and he listened with much eagerness to know the temper of the group. One man, pastor of one of the largest and most substantial churches in Indiana—he calls himself a "conservative" in theology—was describing the methods used nowadays in "drawing the net." "When that evangelist goes to the telegraph office late Sunday night and sends a message to the papers saying fifty or seventy or one hundred and ten (as the case may be) conversions today, he makes himself a liar." At this extreme characterization, a layman, a lawyer, demurred. "You ought not say that last word," he declared. "Yes, I ought and I insist upon it," said the minister. After some argument the lawyer showed a willingness to compromise the issue if the preacher would say simply that the evangelist's report was not true to the facts! This was good-naturedly agreed to.

Criticism of hypnotic, mechanical revivalism is not a theological issue. So-called "conservatives" and "progressives" may stand together in opposing a method of propaganda which is lowering the tone of the personal, religious life and rendering the church incapable of grappling with its greater social responsibilities. The "silly music," of which Mr. Coombs speaks, was but a single item in the address to which he refers, and while that particular adjective was not used we are not altogether averse to it.

As to the second point in our correspondent's note, we are sure Mr. Coombs would find himself in even deeper agreement with The Christian Century if he would fling away that phrase, "pious unimmersed." Those words do not describe any class of persons with reference to whom this paper has defined a policy. With the policy which this paper has defined, we cannot doubt that Mr. Coombs is in complete accord. He believes with us that a church of Christ ought, in obedience to Christ, to receive into its complete fellowship any member of the church of Christ who applies to it for such fellowship. This is the position of The Christian Century, and it is unthinkable that any Disciple of Christ can take exception to it.

Causes of Trouble in Haiti

Religious and educational conditions in Haiti, where there is at present a revolution, are described as most unfavorable by the agent of the American Bible Society, stationed at San Juan, Porto Rico, but having San Domingo and Haiti in his field. The Rev. W. F. Jordan, a careful observer and experienced in religious work among West Indians, quotes natives as wondering why the United States, Christians send so much money to China, Japan and East India, and pass needy fields, where ignorance, sickness and poverty reign in the midst of tropical plenty.

The Society's agent describes children as neglected, sanitation almost unknown, the marriage relation loose, and whole sections of the island, even large communities, where the existence of the Bible is not dreamed of. Sales of Bibles and New Testaments reached large numbers last year, so eager are the people to be taught. The report expresses the conviction that for needy field, where conditions are ripe, hardly one in the whole world is greater, and because of its nearness has a stronger appeal to Americans.

Episcopalians do most of all Americans at present for the island, but limit their work wholly to Haiti, and give nothing to San Domingo. This church has for some years been sending $12,000 a year into Haiti, maintaining fifteen to twenty clergymen, and having churches in most principal settlements. Its work dates from 1861. Circuits of the country have been laid out, and clergy are supplemented by laymen in ministering to them. The entire membership is less than 1,000 hovever, and fewer than 500 are in the Sunday-schools. The Bible Society's agent concludes his report, sent just before the late political trouble broke out as follows:

"The beautiful landscapes, second to none in the whole world and much surpassing Cuba or Porto Rico, are the scenes of wretched filth and much physical suffering, dwarfed and deformed mentality, spiritual and moral degeneration. Why are not Christians of the United States doing more to help Haitians break the shackles of superstition and ignorance?"

Wasting the Inheritance

We have been trying to enact laws for the protection of the national resources. We have found out that our present prosperity and enjoyment may be at the expense of future generations. The church, too, needs to conserve its resources, thinks the Universalist Leader. We may be wasting our spiritual heritage and be in danger of coming to poverty. The Leader reasons in this fashion:

Rich men's sons are said to be "good spenders;" that is, they can get rid of their money a good deal faster than their fathers earned it. Only a few of them have the good sense to conserve the sources of their income; they do not see back of the immediate possession, they do not see beyond present enjoyment. This fact in every day experience illustrates a danger a good many sincere church workers are standing in today. They have come into the inheritance of a rich church, which has undoubtedly in the past lived too narrow a life, and its resources should be turned into new and nobler channels, but at the same time those resources should be conserved. We want our churches to be doing something, to be serving the communities in which they exist, but we want them to keep on growing in health and strength, so that they may better serve. We must do all we can to improve the conditions of life, but do not lose sight of the fact that we are dreaming dreams when we think these new conditions will of themselves solve the real vital problems of life. The Advance has this wise word which is worth considering: "Social service, so much emphasized at present, has its important claims. But social service must not displace spiritual service. It is no proper substance for it, for the simple reason that it does not reach the source of the evil. Men may have more wages and fewer hours and still be as bad as ever. The streets and alleys may be cleaned but that does not cleanse the heart. Families may be put in better tenements, but fashionable flats do not cure the social evil. A poor woman may be working too hard at the washtub, but she may not be in half as much danger as the woman who has nothing to do."

Universalists and Social Service

Universalist young people, responsible through their union for extension churches in St. Paul, Little Rock, Atlanta and Chattanooga, have outlined their new policy for the year to begin in September. It consists, in its first phase, in an effort to increase the numbers of unions, and in its second, held by them to be the most important of all the union's work, social service, with study classes in local unions. For three or four years unions have stood still in number, while other work, chiefly extension into the South, has been pushed.

There will be continued, according to the new program, the Post Office Mission, which is a novel but unlimited field for extending Universalist doctrines through literature in the mails. Letter writing forms no small part of it. Efforts are to be made to provide a Pacific Coast leader to help spread Universalism beyond the rockies, and a committee has been named to study the question of Universalist Church work among students at state universities. The new president of the Union for the year is Mr. A. Ingham Bicknell of Massachusetts, and the next annual meeting will be held in Chicago.

New Pacific Coast Cathedral

Work has started on divinity school and bishop's house, and very soon it will begin on the cathedral, the whole to be the Episcopal Church foundation for California. The location is Nob Hill, San Francisco, a commanding site hardly equalled by any in the world, overlooking the city and the bay for miles.

Following the earthquake and fire of a few years ago the Crockers gave a block bounded by California, Jones, Sacramento and Taylor streets, 412 feet in length with 275 feet depth. The cathedral will occupy the highest or western portion. The material will be Utah limestone on a granite base. The dimensions are 275 feet long and 180 feet across transepts, with two massive towers and seating capacity of 3,000.

Design and plan, while Gothic, will show, it is said, characteristics of the first great cathedral in the world to have modern steel construction, with flying buttresses and pinnacles stripped off. There was some hesitancy on the part of the original architect, the late Dr. George F. Bodley of London, but earthquakes dictated to art, and conditions are to be met. Grace Cathedral, San Francisco, is one of three great structures of the kind building by Episcopalians. One of the others guards the eastern port of New York as Nob Hill does the western, and the third is to rise over the National Capital, on Mount St. Alban, Washington. The corner stone of the San Francisco building has been laid.

Admiral Togo and International Peace

Every now and then some traveler fresh from the Orient gives forth an interview which is published broadcast through the press purporting to be inside information as to the imminent danger of the Japanese war cloud bursting upon our unprotected shores. What was practically the first public utterance of the silent Togo at the luncheon given him jointly by the New York Peace Society and the Japan Society of New York, should serve in a large degree to dissipate such rumors. Admiral Togo's brief speech was a hearty expression of the good will of the Japanese empire toward our country. In speaking of the association of the two societies participating in the function, he said, "I cannot conceive of a happier combination, since the relationship between Japan and the United States must be ever one of peace and neighborly good will. In this belief I take advantage of the occasion to declare myself among the foremost advocates in favor of maintenance of that relationship in order that our two countries, which have so long lived in harmony and cordial friendship, may continue to do so forever." While after-dinner speeches are not always wholly to be depended upon as expressing the real sentiments of the speakers, yet here is a case in which common sense as well as politeness would counsel us to full acceptance of the assurances offered. Aside from the considerations involved in international peace in which the United States is leading, there is nothing to be gained while there is everything to be lost through the estrangement of China and Japan. If there were no other motive than self-interest, that of itself would be sufficient to preserve peace. But added to this are sentimental and moral reasons, and these could not be put aside except under circumstances so remote as not to need present consideration.

Our Readers' Opinions

The Sweeney-Century Discussion

Editors Christian Century: I trust it will not be an impertinence for a lawyer to offer a criticism on statements made in a discussion between a Christian lecturer-evangelist on one side and a Christian editor-preacher on the other. But as lawyers are in the habit of running hazardous risks, I shall take my chances on receiving the forgiveness of both parties to the controversy.

Dr. Sweeney says, "A man may defy or override the statutory law of the government and be guilty of only a crime or misdemeanor, the punishment for which may be slight; but when a man defies or overrides the organic or constitutional law of the government, he is guilty of high treason, the punishment for which is death. Baptism is a part of the organic or constitutional law of the Kingdom of Heaven. * * * A man who overrides that commission (the great commission) or changes it, or substitutes anything else for it, is guilty of high treason against the Kingdom of God."

Now, I wonder whether Dr. Sweeney really intends to convey the ideas which this statement literally means. He draws a direct parallel between treason to his country and treason to the Kingdom of God, and with the penalty of the one, he illustrates the nature of the other. Our Constitution says that, "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court" (Art. 3 Con., Sec. 17). Treason is a crime, and it is necessary to prove criminal intent, as well as the accompanying act, in order to establish the guilt of the accused.

The constitution of the United States is often violated or transgressed without any criminal intent on the part of the offender. Congress often passes laws which the Supreme Court sets aside solely on the ground that they are opposed to the constitution and are thus unconstitutional. The members of congress are not traitors and punishable with death penalties merely because they may happen at times to entertain erroneous ideas as to which proposed laws are constitutional. They are not all lawyers, and even lawyers might disagree about such matters. Sometimes the Executive of the nation will have a mistaken idea of what the constitution authorizes him to do, or forbids his doing, and on that ground his acts have been corrected by the Supreme Court. But that does not argue that the President of the United States is, or ever has been, a traitor.

The penalty for treason to our government is not prescribed by the constitution. It is a statutory provision and may at any time be made more mild at the will of Congress. And this leads to the belief that the differences between the constitution and the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof, is not so important as Dr. Sweeney assumes in illustrating the nature of the constitution of the Kingdom, as distinguished from the human policies of the local church. Article 4 of the constitution says, "This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges, in every state, shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution and laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

But if Dr. Sweeney insists upon discriminating between the importance of the constitution and the statutory law, as applied to the government of the church, then he should observe some authoritative rule by which to distinguish the organic and constitutional from the invalid statutory laws or ordinances. Chief Justice Marshall, of the U. S. Supreme Court, gave us a rule which is universally followed by all the courts of the country, both national and state, in determining what statutory laws or ordinances are valid and constitutional, namely: "Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the constitution, are constitutional."

I am in accord, generally, with the position taken by Dr. Sweeney, but I dissent from the use of these terms. His language is too harsh and necessarily weakens the force of his argument. This is shown in Brother Morrison's reply: "To say that the man who is baptized by affusion is guilty of treason against the Kingdom of Heaven makes many of the foremost citizens of the Kingdom guilty of treason. Are Robert E. Speer and Washington Gladden and Jane Addams and W. J. Bryan guilty of treason against the Kingdom of Heaven?"

Were it not for Brother Sweeney's ill chosen language, there would have been no setting from which to make a display of these illustrious names to sustain an untenable position.

I think it impracticable in any argument of this kind to draw comparisons between the constitution and laws of our country and those of the kingdom of heaven. The constitution of the United States springs from the people. "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice . . . do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America." (The Preamble.) The people are the sovereigns and have not only made, but may also change, their organic law. But the constitution and laws of the kingdom come from above. "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye, therefore," etc. (Matt. 28:19). The kingdom of heaven is an absolute monarchy, and Christ, the king, is an autocrat. The people in the church, those governed, have nothing whatever to do with the making of the organic or constitutional law. And this explains the fatal weakness of Brother Morrison's statement, that baptism, a command given from Heaven, is "a joint act of the personal will of the candidate and the corporate will of the church."

It would be well to determine what laws or ordinances are embraced in the constitution of the Kingdom of God. Let us take the New Testament names; then the rules of church government as laid down by the inspired writers; then take faith, repentance, confession, baptism, the communion service, obedience, love, benevolence, etc. Can we not agree upon what laws or ordinances are in the constitution of the Kingdom? If so, let these be accepted as the great governmental charter—the constitution—of the Kingdom of God. Then let Chief Justice Marshall's rule be applied to determine what works of man or what policies of any local church are constitutional; let us avoid all forms of baptism and other expedients which fail to stand this constitutional test, and we will be saved much worry, and our religious papers will be spared much valuable space to be used more profitably in promoting harmony among the brethren while we are engaged in carrying out the great commission of our Lord.

Muncie, Ind. H. G. MURPHY.

[We can never get at the truth of the Christian religion by the use of legal categories. Mr. Murphy's stricture on Dr. Sweeney's position is, of course, well taken. But his own statement that the Kingdom of Heaven is an absolute monarchy and Christ an autocrat is far from an adequate expression of the relation of our Lord to his disciples. The Master himself said that he wished his disciples to be not servants but friends, not blindly doing the will of an autocrat but appreciatively entering into the counsels of the Master. "The servant knoweth not what his lord doeth." The family was Jesus' model for his disciples, not the state. Even the idea of the Kingdom of God which Jesus found in the people's minds was reconstructed by his ideal of human brotherhood and divine fatherhood. The richer possibilities of Christian experience and Christian truth will not be open to us until we claim the liberty from legalism which was one of Christ's most fundamental and most precious gifts to us. To take this point of view is not to rule out the authority of Christ: it is to establish and justify that authority. To say that baptism is a joint act of the church and the candidate does not separate it from the will of Christ. On the contrary, it reinforces whatever textual warrant there may be for regarding baptism as a "command" of our Lord. Certainly any such "command" is ineffective unless the corporate will of the church and the personal will of the believing convert unite to carry it out.—THE EDITORS.]

A Congregational Opinion

Under the heading "Baptism Not a Barrier," The Advance (Congregational, Chicago), prints the following editorial:

The Christian Century, the Chicago organ of Disciples, takes an advanced position regarding baptism. The Century holds that the form should no longer be made a barrier between Christians especially on foreign fields. "There is a deep-rooted and rapidly spreading conviction among the Disciples of Christ," says The Century, "that both our historic plea and the demands of the age into which we have come call for the casting away of this one last survival of sectarianism in our practice— the practice of selecting from among Christ's followers only the immersed and rejecting all others from our fellowship." "There is a considerable body of sentiment," The Century adds, "among our missionaries favorable to the practice of Christian union by accepting letters from churches practicing affusion-baptism without raising the question of the applicant's form of baptism."

These statements are followed by some cautious expressions which show that The Century fully realizes the strength and length and breadth of the sentiment in favor of the old aloofness. But the editor has his convictions and he urges them in a manner which is at once manly and reasonable. Certainly the reasonableness of the following plea ought to appeal to all Disciples: "On the mission field," says The Century, "the pivot on which unity turns is the

Agnosticism: The Way Out

BY J. A. C. HILDNER.

EDITORS' NOTE:—The following testimony of faith, given by a University professor, is a synopsis of one of a series of addresses on religion provided by the University of Michigan. An address by Professor Karl Guthe on "Materialism: the Way Out" was printed in our last week's issue. Yet another article, in the same series, by Professor R. M. Wenley, will appear next week.

Agnosticism is a hard word to define. In this respect, it is like the much used and much abused word "Pragmatism." In general, however, an agnostic is a man who is dumb upon the question of the ultimate meaning of the universe. Like a student in the class room, he says, "I am not prepared; I do not know." In other words, he pledges himself to silence.

Huxley was the originator of the term, and coined it, possibly having in mind the inscription "To An Unknown God." Huxley used it in the following sense: Man, from his very nature, cannot form trustworthy conclusions concerning ultimate reality. Man must assume an attitude of reasoned ignorance and incapacity toward everything that lies beyond the sphere of sense perception.

Herbert Spencer's Teaching.

Spencer, supposed to be the arch-agnostic, invented the so-called "Doctrine of the Unknowable." He said all knowledge is relative, conditioned by the nature of the subject—that is, the one knowing. We know nothing just as it really is. All things and forces are symbols or signs of something which is unknowable. But just because all our knowledge is relative, we must assume an absolute. The relative presupposes an absolute, or else it would be absolute itself. That, in very few words, is the doctrine of the unknowable, all of which assumes that reality is different from things as they appear to be; that there may be an intrinsic reality back of appearance.

Of course, under these conditions, the knowledge of reality is an undemonstrable assumption. If by Reality, Absolute, or God,—we can call an unknown quantity x, y or z—we mean something which exists outside of knowledge, then it is clear that knowledge of Reality, of the Absolute, or of God, is impossible. We see from Spencer's statement also, that he believes that behind appearance there may be a reality, that behind knowledge, feeling and will there may be some permanent entity. But the "may be" does not do us any good.

Advantage and Danger in This Position.

There is an advantage in assuming this position. In taking it I do not have to believe in certain propositions without satisfactory evidence. I have a right to suspend judgment. I thereby combat enslavement and stultification of my intellect. A man who can say, "I must respectfully refuse to believe what I have no good grounds for believing, even if it should wreck morality and insure my own damnation," is a man to respect and to admire. We are ready to say to him, "Thou are not far from the kingdom of God."

Pseudo-agnostics sometimes use it as a mask for a positive belief, but a masked man who is easily recognized, does not get much benefit from his mask. We know him; we can spot him. There is morality in the position of the genuine agnostic; there is immorality in the position of the pseudo-agnostic. There honestly; here dishonestly. If there is any choice to be made, we will choose the man who can say: "I was dumb; I opened not my mouth." Agnosticism is not a creed, nor a substitute for a creed.

There is danger, also, of believing that faith is the opposite of truth, whereas faith is simply one means—and a very important means—of ascertaining truth. Faith is not the power of saying you believe things which are incredible—that has never been, and never will be, the right conception of faith.

The Way Out.

In playing a game, it often becomes necessary to use the tactics of your opponent to win the game. This is the method which we shall pursue with agnosticism. We shall begin with the statement of Pythagoras that man is the measure of the universe, a position which is supposed to be identical with that of agnosticism. We assume that personality is the supreme fact—that the individual man, with his consciousness, is the measure of the universe. In other words, everything a man does, and feels and wills, has connection with his consciousness.

Every creature thinks of the infinite according to its own nature. If a lion were able to conceive of God, his god would be a lion-god. If a horse were able to conceive of God, his god would be a horse-god. If an ox were able to conceive of God, his god would be an ox-god. Touching man, we will grant the same thing. When a man thinks God, he thinks a human God. In granting this, however, we refer not to a scientific man, nor a philosopher man, nor any other lop-sided man. We refer to a man in his totality, in his integrity.

Man is the starting point of all "isms." He is the starting point of science itself. Supposing we assume that God or the Universe is matter, motion, energy, force. Are these ideas of matter, motion, energy and force, not man's ideas, and attributive to man's consciousness? It would be nonsensical to try to abstract "force" from all connection with human consciousness.

"Anthropomorphism."

This process of starting with man is what is called, in the vocabulary of philosophy, "anthropomorphism." Now, if we are to have anthropomorphism, why not have the best grade of it? Who wants a God or a Universe that is blind, heartless, irresponsible? Man can never be a match for a brute god, or a wholly inhuman universe. I would sooner have the God of the philosopher: his God has intelligence, moral feeling, and will anyhow. But there is something the matter also with this God, because the man you start with in this case is like the man of Rousseau—an impossible man,—as some one called the mediæval man "fensterlos"—a man without any outlook, a man out of relation with other men, a man without ancestry, and without posterity, a Punch and Judy man. That is the philosopher's God.

But man is not "fensterlos." He is not out of all relation to other men; he is not without ancestry or without posterity; he is not bounded by himself alone. "Deep calls unto deep." A man who stands only in relation to himself is an egoist, but humanity is altruistic, the opposite of egoistic;—it is social. So we find a hopeless contradiction between this miserable God, shut up in the cell of eternity, and unknowability, and an altruistic humanity.

A New God and a New Man.

I say that the way out is a new man and a new God, or (the order does not matter) a new God and a new man. I care not for your God of science; I care not for your God of philosophy; I claim the right to reverence and adore a God of humanity—God, the ideal of humanity.

When you finally get out of the wilderness of idle speculation, you will come upon a post, labeled "I am the Way," pointing to Jesus whose conception of God as the father of men and the lover of men's souls is still the conception of many ordinary but, I think, sane men.

Neither life nor hell nor the doctrine of the unknowable, shall separate me from the conviction that I walk through this life under the protection of a Father's eternal care. I know too that I shall have to seek far and wide for a social program parallel to the one implied in the Fatherhood of God, and the family-hood of man.

principle of inter-communion, which includes not only the open celebration of the Lord's Supper, but a free interchange of members between church and church, by letter, on the basis of the recognized validity of the ordinances, ministry, membership and discipline of all participating churches. This, of course, is the pivot on which unity turns in the home field, too, only it is not so easy to see it here as there. There can be no unity without this free intercommunion."

This is well stated. There can be no unity on a basis of barriers, whether of water, wood, hay or stubble.

A Sad Contrast

Recently a great ball player of Cleveland, Ohio, died leaving his widow with limited financial means. The ball team, of which he had been a member, and a team made up from various other cities, played a game for the benefit of his widow. The proceeds of the game, $12,000, were turned over to her.

The husband had played big ball at big salaries, but he had not saved his earnings. The people forgot his follies, remembered his good playing, and generously endowed his widow with $12,000. Hurrah, for the ball players!

This incident in the baseball world has certain lessons for the church world. It is still true that "The children of this world are wiser in their own day and generation than are the children of light."

A minister of Christ fought a valiant fight for many years in a great city and a great state. He served in the vanguard of the army of righteousness and braved many perils. At length he fell in the conflict, leaving his widow with insufficient support for her declining days. Today she can hardly escape the meditation; "Had my husband been a first class ball player, instead of a first class minister, this pinching poverty would not be mine."

Another brave minister led the skirmish line out among the hills. The cities knew him not, but he rendered a most heroic service. After many victories he died in triumph, but left his widow with scant support. The days of life's descending sun, in her case, have been filled with a fierce struggle for existence. Her husband was no ball player; he was only a minister of Christ.

Were the church poor, the above contrast might be expected. But the church is rich and the contrast is shameful. * * *

The Moral Leaders of Israel

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XXV. The Servants of Jehovah

Sept. 3. Text for Special Study. Isa. 52:13—53:12.

1. THE SERVANT'S MISSION.

The second section of the Book of Isaiah, chapters 40-55, has for its great theme the character and ministry of the Servant of the Lord. This is the last and greatest of the four subjects which interweave themselves like the themes of an oratorio. These four, as already pointed out, are, the pardoning and restoring favor of Jehovah, the greatness of Jehovah as contrasted with the gods of Babylon; the triumphant career of Cyrus, whose successes are to bring deliverance to Israel; and the mission of Jehovah's servant, who is to be the instrument in the divine hand for the accomplishment of the eternal purpose in the saving of Israel and the enlightenment of the world.

There are many references to the servant of Jehovah in these chapters. But four have a distinct interest, and have usually borne the name of "the Servant passages" par excellence. They are 42:1-9; 49:1-13; 50:4-9, and 52:13—53:12. So significant are they that some biblical scholars have felt that they have a character and value separate from the remainder of the prophecy, and were either parts of an earlier work, which became the basis of this group of chapters, or were added later to complete the message. Neither of these views is necessary. It is quite possible to view them as the work of the author, though it is evident that in these great oracles he rises to his highest levels.

Throughout these and the other references to the work of the Servant the nation, Israel, is unmistakably in the mind of the prophet. Such words as, "Thou, Israel my servant, Jacob, whom I have chosen, the seed of Abraham, my friend" (41:8), "yet now hear, O Jacob my servant, and Israel whom I have chosen" (44:1), "Fear not, O Jacob my servant" (44:2), "Remember these things, O Jacob; and Israel, for thou art my servant" (44:21), "For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel my chosen (45:4), etc., make clear the application of this title of Servant of Jehovah to the people who are now in exile, the survivors of the nation over which the dynasty of David had reigned. No other meaning can be drawn from the terms. Israel, the nation whose life was all but destroyed by the conquering hand of Babylon, is the Servant of God, essential to his redemptive work in the world, and destined to bring it to a successful conclusion.

Sometimes, it is true, the thought of the prophet contemplates rather the inner groups of consecrated Israelites than the entire nation as the true Servant. But it is still Israel, either in the actual or the ideal sense that is designated by the word. And what a work the Servant has to perform! It might be deemed sufficient that it should labor successfully for the restoration of its own national life That seemed far enough from the possibility of realization. Yet it was not enough. "It is too light a thing," cries the prophet, speaking for Jehovah, "that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the nations, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the ends of the earth" (49:6).

This, then, was the real mission of the Servant, to mediate to all men a knowledge of the true God, and the secret of holy living before him. It was a task to tax the power of even the most resourceful of nations. How was Israel, defeated, trampled, exiled and all but destroyed, to rise to this high vocation?

2. THE SERVANT'S WEAKNESS.

But the work to which the Servant was called did not involve military or political strength. In the very first of these great oracles the prophet is at pains to point out the quiet and peaceful nature of the Servant's methods. Speaking for God, he says of the Servant, "He shall not cry nor lift up, nor cause his voice to be heard in the streets. A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench. Yet he shall bring forth justice in truth" (42:2, 3). His were not to be the methods of violence and force. Even the weakest things would not suffer under his touch. It was a significant suggestion that the old days of force were gone, and that the work of God in the world was to proceed in terms of education rather than of might. For the former Israel had no fitness. In the struggle of worldly powers it had gone down. Might it not hope, however, through this very disciplining of soul, to become qualified to bring a message of light and help to the world?

But there were moments when the prophet despaired of the accomplishment of even this quieter task by Israel. It was a people blind and deaf, unobservant and unheeding. Robbed and spoiled, it seemed no longer capable of exerting the least power (42:18-20). Was it not too much to hope that any effective effort could be put forth by this people even in its own behalf, much less in the interest of the great world? It is this consideration which drives the prophet back from the outer frontiers of Israel's life where at times he hoped to find the tokens of efficiency and fidelity, to the circle within the nation, the nucleus, the remnant who remained faithful when the rest turned apostate. The further he goes in the disclosure of his great theme, the more is this messenger of God forced to retire to the inner and better circle of constant and devout Jews, who kept alive their faith in God in the dark days of exile. By the time chapter 49 is reached, this seems to be the prevailing thought. If Israel as a whole is to be saved, it must be by the efforts of the faithful at the heart of the nation, for the majority has lapsed into indifference. Can this remnant succeed?

3. THE SERVANT'S RESOURCES.

If it were a question of human strength or subtility, there could be no hope in the future. But the prophet marshalls the encouragements with which he is endeavoring to arouse the disheartened people to their holy task. First, there is the divine purpose. The national ideals of Israel must not fail of realization. Throughout the career of the nation the unceasing purpose of God had been unfolded. It was impossible, unthinkable, that this should at last miscarry and fail. And only the faithful Israel could bring it to completion.

Then there was the divine assistance. This was now to be offered as never before. It was as if Jehovah had been forgetful of his people, and had allowed them to suffer more than their sins deserved. He would now arouse himself with the terrible energy of a woman in the pangs of child birth, or a hero maddened into the fierce fury of supreme effort. No words could be stronger than those of 42:13-17 in their picture of the prodigious activities of God now promised in behalf of his people.

But a third encouragement even more heartening was the instruction given the Servant, in preparation for his work. The whole experience of his exile estate is now conceived as an actual education to make him competent to carry out his great adventure as the messenger of God. Day by day his tongue is taught the words of comfort and life. His ear has been opened to the secret of the divine will. Without protest he has suffered the reproach and ill-will of men. Had there been no assurance that the divine purpose was being accomplished, he could not have endured the hardship of his lot. But now all is clear, and the end is in sight (50:4-9). Such are the resources of the Servant.

4. THE SERVANT'S SUCCESS. (Isa. 52:13—53:12.)

It has been acknowledged by all the students of prophecy that the theme reaches its climax in this sublime poem. It consists of five stanzas, growing gradually longer as the song increases in intensity. The first stanza (52:13-15) predicts the Servant's success; the second (5..3:1-3) expresses the astonishment of one who looked on, and supposed that the Servant was a worthless and hopeless victim of his own mistakes; the third (52:4-6) records the bystander's confession that now he perceives that it was for his sake the Servant suffered, rather than as the punishment for his own sins; the fourth stanza tells of the humility and submission with which the Servant met his cruel and unjust fate; and the final stanza makes clear the complete triumph of the Servant's work, and the rewards which he achieved.

These great words, which have grown familiar to the church as the greatest of Messianic prophecies, are only to be understood as they were uttered by the prophet and received by the people to whom they were first addressed, when it is kept in mind that it was Israel the nation that was first meant by the terms here used. From that point the reference to Jesus becomes clear when he is conceived as the Servant of Jehovah, coming to undertake that which neither the nation as a whole nor the remnant could accomplish.

The prophet, looking forward to Israel's return from exile and the revival of its material and spiritual hopes, did not, of course, think of a person as the successful Servant, nor was he describing a personal experience in the poem. At first glance the words seem to suggest the actual physical experiences of Jesus. But more careful consideration of their meaning forbids this reference. It was of the personified and individualized Israel that the message was written. And it was the urgent claim of Jesus and his disciples that he realized the national mission, otherwise unfulfilled, in a manner which brought the hymn of consolation to its complete fulfillment. It was the task of the Old Testament prophets to announce the coming of the Messiah, a deliverer and leader of the nation. It was the burden of the New Testament to proclaim that Jesus was the Messiah. And thus the preachers of the new faith did not hesitate to claim all references of Old Testament to prophets to the Messiah as coming to maturity in Jesus, even though it was of the official Messiah rather than the persn Jesus of Nazareth, that the prophets wrote. In this manner are explained such use of this great song as that made by Philip in his conversation with the Ethiopian, and other like applications of the words.

But thus conceived as the Hymn of Promise regarding the successful work of Jehovah's Servant, the representative of the nation and the Redeemer of the world, the complete fulfillment of the message in the Messianic work of Jesus becomes at once the logical consummation of Israel's hopes, and the assurance of divine friendship and aid for all the world.

Notes From the Foreign Society

M. J. Shah of Harda, has been in Bilaspur, conducting a series of meetings that proved very helpful. He delivered a series of lectures on Sunday-school work. At the close he conducted a series of evangelistic meetings for about a week. From Bilaspur he goes to Mungeli for the same work.

H. A. Eicher writes that a wealthy village owner, who has been won through medical services, is now offering both land and financial help to open either a dispensary or school in his village. Such opportunities are multiplying. How long must we wait to answer these calls? If we wait too long the opportunity passes, to say nothing of the loss of the passing time in work and in influence.

The missionaries in the Philippine Islands are asking for new missionaries as follows: one for Laoag; one missionary and a doctor for the Cagayan Valley; one man for Vigan and one for Manila.

Bruce L. Kershner writes that the most important thing of our present need is the need of evangelists. The work is now suffering for lack of them. In the Tagalog field there are only one or two well qualified men available, and I hope that we may get funds to employ them, before they may be otherwise engaged. Our school in Manila is essential to the training of men. Many of our difficulties are due to the presence of unqualified men on our evangelistic force.

The friends of the work should remember that the year closes the last day of September. This time is not now far off. All offerings intended to be included in the receipts for the current year should be in the treasury in Cincinnati at as early a day as possible. The treasurers of the churches and Sunday-school and Endeavor societies should see to it that remittances are not unnecessarily delayed. Individuals who propose to give this year will oblige the managers if they will forward their contributions promptly. F. M. RAINS, Secretary.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

—The State Convention Sept. 4-7.

—Will be at Danville.

—Every Illinois church should be represented by one or more delegates.

—Some churches are planning to be represented by a good sized company.

—Delegates will be entertained at private residences with lodging and breakfast for seventy-five cents.

—Danville First Church is making extensive preparation for our entertainment. Improvements on the building are being made and faithful workers are providing a cordial reception.

—The program is inviting. None in recent years has promised better than this one. It was published August 10 in The Christian Century. Reread that issue and be convinced of the merit of every day's sessions.

—Then write W. E. Adams, pastor of First Church to make reservation for you either at a hotel or private residence. e

Charles W. Ross, pastor at Litchfiel., spoke at the Litchfield-Hillsboro Chautauqua Sunday, August 13.

Christopher church has secured W. O. S. Cliffe of Akron, Ohio, for the pastorate. His work with this church has already begun with an auspicious opening.

Macedonia church in Fayette county is taking advantage of C. M. Smithson's vacation period to hold a short revival. Wright Spurlin is coöperating in the meeting.

Lewistown church heard C. Lee Stauffer of Dallas City on a recent Sunday in August with a view to his acceptance of the pastorate to succeed B. H. Cleaver.

The annual report of J. W. Parson shows forty additions to the church at New Hartford where he has been laboring two Sundays a month.

Lew D. Hill of Decatur is in a promising union meeting at Dalton City in which the Presbyterian, United Brethren and Christian churches are coöperating.

The revival meeting being held in a school house near West Salem by P. M. Eaton is deepening in interest, with fifteen conversions at last report.

The pastorate of H. F. Kern closed at El Dara August 1. During the year there were twenty-seven additions. After a short vacation Mr. Kern will enter Eureka College and become pastor of Belle Plain Church.

The twelfth successive season of A. P. Cobb's platform directorship of the Pontiac Chautauqua closed what is reported one of the most successful years in the Chautauqua's history.

W. B. Clemmer has been preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on "Wonder Stories of the Old Testament" in his church at Rockford. The sermons were illustrated with Tissot's pictures thrown on a screen.

J. E. Moyer has concluded a five-year pastorate at Keensburg during which time a new building was erected at a cost of $6,000 and more than 100 were received into the membership of the congregation. Mr. Moyer is secretary of the district.

Beardstown church, one of the newer organizations of the state, makes an annual report showing missionary offerings totaling about $70, additions through the year numbering thirty-six and the purchase of a building for purposes of worship. G. W. Morton is the minister.

Johnson City church will be pastorless after September 1, on account of the resignation of R. A. Honn who relinquishes the pastorate to continue his education at Kimberly Heights, Tennessee. The work accomplished for this church by Mr. Honn is estimated favorably in reports.

The pastor at Lewistown, B. H. Cleaver, was prostrated in the pulpit during the delivery of his sermon the first Sunday in August. Strenuous pastoral duties and excessive heat combined to exhaust his power of endurance. It is reported the illness was of short duration. As stated in a recent Christian Century Mr. Cleaver's pastorate will be terminated in a few weeks.

G. W. Morton of Beardstown church endured gracefully the uninvited appearance of a large number of his congregation at his residence on the occasion of his birthday. Any embarrassment suffered upon the surprise was much more than counterbalanced by the gracious spirit prompting the affair and the abundance of table supplies and other gifts left for the minister and family as evidence of sincere appreciation.

Dr. Royal J. Dye is at his home in Eureka since returning from Africa. Quite soon after his arrival he met with a serious accident. While unpacking his goods a piece of steel struck his eye and necessitated a trip to Chicago for its removal. A favorable prognosis is given by the physician relative to saving sight in the eye, though grave apprehension was at first entertained lest it might be entirely lost.

After a pastorate extending through seven years at La Harpe, L. G. Huff has resigned to assume the pastorate at Mt. Sterling recently relinquished by A. L. Cole. Mr. Huff has been signally successful in his ministry of unusual length and is leaving La Harpe much to the regret of his parishioners who have several times shown their appreciation of his good services by increased salary and otherwise. He goes to an excellent congregation at Mt. Sterling. During the seven years at La Harpe 318 were received into the church's membership and the members encouraged to activity and faithfulness.

Attention, Illinois Brotherhood Men!

Every loyal brotherhood man should plan to be present at the brotherhood session at our state convention at Danville, Ill., Wednesday evening, Sept. 6. Peter Ainslie will speak. H. T. Swift, Springfield, our state president, is working for special interurban rates.

Bethany Graded Lessons are

Absolutely the Greatest Achievement in the History of Sunday-school Literature.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.

2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.

3. They are free from the sectarian spirit

4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.

5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.

6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.

7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.

8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have coöperated to produce them and are now using them.

9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.

10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

Secretary's Letter

N. S. Haynes, on Sunday, July 30, preached twice for the Englewood church, this being his thirteenth consecutive visit over a Lords-day, his subjects: "Our Faith and Our Lives," and "The Enlargement of Our Lives." Brother Haynes is still in his "sixties," and there is in his sermons vim, vigor and virility. Regularly ministering half time to the Antioch church in Macon county he is available for regular half-time work or supply for any of our churches. Address him at 828 N. Edwards St., Decatur. Our churches will do well to make a note of this.

L. G. Huff has accepted a call to take the work at Mt. Sterling and will begin Sept. 1. La Harpe will want a good man.

There is good prospect for placing a good man in the Freeport mission in the near future. It is a great field.

The office man says: "My kingdom for an adding machine." He is tabulating the statistics of the churches for the Year Book and it is an immense task. Such a machine would be a very great help in his work. Some day we hope our office will be equipped with such helpful things. Possibly some kind hearted brother or sister would like to make such a gift. It would be most welcome.

A. M. Hale of Macomb, one of our best men, is ready for a new field. Illinois should not let him seek a field in another state. Call him.

Advertise and work up an interest in our state convention in your congregation. It will mean much to your work if you can induce your officers and active workers to attend. Get the convention habit. Those who go to many conventions are usually enthusiastic church workers. Remember—Danville, Sept. 4-7.

Dr. Royal Dye addressed the Christian Business Men's Association at a called meeting at that organization Monday evening, Aug. 14. Dr. Dye is in the city for treatment to save his eye which was injured while he was unpacking his goods. After a painful operation of two hours—no anesthetic being used—some hope is held out for the recovery of his sight in the injured eye. In his inimitable way Dr. Dye spoke of the manners, customs, arts and crafts of the Bolengi natives, and cheered our hearts with his story of the growing church there. Dr. Dye also told of the great work accomplished at the Lotumbi station, which was made possible by the interest and financial support of the Chicago disciples.

Mr. and Mrs. O. J. Grainger sail for India next month. During their furlough they have made their church home at Hyde Park. A farewell reception was accorded them recently by the members and friends of the church. Mr. Grainger preached for the Hyde Park people, Aug. 20

Our Annual Church Extension Offering

The September offering for Church Extension begins Sunday, Sept. 3. Several hundred churches are already making the necessary preparation for a large offering. Great interest has been shown this year because of many more opportunities to build. From Oct. 1, 1910 to May 1, 1911, 158 homeless churches had appealed for help to erect their buildings. These could borrow no place else and looked to Church Extension for the necessary help. Since May 1, forty-five other churches have asked for help making 206 appeals from Oct. 1, 1910, to Aug. 1, 1911. Of this number fifty-nine have received help aggregating over $130,000.

The demand for a large offering and for a large number of contributing churches is found in the fact that our board is the one agent to whom all these homeless churches look for help. There are 127 evangelizing boards among us, including district, state and national. Then we have city evangelization societies and these societies today look to the Board of Church Extension to settle the property problem for them.

Another heavy demand made upon the Church Extension Board is found in the fact that we must have larger and better churches than in former years. The plain church with an auditorium is not sufficient: The church that builds must furnish up-to-date Sunday-school equipment or they will be discredited in the community where they are located. Our people have led in the Sunday-school work of America and we must now lead in getting up-to-date equipment. The experience of the Board of Church Extension is that this requires a large outlay of money.

Eighty-six promised loans aggregate $192,000 is another reason why the churches should rally to the Church Extension offering. We can count on $90,000 of returns on loans to answer the above appeals when they call for their money which we have promised, but it will require an annual offering of $100,000 from churches and individuals—that is, $100,000 of new money will be required to answer the above appeals.

All the other societies have had their annual offerings and the Church Extension offering should have the right of way through August, September and October. Churches should promptly write for their supplies of literature and collection envelopes.

It is the shame of our churches that 1,318 is the largest number of churches that have contributed in a single year to Church Extension. Is this all the churches that have an interest in so great a work that was brought into existence for an absolutely necessary purpose by the National Convention? Shame upon us that this is true! "Tell it not in Gath; publish it not in the streets of Askelon." The smallness of the number of contributing churches is appalling when we think of the tremendous work to be done.

The corresponding secretary visited during June and July about forty-five churches in the West and attended twelve conventions, state and national. A name loan fund of $5,000 was given by C. C. Chapman of Fullerton, Calif., in memory of his father, S. S. Chapman. William A. Wilson, Houston, Texas, gave a $5,000 name fund, to be known as "The J. C. Mason fund." This was given by Brother Wilson in honor of his old pastor, Brother Mason, who baptized him and who is now the corresponding secretary of the state work.

In July, John H. Booth, associate secretary, visited twenty-four churches in the interest of Church Extension. He is spending the month of August and half of September in the Iowa field and attending the Nebraska Convention. G. W. MUCKLEY.

Church Life

W. H. Nation, pastor at White City, Kan., is in a meeting at Dwight, Kan.

F. W. Emerson has accepted a call to the pastorate of First Church, San Francisco, Cal.

P. D. McCallum, who recently resigned at Viroqua, Wis., has returned to his home in Australia.

Asa McDaniels has resigned his pastorate at New Philadelphia, Ohio, to take effect October 1.

The Sunday-school of First Church, Lincoln, Neb., has made a good record this summer, keeping about the hundred mark at every service.

Maywood Church has recently been organized at Oklahoma City, Okla., with a membership of 142. G. W. McQuiddy has been called to the pastorate.

J. P. Garmong has begun another season's gospel singing in a tent meeting with Arthur Long at New London. There is an unusually good attendance and interest reported.

The annual convention of the churches of Western Pennsylvania was held recently at First Church, Washington, Pa. There was a large attendance.

The churches of seventh district of Missouri will hold their annual meeting at Maryville. Granville Snell, evangelist for this district is in a good meeting at Rotaville, Me.

M. R. Ely of Puyallup, Wash., has taken up the work of city evangelist for Tacoma, Wash. A rapid growth in the city work is expected under his leadership.

Heath Street Mission has been recently organized at Buffalo, N. Y., with good prospects for a steady growth in this needy field.

Howard T. Cree, pastor of First Church, Augusta, Ga., has closed a successful meeting at Allendale, S. C., and is now spending his vacation in Kentucky.

J. M. Lowe is in a meeting at Packwood, Iowa. It has been found necessary to do a reconstructive work in this field and good results are now forthcoming.

E. L. Cunningham, pastor of First Church, Leavenworth, Kan., will spend his two weeks' vacation in securing funds to pay the mortgage on the church at Lawrence, Kan.

The pastorate at Pawnee City, Neb., will be vacant October 1, owing to the resignation of Charles L. White. Correspondence in regard to this field should be addressed to J. F. Griffith, Pawnee City, Neb.

The Christian Century is in receipt of a number of interesting copies of the Bay City News, printed and published by the Bay City Club of Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Mo.

A new church was dedicated at Monette, Ark., on August 6. J. M. Taylor, pastor at Paragould, Ark., preached the dedicatory sermon. Mr. Taylor has concluded a meeting at Monette with about seventy additions.

George B. Stewart was the speaker of the day at a meeting held recently at Colorado Springs, Colo., by the Missouri society. About 1,500 former residents of Missouri were in attendance.

I. N. McCash dedicated College Hill Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, Aug. 13. The sum of $1,400 was needed and over $1,600 was subscribed. The neighboring congregations are manifesting hearty interest in the work and coöperation is assured.

The church at Boone, Iowa, is in need of a pastor owing to the resignation of H. F. Ritz who will return to his former field, Anaconda, Mont. This is a splendid church for a progressive work, having a good building and a united, hamonious congregation.

Charles E. Smith of Bethany, W. Va., has accepted the call to Main Street Church, Duquoin, Ill., and will assume his duties September 1. This church has been without a pastor since the resignation of George W. Wise who has taken the work at DeLand, Ill.

Nelson L. Browning, formerly pastor at Twenty-ninth Avenue Church, Birmingham, Ala., has begun his new work at Ft. Collins, Colo. Mr. Browning succeeds C. L. Dean who resigned as pastor there to enter mission and Sunday-school work in Colorado.

W. E. Crabtree, pastor of Central Church, San Diego, Calif., gave a series of travel lecture-sermons recently on Sunday evenings. The subjects were: The Yosemite Valley; Up the Columbia on a Steamboat; On Klamath Lakes and Under Shasta, Mr. Crabtree having recently visited these places.

Lowell C. McPherson will begin his work as superintendent of New England Missions with a meeting at Worcester, Mass., September 1. Mr. McPherson is one of the speakers at the convention of the New England churches to be held at Worcester during September. He will be in a meeting with Clyde Darsie at First Church, Quincy, Ill., beginning Oct. 1.

The annual county meeting of the Tipton county (Ind.) churches was held the first Sunday in August at the Tipton Church where Guy I. Hoover ministers. Allen S. Philputt, of Indianapolis was the preacher this year and his services were most acceptable. One of the largest audiences that has ever gathered for the county meeting assembled this year. Arrangements were made at this annual meeting for the holding of worker's institute at Tipton some time in November for the purpose of giving earnest consideration to the problems of the churches in the county. The state officers of the I. C. M. A. will be invited to be present. The missionary district with which this county has affiliated has been abandoned and hereafter the county will coöperate directly with the state association.

H. W. Brown sends the following report from Fitzgerald, Ga. "Our new pastor, C. Thos. Coombs, who succeeded E. E. Hollingworth is making a strong and very favorable impression on the members of our church and the people who attend our services. Mr. Coombs is a scholar and an orator and his sermons are so prepared as to present old subjects in a new and attractive light. He has been with us only since the first of July but in that time our morning audiences have increased about one-half and at night the church is always crowded. We are also very much pleased with the condition of our Sunday-school. Usually, during the hot summer weather the attendance falls off from one-third to one-half, but this summer our everage attendance is but little below that of last spring and we hope that when cool weather comes we will have double the membership of last year. Our Wednesday night meetings are also showing a much greater attendance, several times greater than in the past. Few people realize the extent of our field here. With a population in South Georgia of about 1,000,000 people we have only three well-established, strong churches, Valdosta, Savannah and here at Fitzgerald.

The Gospel of the Kingdom

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has one as much as any one to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the two years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature,

Beginning Next October

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that have ever been offered to Sunday Schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to see the work start off in the autumn with zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these classes in the study of Social Reform.

Send 5c in stamps for a single copy of the magazine. Do it now and begin at once to talk up the new program for the Fall Quarter! Address, and there are fifteen or twenty towns of from 3,000 to 15,000 inhabitants within seventy-five miles of here that have no church of our order at all and probably double that number of towns of 3,000 and under. We have had frequent calls from these places for men to come and preach and organize churches but we lack the workers and the money to do this work. Mr. Coombs realizes the vast extent of the field and the work here and has thrown himself into it heart and soul and his enthusiasm and energy is being felt. Our church seems to be very harmonious and the members are all pulling together and we expect to see great progress made in the immediate future."

National Association of Evangelists

The officers elected for the National Association of Evangelists at the Portland Convention were: President, W. T. Brooks, Ladoga, Ind.; vice-president, John T. Stivers, Los Angeles, Cal.; secretary, E. E. Elliott, Kansas City, Mo.; field secretary and treasurer, Jas. Small, Kansas City, Mo. Program committee for 1912—Chas. Reign Scoville, Chicago, Ill.; S. M. Martin, Seattle, Wash.; John T. Brown, Louisville, Ky. These men will provide a program for the Evangelistic sessions at Louisville. We have now a membership of about one hundred, and new names are being added each week. If you are not a member and you are an evangelist or an evangelistic singer in good standing in a local church or with your brethren, you can be a member by sending your name in to the secretary and treasurer. No admission fee is charged. JAMES SMALL.

Progressive Oceanside

The Dowling meetings held at Oceanside, Calif, recently have been greatly enjoyed. Mr. Dowling is a preacher and orator of rare ability. He clothes the gospel message with such interest that the people of every faith hear him gladly. He is at once one of the most forceful and most pleasing evangelistic preachers in America. Mrs. Dowling has added greatly to the interest of the meetings by service of song and her winning personality. William and Ruth Dowling, who have voices of great promise, have pleased the audiences with occasional selections.

Rev. E. M. Crandall, of the Methodist church, and Rev. Clarence Minard, of the Baptist church, have been royal and loyal in their fellowship.

The meetings closed with a great union service. Mr. Dowling gave a special address, "Would the Saloon Benefit or Injure Oceanside as a Place of Residence and Resort?" This timely topic drew a large audience. The address was a masterly cumulative argument against the saloon as a social and economical institution in which the strongest condemnation of the saloon was out of the mouths of its friends, brewers and distilleries. Following Mr. Dowling's address stereopticon pictures illustrating Dr. Chapman's book, "A California Rabbit Drive," were shown. Mrs. Sweeney gave a reading from the book as the pictures were thrown on the screen.

This story shows in a forceful way how boys are drawn to evil by saloon influence. Mr. Dowling's meeting was an influence for good to the entire community, with nothing of the sectarian spirit. The coöperation of churches and pastors was characteristic of Oceanside. While there was no evangelistic singer, the music was of the highest order.

The day after this union service the people of Oceanside went to the polls and by a large majority voted to continue the "dry" policy. OSCAR SWEENEY.

The Life of Jesus

In Fifty-two Lessons

BY DR. LOA ERMINA SCOTT.

A manual for young peoples and adult classes. It is conceded to be the most practicable text for its purpose on the market.

The book grew in the actual experience of teaching. From the moment it came from the press it has been in great demand. Another edition is now being prepared for.

It is just the thing for classes of young people of high school age. But it is equally well adapted to adults.

Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The graded lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' grade was complete the past year. The Primary grade will be complete for the opening of the new year—October 1. Three of the four years of the Junior grade will be complete October 1. The second year of the Intermediate grade (ready October 1) supplies boys and girls of 15 and 16 years.]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

Every lesson writer is a recognized authority in the Interdenominational Sunday School world!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that coöperation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

A NEW YEAR BEGINS OCTOBER 1

The Sunday-school calendar is made to conform to the public school calendar. While the graded lessons may be begun at any time, there are obvious advantages in starting at the beginning of the new cycle.

Send today for Price List, Order Blank and Prospectus!

If you state which grade you are chiefly interested in, we will send, in addition to prospectuses of the entire series, a teachers' and pupils' text for that particular grade. We do not send a complete outfit as free samples.

Vital Truths for To-day

Beginning September 1 and running parallel to our series of The Meaning of Baptism, of which announcement has previously been made, there will appear another series on the theme, "Vital Truths for Today."

This series will set forth in suggestive and constructive manner the important ideals of modern Christianity. The articles will not be academic but dynamic and practical.

Hundreds of our readers are perceiving the real nature of the opportunity involved in our TEN WEEKS FOR TEN CENTS special offer described on page 2. They see that it affords them an ideal chance to acquaint their friends with The Christian Century and the ideals for which it stands. The publishers wish to thank those who have already sent in their lists of names. Hundreds more will send in their lists during the next few days. September 15 is the limit set for receiving such names. Make up your list and send it in at once.

CHICAGO

What It Means to the Missionaries

If the good people at home could only see the needs of the heathen lands as we see them, how gladly would they give to help on the work! Letters come from the board saying, "You must cut down the work; we haven't enough money to support it." The estimates have already been cut to "rock bottom." A recent letter from H. P. Shaw, chairman of the Advisory Committee, informed us that all estimates must be reduced. Some of our missionaries succeeded in making reductions, but they were not sufficient; consequently the Advisory Committee, who represent the mission and have all the work in mind, had to meet again and cut each man's work whether he will or no.

Put yourselves in our places; see the crying need around you; see the hundreds around you daily, some of whom feel the need of the Savior, and others who need to be taught to feel the need of Him. See the light of God's love shining from the faces of the Chinese Christians; contrast their faces with those of the millions who know Him not. Face the problems and discouragements that we meet every day; feel our burning desire to win souls and be able to reach out and bring all the needy ones into the knowledge of the Master's love and salvation—and feeling all this, and with it the corresponding need for equipment and enlargement of the forces—and then, yes, then put yourself square up against the fact that the little you are doing must be cut short for lack of funds.. The depression and awfulness of the heathenism we see about us daily, is a fair load in itself, yet I believe all of our missionaries bear it joyfully for the Master's sake. Add to it the burden of having your work hindered for lack of funds —think of all these things and you can in a measure put yourself in the place of the foreign missionary.

Let me tell you just a little story of missionary heroism. One afternoon a few weeks ago, Dr. Macklin took one of his frequent trips into one of the country districts a few miles outside of Nanking, where he goes to preach the gospel. He was on horseback and took with him his son Charlie, who is about seven years old. Charlie was riding his donkey, one of the few pleasures which the Nanking children enjoy. They were going at a brisk rate. Charlie, who was ahead, suddenly came to a wide ditch. His donkey fell headlong, and Charlie got a bad fall, which, though it did not injure him seriously, bruised him somewhat and stunned him. His father immediately hastened to pick him up. As soon as he had collected his senses, his father wanted to get a stretcher and have some coolies carry him home. Charlie refused to allow this and said, "You needn't spend the money for a stretcher for me; better use your money for the beggars in the hospital." You see the father's burden, because of the lack of funds to run the hospital and care for the poor, wretched, sick sufferers, was felt by the child. He got back on to his donkey and insisted on riding home slowly, that the money might be used to help support the mission work which some of our good people at home are neglecting!

Now come to one of our Nanking Station prayer-meetings. Including those home on furloughs, we have fifteen missionaries in this city. Every Wednesday night we gather together in our various homes for a prayer-meeting. Each one in turn mentions some of the problems which have faced him in his especial work during the week—in fact he mentions any matter connected with the mission work for which he desires special prayer. And then, on bended knees, we pray for the things mentioned. We have prayed for the Chinese Christians, that they may be strong in the Lord; prayer for the inquirers who are seeking to know more of the way before they publicly acknowledge him by baptism; prayer for those who are indifferent that the spirit of God may touch their hearts—yes, and prayer for something else of great importance. We never have a meeting without prayer for the churches at home, that God may touch the hearts of His people and cause them to give generously to support the foreign mission work. We never fail to have prayer for the members on the committee of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, that God may richly bless their heroic efforts and give them patience and grace and fortitude and wisdom to meet the many problems and discouragements that face them.

And during the past few months there has been a special need for prayer. We pray daily that God may touch the hearts of those who have been writing articles in the church papers which have been harming our mission work by causing the offerings to decrease. Yes, we missionaries, on top of all of our own problems have the burden of yours, too. It is sad that we must pray that there may be harmony in our church at home and that God may give you such a vision of the needs out here that you will gladly give of your money and prayers to help lift up our hands and enable us to enlarge the work instead of cutting it down. There are many loyal souls at home who are doing their utmost to spread God's kingdom in all the world, as He commanded. We thank God for them, but for them we could not be here. There are some who are doing nothing to help in this great work. Oh, the privileges they are missing! If they could but see what we see! And—yes —there are a few, praise God that they are few, who by various means are hindering the work. We don't want to blame—we just want to pray with all the power that is within us, pray on bended knees, that God will give to such a broader vision—a broader vision for love, and service, and giving.

MRS. EDNA KURZ SETTLEMYER.

Nanking, China.

The Last Call

September 30 marks the close of the fiscal year. Although the convention was held in July, the books close at the usual time. A great advance has been made this year by the Bible schools in their American offering both in the amount given and in the number of schools contributing. There will be much rejoicing when the records are made known.

But there are two factors that seem to be preventing our achievement of an unqualified victory. We had set our stakes for the year at $25,000 and the figures as yet hover near the $20,000 mark. To reach our goal would indeed make us very happy and enable us to do all that we had planned in this regard. The field demands the laborers which this money alone can supply.

The other cause for discontent is the fact that many of our strongest and best schools have as yet sent no offering for American Missions whatever. We are really ashamed to mention the names of these for some are in churches where our best known men labor. A few schools that gave very generously last year have sent nothing this year, while several hundred schools upon whom we have felt we could always rely have not yet been heard from.

To one and all we sound out the last call of the year. If your offering has been taken and not forwarded, instruct your treasurer to remit at once.. If the offering has been delayed for any reason, use one of the Sundays in September to redeem your record and to do your part in the evangelization of America. If you have a plan of dividing your regular offerings for missionary work, see that the portion for American Missions is sent in before the books close. Let us make one last united effort to reach the aim of the year, $25,000 from the Bible schools for American missions.

Send all offerings to the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

The Free and The Brave.—"What did the poet mean when he called his country 'the land of the free and the home of the brave'?"

Ten Weeks for Ten Cents

In order to introduce The Christian Century into new homes the publishers propose to send the paper ten weeks for ten cents,

Beginning With the Issue of September 21.

Names for this offer must be sent in before September 15. These trial subscriptions will be positively discontinued at the expiration of the ten weeks unless ordered continued by the subscriber.

We expect to gather a list of several thousand names for this period. One subscriber to whom the plan was explained declared that he had ten dollars to spend on that proposition and would send us the names of 100 persons whom he wishes to become acquainted with The Christian Century and its vital message. Others will send smaller lists; still others, perhaps, larger lists. This is on behalf of their paper. Let every present subscriber think over the names of the fellow-members of his church and his friends and make up a list. A good set of names would be your Sunday School teachers and officers and your board of elders and deacons. If your pastor is not now a reader be sure that he is not overlooked. We Believe Every Reader Will Send in at Least One Name.

BEGIN NOW TO MAKE UP YOUR LIST

Send it in at once. Use separate sheet or sheets of paper for your names. Put your own name at the top as the sender. Keep a duplicate copy of your list. Be sure to make addresses plain. Remittance must accompany all lists.

The Conservation of Our Evangelism

First Appeal to the Churches by New Associate Secretary

Every great institution such as the church that seeks to perpetuate its power in the world naturally divides itself into two organized and co-operating forces; the force that conquers and the force that possesses and makes permanent the work of the conquerors, the recruiting force and the sustaining force. These two forces should never be divorced from each other, and in their march to conquer and possess they should ever be kept abreast.

We can justly be proud of the support given our evangelism and of the success obtained; but what about the taking care of the product of our evangelism? What of our efforts to make permanent the work of all our recruiting agencies? Of this we cannot boast. It is important in the extreme, indeed it is imperative, that the new additions to the church be assimilated into the organism of the church to serve its different functions as rapidly as they are made.

It is safe to say that one-half of the additions made in our great evangelistic campaigns drop back into the world. Authorities on Sunday-school work say that about 75 per cent of the pupils enrolled in Sunday-schools today are lost to the church. Chief among the reasons for this great loss of converts and Sunday-school pupils is the lack of church homes properly equipped for worship and for work. Sociologists argue that, for the welfare of the human family it is more important that the child have a home and a proper environment in which to be reared, than that the child be born. For without such advantages society is in danger of being criminalized.

This argument holds good in the church. The work of caring for the convert is just as important as is the making of the convert. The most essential things in caring for a family is the home, and likewise the most essential thing in caring for the household of faith is a church home. For a lack of such homes, especially in the newer sections of our country, thousands and tens of thousands of men and women brought to Christ in the central states are today lost to the Cause. The Board of Church Extension co-operates with, and goes hand in hand with, all evangelists and home missionary boards into as many new fields as its means will permit to make permanent their work by building homes for the little bands of homeless Disciples who, having received such help, in time become not only self-supporting but supporters of the work of the church in every land.

In this work so fundamental and essential in building up the Kingdom of God and perpetuating the New Testament principles of Christian union the Board of Church Extension has not had a square deal from the churches by whom and for whom it was organized. Over $366,000 was given last year to our home boards for missions and evangelism, while less than $78,000 was given to Church Extension. To the shame of the churches less than one-third of this amount or about $21,000 was all that was contributed by the churches as such. The balance, or over $50,000, was given by individuals.

Only one church in ten took an offering last year for Church Extension. Since its organization the Board has assisted in building nearly fifteen hundred churches, which is 400 more than the number of churches that sent offerings last year. Pastors and officers of our churches, is this a square deal? Including with the new receipts all returned loans and interest, your home building society last year had at its disposal less than half the sum contributed to state and national boards for missions and evangelism.

In this comparative study nothing has been said of the enormous amount of money spent each year in the campaigns of our great corps of independent evangelists whose work creates possibly a greater demand upon the Board of Church Extension than the work of all home mission boards combined. As a result of this unbalanced condition in the growth of our movement the Board of Church Extension, though it has and is doing with great efficiency a mighty work, has never been able, and is not able today, to meet the overwhelming demands of a rapidly growing brotherhood.

Since the Board was organized in 1888 2,600 churches have applied for help; less than 1,500 have received help. From 250 to 300 churches a year make applications for loans. Last year 115 churches were granted help in building. In the first ten months of this year 204 churches have asked for help, some most pitiable in their needs, and up to August 1 but sixty have received loans.

The beams of our working scales ought to be balanced, but not by a decrease of offerings to home missions, for these should be increased and the number of our evangelists doubled. Never before was the hour of opportunity more golden to preach the simple creed of Christ to a world centuries tired of hide-bound theologies and traditions; to proclaim a democracy of the New Testament type in a day when democracy is fast ascending the throne of all nations; to hold aloft a name that is above every name to a church not so proud of its sectarian names as formerly; and to herald a plea for the union of God's people to a Christendom keenly alive to the need of it and anxious for its advent.

The beams of our working scales must be balanced by a mighty increase in the number of churches contributing and in the amount contributed to the cause of Church Extension. If we have more than 10,000 churches in our brotherhood, why should not at least one-half of them, 5,000 churches, take the annual offering in September? Brother minister and every Disciple who reads these lines, will you not see that your church takes an offering for this work in September? May the blessings of God attend every minister and member of the body of Christ to the end that Church Extension may receive during September the greatest annual offering in its history. When this is done, and with all confidence the Board of Church Extension expects to see it done, then will the organized forces of the church, both the recruiting and the sustaining, the conquering and the possessing, be able to march abreast and win permanent victories for the Captain of our salvation upon a thousand fields.

JOHN H. BOOTH,
Associate Secretary of Church Extension.

To Try To Take a City

[We reprint the following item from an exchange—EDITORS.]

Disciples of Christ, strong in the Middle West, are considering plans for larger Christian work in New York City. Early in September a conference on the subject is to be held, that will be attended by men who have studied the New York situation for some years, officers of Disciples missionary organizations, and some of the New York Christian pastors and lay officials.

Reasons why Disciples are especially anxious to get into New York City in stronger fashion are two: One is because New York is national, and from it radiate national influences. The other is because, as it is generally admitted, New York has need for more religion. Two methods have been suggested and it is reported will be presented to the forthcoming conference of leaders. One of these is the founding in New York City, in some commanding location, of a great Disciples Church, large enough in grounds and buildings to compel attention of New York and of the country, and with a work within the buildings that shall be national in its scope while being also local. Associated in this plan may be, it is reported, a headquarters building for one of the large Disciple missionary societies.

The other plan to be brought forward will be, it is said, the settlement one, but owning no property, and aiming to establish, not one great church but many small ones. The argument is put forward, a somewhat novel one, that the small church is more effective than the big one. An adaptation of the Y. M. C. A. building idea, with dormitories, all on a small scale, is a part of the plan. With it there can be provided churches for foreigners as well as Americans.

Disciples number in the whole country nearly 1,500,000 members. In New York City they have seven small churches, four of them in Brooklyn. Their total New York City membership is considerably under 2,000.

Ups and Downs of Aviation

"The aviation fever has seized Chicago and holds the city firmly in its grip!" Thus we read, and the truth of the statement was easily apparent. The daily papers were filled with news of the aviation meet held in Chicago from Aug. 12 to 20. It is claimed that 100,000 people or more witnessed the daily flights. The streets in the vicinity of Grant Park, where the tournament was held, were often blocked by thousands gathered from every part of the city and hundreds from outside towns. The first days proved to be all that the committee in charge could have hoped for, although it must be confessed that the affair was managed more as a sporting event than as one intended to improve the character of flying-machines. Few records were made, and those which were, are of the less sensational variety, such as reaching greatest height, alighting nearest the starting point, and the longest sustained flight carrying a passenger. On the fourth day the hand of death seized two of the "birdmen." One of the deaths is declared by experts to have been due directly to recklessness in putting a greater strain upon a machine than it could bear. No explanation was given in the other case except that it is possible the driver lost control through fatigue, having been in the air for several hours. In announcing that the tournament would continue, the president of the association in charge admitted, "These accidents are most terrible, but the meet must go on. To call it off would serve no good end. These are sacrifices that are bound to mark advance toward establishment of aviation upon a practically practical basis." As announced at the beginning, this tournament was intended not to divert people with a program of "circus stunts," but rather to educate them in this new and wonderful science, and to further, as far as possible, the development of the aëroplane for sane and useful purposes. Since Jan. 1, thirty-four deaths have resulted from aviation, a rather high percentage. Probably most of those disasters were unavoidable, yet we heartily hope that improvements may soon be obtained which will make possible the elimination of this frightful toll. European nations are said to have much stricter regulations, both in laws and in law enforcement, than is true in this country. Whether or not accidents are less frequent there than here is not apparent. It is probable that regulations prohibiting reckless driving such as is seen at most American meets will be made laws, and the licensing of aviators may be taken from the hands of well-meaning but often powerless aëro associations, and made strictly a prerogative of the state. This should have the effect of checking the licensing of reckless and half-trained pupils.

More Trouble for England

We are not disposed to poke fun at Great Britain in an awkward predicament, yet the question naturally arises, "Where are her boasted laws bearing upon the peaceable settlement of labor disturbances?" In our own industrial embarrassment—and they are all too frequent—our attention often has been called to the advanced regulation of labor troubles adopted by foreign nations. This hint is accompanied by a significant implication that our industrial troubles are largely due to our poor laws. Now England, with some of the supposably-best means for settlement of strikes, is embroiled in a labor war that threatens to spread to all fields of organized labor. At first the strike apparently involved only the members of the Amalgamated Societies of Railway Workers. The employers and the employés have had little opportunity to get together, and the grievances of the laborers are a little uncertain. One report, apparently authentic, says the workingmen are discontented with the operation of the conciliation scheme drawn up by David Lloyd-George, while president of the board of trade and secretary of the Amalgamated Societies, in 1907. Says this dispatch: "The resolutions calling for the general strike complain of the vexatious attitude of the railway companies toward that scheme. No other grievance is mentioned." The railways were not disposed to listen to the men, and the union gave notice that unless representatives of the railways were sent to meet representatives of the laborers with a view to adjusting the difficulties within twenty-four hours, a general walk-out would be ordered. Following this ultimatum the laboring elements grew markedly more restive, and sympathetic walkouts were ordered by other unions. The shipping interests of both England and Wales are practically at a standstill. Incoming vessels were unable, last week, to land because of a strike of tugmen. Out-going vessels were unable to coal, and, in many cases, even to secure a crew. In the larger cities, local transportation facilities were affected and the people are facing a possible famine for lack of transportation for food. While the disturbance is general and is said to be spreading to the smaller cities, it seems to have come to a head in Liverpool. There it was found imperative to call out troops to repel infuriated mobs. The presence of soldiers seemed to infuriate them the more, and in a number of cases it was necessary to fire into them. All food supplies are kept under heavy guard. Among the cities affected by the railway-freight strikes are: Liverpool, London, Glasgow, Manchester, Chester, Bradford, Sheffield, Bristol, Doncaster, and Leicester. In some of these cities strikes are so general that tourists are unable to get out of town. The latest dispatches report that the situation is so serious that the present session of parliament will probably be prolonged in order to pass special legislation dealing with the industrial problem. Premier Asquith has called a number of leading officials of the unions and men influential in industrial circles to determine measures for the relief of the situation. As we go to press word is received that the ministry has arranged a settlement, and all strikers return to work immediately.

Congress and the Double Veto

"War to the finish," and "fight to the last ditch" may not be familiar expressions at the national capitol, but such an impression forcibly strikes the man on the street. Within the past few weeks the President has repeatedly reiterated his determination to veto all tariff legislation outside the Canadian reciprocity bill. Nothing daunted, congress serenely continued its program of tariff revision. The Democrats and the insurgents had pledged themselves to revision and they determined to keep the faith whether anything would come of it or not. The result is that a new wool schedule was passed in both houses, providing for a flat ad valorem duty of 29 per cent on all raw wool and proportionate rates on woolen manufactures. This was a blow to the now famous schedule K, once characterized by the President as indefensible, and it was hoped that he would be unable to veto the measure. To President Taft the issue seemed clear. The revision was political instead of scientific. If he sanctioned it, his action would be practically a repudiation of the tariff commission for whose creation he worked so zealously, and would be a complete surrender to the old log-rolling method of revision, of which system the present high tariff is the result. The only method of determining a correct and just tariff level, the President maintains, is through an impartial, scientific investigation by a commission. Such a commission will be ready to report to congress upon the wool bill in the regular session this fall, and he is convinced there is more to be lost than gained by revising the tariff in this session. Not less important is the veto of the Arizona and New Mexico statehood bill. Anxious as Mr. Taft is to have these two great territories admitted to statehood, he will resist to the extent of his power every attempt to bring them into the union with the recall of judges incorporated as a part of the state constitution. President Taft himself has sat upon the bench for several years, and he regards the recall principle as nothing less than inimical to our system of government. His convictions are so strong upon this point that he closed his veto message with the following words: "But it is said that the people are to become an independent state when created, and, even if we strike out judicial recall now, they can incorporate it in their constitution after statehood. To this I would answer that in dealing with the courts, which are the corner-stones of good government and in which not only the voters but the non-voters and the non-residents have a deep interest as a security for their rights of life, liberty, and property, no matter what the future action of the state may be, it is necessary for the authority which is primarily responsible for its creation to assert in no doubtful tones the necessity for an independent and untrammeled judiciary." At first it was thought possible that congress might attempt to pass some of these matters over the veto of the president, but since his message was read, there has been a split between the Democrats and the progressives in congress, which apparently will make any such action impossible. Adjournment will probably come speedily.

One cent an acre from the owners of the 100,000,000 acres of untilled lands in the United States will be asked by the promoters of the "back to the farm" movement. The money will be used as an educational fund in furthering the movement and providing homes and work for the army of unemployed of America, according to the statement of the commissioner general of the movement. Committees on location of headquarters, plans for an educational campaign and other details have been arranged by the board of directors of the movement, who announced that within thirty days active operations would be commenced, with Chicago as a center.

Methodist

Foreign Board Ahead.

The Methodist Foreign Mission Board, representing the large Methodist body of the North, is $101,000 ahead of the same time last year in its financial receipts. This is not, however, an exceptional gain, since it has several times, during the past decade, increased its annual receipts by that sum or a larger one. However, it is encouraged at this time because two years ago it fell into debt $175,000. Last year it got out to the extent of $70,000, but still had a debt at the beginning of this year of $98,000.

The Foreign Board asks Methodists for $1,500,000 and promised to the mission field this year $1,114,000. Last year Methodists gave, through their regular Board, $1,425,000 to foreign missions, while Methodist women gave, through their own Foreign Board, $705,000, a total of more than $2,100,000. The women raise and spend money for missions, administering their affairs without turning money over, as in the case of most others, to the men's societies.

This year both Home and Foreign Methodist Boards hold their annual meetings in Denver. The date of the meeting of the Home Board is November 10, and of the Foreign November 16.

Episcopal

Bequests with Strings Attached.

The Disciples of Christ have had their troubles over property that has been given for church uses on condition that the congregations benefited by the gifts refrain from certain practices held by donors to be unscriptural and sinful. Attempts to bind the consciences of men in this way result in confusion. The Living Church believes that all bequests which are coupled with binding conditions relating to the manner of performing divine worship should be declined. The following is from its columns:

Not long ago there was a bequest to a church on condition that "ritualistic" services should always be maintained. Sometimes we hear of provisions exactly the opposite. In this week's issue is printed the information of a bequest to a church conditioned on the choir not being vested, its location to remain permanently unchanged, and on there being "no habitual or customary turning about of the clergy in reciting the creed," etc.

We believe that all bequests of this sort should invariably be declined; and that quite as truly when the provisions are agreeable to the parochial authorities as when they are disagreeable. To conduct divine service with full Catholic ceremonial, or with very plain accessories, because one deems it pleasing to Almighty God to do so, is one thing; to do it because otherwise a bequest would be lost is quite another. And it is very difficult to say that only the higher motive would, in fact, actuate one, if money interests were at stake, however incidentally. Any provision of this sort is perilously near to that commercialism of Masses which was so serious an abuse during mediæval centuries.

The Bryant conditions mentioned in the news columns are such as are grotesquely unreasonable; but it is not on that ground that we would have them rejected. To make conditions at all is a form of simony. One may conceivably be justified in building and endowing an edifice for any sort of worship, whether it be sun worship or any form or manner of the worship of Almighty God, so long as the building is esteemed merely a private chapel, intended for selfish purposes. One has a right, in that event, to exercise the same perpetual control that he might lawfully exercise over his dog kennel. He should simply realize in doing it that he is gratifying his own pleasure and in no sense giving anything to Almighty God. But for a parish church, or any place of worship intended for other than private purposes, such requirements are insolent and unworthy. In our judgment no church corporation can ever be justified in accdieng to them.

Church Work in College Towns.

It is being brought home to more than one denomination that the local church or churches are unable adequately to minister to the students of the great universities. The churches of the state or of the nation must come to the help of the local churches. The students cannot be deemed large financial assets. The residents of the town in which the university is located are often unable to understand the spiritual needs of the students. The lack of sympathy between "town" and "gown" is often so pronounced as to make coöperation in church work impossible. To meet the demands of the situation the Living Church has this to offer:

And so we believe that a particular department of the general Board of Missions should be formed, with authority to take charge of such work in whatever instances the diocesan authorities should request it. It should, of course, be under the immediate supervision of the Bishop, but supported (where necessary) from general funds, and with a general oversight from a particular bureau at the Missions House. The function of that bureau should be to see that work among student bodies and their instructors is adequately done, by whatever degree of co-operation between local, diocesan, and general resources may be necessary. It would, indeed involve a greater strain upon our missionary resources than funds would permit, were it attempted at the outset to do all that ought to be done. As in all other work it would be necessary that this should grow. But, in our judgment, a supervisory bureau should be formed at once, and the work be expanded as rapidly as might prove feasible. The failure to undertake this work in any systematic manner is a glaring defect in our provision for missionary enterprise at the present time. Perhaps this work may truly be said to be more important than any of the domestic missionary work under the general Board. If so, it might be justifiable to suspend some of the latter in order to meet this greater necessity.

May we not hope that the Church will speedily awake to a realization of her duty in this matter? The intellectual leadership of the next generation is involved in the proper presentation of Christianity and Churchmanship to the present-day college students.

Baptist

How Do They Vote?

The Journal and Messenger is puzzled by the reports that come from Brazil, Ind., where the largest Sunday-school in the world is said to be located. The news-gathering agencies have discovered this school and they have called the attention of the world to it. The Journal and Messenger has received other reports from Brazil and it is moved to say:

There must be something the matter with that big Methodist Sabbath-school of Brazil, Ind., advertised industriously as the largest Sabbath-school in the world, and with a Men's Bible Class numbering 1,200. On May 29, a few weeks ago, a local option temperance election was held in Brazil, and only 866 votes were cast on the dry side, or less by 344 than this one Men's Bible Class reports. In addition to this church there are said to be eight other churches in the city of 10,000 inhabitants, but of the 2,444 votes cast there was a majority of 713 on the wet side. One wonders at all this. If this one Sabbath-school has a membership of 5,000 and is the largest in the world, how is such a moral condition possible in Brazil? One fears that more has been said about numbers than about the service of Jesus Christ. One wonders, too, if there has not been some exaggeration as to numbers. If reports are true, it is better to talk less about numbers and aim more earnestly to do really solid work. It is said that the attendance at the school runs from 800 to 1,300, except on Easter Day Rally, when 2,100 were present, and that the largest number of the Bible class ever present was at a recent banquet, when 300 were present. Of course, this is not said to depreciate any good work. We wish there were 1,000 schools with 5,000 present every Sabbath, but something seems to be wrong, when figures are so exalted and the actual results at a temperance election are so small.

Put the "Millennial Dawn" in the Fire.

If all the Texas Baptists are of the same mind as W. A. Jarrel of Dallas, Russell of the "Millennial Dawn" will not be invited to lead the Baptist hosts of Texas to greater light. Russell thinks he has discovered the truth that makes men free and he has been in Dallas with his message. His agents are traveling throughout the land selling the "Millennial Dawn" books. The books and the lectures have aroused the indignation of Mr. Jarrel, who thus expresses himself in the Baptist Standard:

Some time ago, a fellow announced in Dallas that he would preach on the subject, "To Hell and Back"—as ribald, profane announcement as the foulest infidel that ever was could announce. The point in his assault on Christianity was, there is a second chance—a chance to be saved after death. In reply, I said: "Russell need not spend breath on that, for there will be no 'to hell and back' with such a profane scorner, but it will be for him 'all to hell' and more for him 'back.'" This same Russell is the author of the most absurd infidel books that I believe I have ever read; yet claiming to be true Christianity. He calls the abominable thing, "Millennial Dawn." Of course, as the case with all infidel effusions, to sweeten the thing so that suckers will swallow it, there is a fine lot of truth mixed in his books—the greater the poison the more truth to make it palatable. He is the author of a miserable sect, that he originated about twenty years ago. Already that sect is split. But like another great humbug, with great pretensions—so-called "Christian Science," of course, he has a large and growing following. He seems to have plenty of money to exploit the thing, and runs a paper and a large printing establishment. When I was holding a meeting in Lockhart one night, as Russell's agent was then in the town selling his books, I publicly exposed the thing. A lady of another church who heard me returned home and wisely put into the fire his books that her husband that day had paid $3 for. But I write this to warn the readers that Russell, somehow, has got the patent sheet people to publish his poisonous "sermons," that they are being scattered all over the country by our rural and city papers. Let the reader write these editors, telling them to leave Russellism out of their paper or "stop" their papers.

The Love of Jesus for His Work

"The classic civilization rested on slave labor. The ideal of the gentleman of Athens was the free employment of leisure, not active enterprise. The church, on the other hand, maintained both the dignity and the moral value of labor. Not only the example of the Founder of Christianity and his early disciples, who were for the most part manual laborers, but the intrinsic moral value of work, already referred to, entered into the appraisal. The Puritans, who have had a wide-reaching influence upon the standards of the middle and lower classes of England, and upon the northern and western portion of America, were insistent upon industry, not merely for the sake of its products,—they were frugal in their consumption,—but as expressing a type of character. Idleness and 'shiftlessness' were not merely ineffective, they were sinful. 'If any will not work, neither let him eat,' commended itself thoroughly to this moral ideal. That the laborer brought something to the common weal, while the idler had to be supported, was a reënforcement to the motives drawn from the relation of work to character."

The above quotation from Dewey and Tufts' Ethics is given because it brings out clearly the importance of work in a Christian civilization. We cannot understand the love of Jesus for his work unless we duly appreciate the value of all useful labor. The "gentleman's job" used to be that of war and intrigue. The world is coming to its senses and it is beginning to call idlers by their right name. The gentleman of the future will be the man who does his work well and is intelligent and honorable. There will be no questions asked as to what kind of work he does. By observing the conduct of Jesus we find that the basis for this new ideal is in his life and teaching. He put a value upon every piece of work that is necessary to human welfare. His own ministry was not something apart from the common lot. He made men and women fit for their places in the world. He took a few men away from their homes to do a special work. The majority was expected to stay with their families and serve God by feeding, clothing, training, and protecting their children and by showing neighborly kindness to all about them.

When the disciples raised the speculative question as to the cause of a man's blindness, Jesus gave them to understand that it was vastly more important to cure the man than it was to satisfy the theoretical demands of the mind. This does not mean that our curiosity is to be treated with suspicion and that we are to give ourselves up to "practical" interests. It is our habit to cry out against the reasonings of the theologians and philosophers whenever these invite us to do a little thinking. We are as lazy as we dare to be and we resent the request of real thinkers to put facts together and get the meaning of them. Jesus creates love for work by revealing to us our places in the universe and the relation of what we do to the purposes of God. But there is a time for all things. When the battle is joined, it is too late to deliberate. The commander must accept the situation in which he finds himself and use his forces to the best advantage. There are many problems which the mind of man cannot or has not solved. We cannot wait for their solution before we undertake to relieve the distressed or to proclaim our faith in the eternal goodness. Experience has shown that life without love is worthless. We may safely choose the way of love though we do not know all that is involved in our choice.

The love of Jesus for his work caused him to forget hunger and weariness. Men seek relief from their burdens by resorting to drink, to pleasures that weaken mind and body. There is no lasting relief from the burden of toil except delight in toil for what it means to the world. We need our vacations. We must have our playgrounds. But if we cannot find rest in our daily tasks, we have still to learn the secret of life. The real student is not driven to his books; it is a hardship when he is kept away from them. The scientist is fascinated by what he sees in nature and he is never so happy as when he is prying into some secret corner of nature's workshop. The workman feels himself a man as he watches the thought in his mind taking shape in wood or brick or iron or stone. The disciple of Jesus knows that he is truly a disciple when he is helping some one to grow in knowledge and grace and when he is making his contribution to the growth of the institutions in which all that is worthy in the life of man is conserved and magnified. Business-like and Gracious

Our opening editorial page is given this week to the maiden message of the new Associate Secretary of Church Extension. Mr. Booth has been at his new work only four months. He has visited many churches and conventions, instructing and stirring the people with his setting forth of the attractive plea for the housing of young congregations.

The plea of Church Extension is a great plea. Mr. Booth has truly characterized it when he says the function of church extension is to conserve the results of our evangelism. There is no good in sowing seed unless one has determined to conserve the growing crop and the ripened harvest.

A church house holds the young church together. It provides the conditions within which the family feeling may grow. It is hard for a congregation to feel its own unity until it has its own home. The house is the symbol of spiritual values and purposes. It serves a useful purpose itself in protecting the congregation from cold and rain, but its function is not wholly nor mainly utilitarian. It is idealistic. It constantly suggests the spiritual life. Its steeple points the whole community to the skies. Its arches and windows subdue the soul to reverence and devotion. Its social appointments constantly prompt to new forms of service.

In London there has lately been consecrated a "Church of Silence." It stands facing Hyde Park in Uxbridge road, with open door, beside which appears this inscription: "Passengers through the busy streets of London, enter this sanctuary for rest, silence, and prayer. Let the pictured walls within speak of the past yet ever continuing ways of God with men." No preacher is to stand in the pulpit, no rite will be performed, no creed compels the spirit to resign its freedom. It is merely a wayside place for spiritual recreation.

Such a house is itself a vast sermon. And every church house is, in its degree, such an instrument of grace. Loose architecture is just as reprehensible and costly to religion as is loose theology. It is important that our hours of worship be built on "sound" principles of architecture as that our sermons show forth sound doctrine.

Of elemental importance is it therefore that our young churches be given a chance to build their church home as early and as easily as possible. Except in rare cases they ought not be compelled to erect a house unaided. The whole brotherhood should have fellowship with the new congregation in this enterprise. This fellowship is of a piece with the impulse that prompts the parent to build a modest home as his wedding gift to his son or daughter.

The Church Extension Society is the means by which the whole brotherhood plays the paternalistic role toward the young congregation setting up for itself. Church Extension does not make a gift of a house to any congregation, but it provides a way by which many a congregation may secure a house for itself, which would else be compelled to struggle along in a hall or disband altogether.

The entire month of September belongs to this great cause. Its appeal is made to the churches at a disadvantageous time. Many pastors are away during August. Most memberships are more or less disintegrated in the summer. The season's work has hardly begun when the Church Extension call is made.

This, however, should only spur every minister to yet more than ordinary efforts to make a creditable offering for this important work. If the first Sunday is not convenient, let some other Sunday in September be chosen. By no means let this Church Extension month go by without collecting the gifts of the people for this work at once so business-like and so gracious.

Illinois Convention Program

Not in a long time has a more adequate and attractive program been announced for an Illinois state convention than that which is set for Danville next week.

The tendency in most state programs—and Illinois has not been an exception—has been toward perfunctory and stereotyped form. The order of our state conventions was mainly a matter of reports of the various societies with appeals by the expert representatives of these societies and interests. Convention-goers came to feel like circus-goers, that seeing one was seeing all.

This year, however, some originality has gone into the construction of the program. A disposition to regard Illinois as a commonwealth as an object of study and the proper object of service by the Disciples is manifest in the make-up of the Danville program. What pertinent and rich materials are latent in these three themes alone: "The Political and Religious Genesis of the Commonwealth of Illinois," "The Present State of Religion in Illinois," "Illinois and the Disciples of Christ." These topics betoken the breadth of vision and interest which is coming to characterize Disciple leaders in this state. The kingdom of God is before their minds, not simply the Disciples of Christ.

The possibilities of this line of study which assumes a vital connection between the church and every interest of the state—political, industrial, civic—on the one hand and between the Disciples of Christ and every other religious body and moral force making for the higher life of the commonwealth on the other hand, are incalculable. The program of this year, rich as it is, is but a suggestion of the wealth of state convention material which future program committees may have if they will follow the lead of this year's committee.

The important thing upon which the convention of next week is to be congratulated is, however, not simply new subjects, but a new and broader point of view.

The program suggests that Illinois Disciples are passing, with their brethren of other names, from the sectarian point of view to the point of view of the kingdom of God.

And it is this shifting point of view that is the important matter for progress.

A Preacher's Golden Anniversary

That perennial youth, Dr. B. B. Tyler, pastor of South Broadway Church, Denver, Colo., celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination to the ministry Sept. 3. The congregation is joining him in making the occasion a joyous one. They have prepared invitations to the exercises, one of which has been received by each of the editors of this paper.

Doctor Tyler himself writes a personal note asking us to come out and rejoice with him. Nothing would afford us greater satisfaction than to hear the sermon he will preach on that day. We are told that, despite his years, the marvelous vivacity of this preacher has not abated. His message still comes forth with power. His thousands of friends all over the land will join us in congratulations upon his extraordinary achievement, and no doubt many will wish to express their sentiments to him by personal letter.

—Rev. A. C. Smither, for twenty-one years pastor of First Church, Los Angeles, Calif., has resigned his pulpit to accept the position of General Manager of the Christian Board of Publication, St. Louis. Mr. Smither has held but this one pastorate, having gone to Los Angeles immediately upon graduation from college. The very creditable growth of the Disciples' cause in that city is by common consent attributed to his sagacious leadership more than to any other single factor. In a growing western city it is pretty hard for a minister to keep from dipping into commercial life in a degree. As a rule such avocation helps neither the minister nor his Christian work. Mr. Smither is, however, an outstanding exception to this rule. He has prospered in real estate, dairy and other business ventures and maintained a high standard of religious leadership. It is believed that his business qualities make him a most desirable addition to the force of the St. Louis publishing house. W. R. Warren, who has hitherto been both general manager of the publishing house and managing editor of the Christian-Evangelist, will now take entire editorial charge of the Christian-Evangelist. It is generally understood that Doctor Garrison, for forty years editor of the paper is soon to retire. This fact tinges with regret what otherwise is occasion for general congratulation. Our best wish for the new management is that the gracious spirit of the founder of the Christian-Evangelist may continue to characterize its policy.

On the Dedication of Books

The dedication of a book interests me. Since it is the little touches of life and conduct that reveal character, a writer may be judged by the manner in which he dedicates his books. I fancy there is more in or to a book dedication than most of us think. Volumes which we pronounce "deathless" might never have been if some devoted wife or mother, some soul who understood, had not encouraged and inspired. Before me is a row of books mostly new. I pick them up and open at the dedicatory page. Here is the way in which Prof. Walter Rauschenbusch dedicates his "Christianity and the Social Crisis:"

"To
The Women Who Have Loved Me
My Mother
My Sisters, Frida and Emma
My Dear Wife Pauline
And
My Little Daughters, Winifred and Elizabeth
This Book Is Lovingly Inscribed"

And this volume is John Spargo's "The Substance of Socialism." The dedication is brief though eloquent:

"To
Walter Rauschenbusch
Fidei Defensor."

It is difficult to say who is complimented the more by the confession of faith in the above lines, but this I know: After reading this noble dedication I entered into a study of Spargo's work with an added zest.

Here is Thomas C. Hall's "Social Solutions." He dedicates it in this wise:

"To My Wife
in Most Loving Remembrance of
July the twenty-ninth
1884."

I do not know it, but I suspect this date is that of their marriage, or perhaps their engagement. Let us be grateful that sentiment never dies.

Here is a little work by Edwin L. Earp, "Social Aspects of Religious Institutions" by title and the dedication is as follows:

"To
My Wife and Our Children
Ruth and James."

And this book on "The Church and the Social Problem" is by President Samuel Plantz of Lawrence University. He dedicates it:

"To Father and Mother
In Loving Gratitude and Filial Affection."

Some day perhaps, if it has not already been done, a book will be written on this subject of author's dedications; and it will be interesting and valuable. For one thing it will show how deep in debt authors are to dear ones, to friends and inspirational personalities.

I think the most beautiful book dedication that I ever read in the way of tender tribute is that by Samuel Chadwick, an able English preacher of Leeds, in his volume of sermons entitled, "Humanity and God." I have not this volume by me so must quote from memory. As I recall it the words are these:

"To my Wife
And my Wife's Mother
Both of Whom Gave Me
Their Best."

I hold this to be well worth remembering, both as a worthy example of good taste and as an antidote to the silly twaddle and painfully poor jokes about mother-in laws in general.

Christianity: The Way In

BY R. M. WENLEY.

EDITORS' NOTE:—Professor Wenley of the department of Philosophy, the University of Michigan, here gives his testimony to the simple faith of the gospel of Christ. This address, taken with the two others which have previously appeared in these pages, should go far to silence the charge, widely prevalent among the uninformed, that the universities and university scholarship are inimical to Christian faith.

This is the last of three addresses designed specially to set Christianity in focus for students. My colleagues have spoken to you already about two "isms"—Materialism and Agnosticism. Now, an "ism" is always intellectual more or less. That is, it results from an effort of reason to analyse human experience, to give us sections. This done, one section is taken, isolated from the rest, and treated as if it were the whole. In other words, we are confronted by a fiction, a part torn from its relations. Moreover, it is a learned fiction. It lies at the end of a path accessible to but few, because only those having a definite technical training can reach it. Farther, the process tends to lead out of life; in the issue we cannot well avoid viewing life from the outside, as if it were a curiosity, rather than a palpitating reality.

Remote Relation.

It is true, doubtless, that many things, due to analysis of just this sort, are connected with Christianity incidentally. By happy fortune, however, they are not parts of the religion of Christ, but accidents of opinion within it, or aspects of occasions in its career among men, now become of historical interest. As such, they demand learning, and are, in strict fact, known to very few—very few relative to the vast masses of mankind. For example, I happen to be aware that, in the present state of scholarship, it is impossible for us to construct a satisfactory text of the Hebrew scriptures. We have not the means at command, thanks to certain historical events which experts alone understand or can appreciate.

Once more, I happen to be acquainted with one of the few men who can tell me something about the extremely subtle influences that must have played upon the author of our fourth Gospel. So rare is his knowledge that, almost certainly, not a single student in this huge university really knows anything about the subject, while, probably, not twenty men in the United States understand what the situation was. Surely we can all see, on the face of it, that rational conclusions of this type stand in remote relation to the actual process of religion in human lives. In any case, they cannot but be secondary, not primary, otherwise, who could attain salvation? As I said at the outset, they are aspects of knowledge, not integral parts of the process of life itself. To mistake them for the essence of religion is to fall into pitiable error. For, we have ways out here, not ways in.

The Simplicity of Religion.

In strange contrast with such things, so difficult and intricate that they must remain the property of a select company, the religion of Christ is very simple. This simplicity is traceable to its nature, which amounts to a direct statement of the basal fact in human life. Christ regards us, not as scholars, or as aught in particular, but in our common quality as men. As such, we are beset daily by certain necessities that we must face, and grapple on the spur of the moment. What mortal relation has an exact text of the Old Testament in Hebrew, or the balance of forces in Hellenistic culture, to your religion—to the cry that ascends from your souls to the living God, begging for assurance of almighty aid,—the sole aid that is able to save,—to deliver you from the terrible burden of sin? A question so absurd answers itself; it ought never to be asked. Sin is our constant companion. We carry it about with us in our spirits and in our bodies; it tempts us from within at every turn and, smiling, lures us to our ruin. Here we need, above all things, a way into life. We demand something whereon we can rely, not now or then, but invariably. And, plainly, this must be something so simple that its operation is as clear as noonday to anyone born under the law of nature.

The Great Question.

The clamant question uttered by human lips, day-in, day-out, is, How am I to arm myself against this sin? How may my inmost self be guided so that my steps shall not falter, my mouth be free from guile? So far as my experience goes, Christianity offers the only solution. And we find it recorded very directly, briefly, and simply by the greatest of the three men of wonderful religious genius who contributed to the New Testament. St. John says, "Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (1:17). This, then, is the way in to the very basis of human life, the interpretation of its true dignity. What does it mean?

To begin with, grace is itself a way of life, a manner of conduct. For, remember, Christianity is a supremely practical religion. And consistent practice demands a stable center, a power that attracts all incidentals to itself, and modifies or transforms them. A life converted, turned round, that is, to a new center by grace, abounds in a certain type of actions. We might call them actions which, being good in themselves, are done unconsciously for the sake of their goodness, done spontaneously, anything like calculation with reference to self being absent. But, no deed that counts for much can be committed apart from reference to our fellows. Hence one of the profound truths of Christianity—the truth of mediation. Actions are mediated through others. Through the mediation of Christ we may acquire His grace, not otherwise. When we appropriate the inward grace of His life, then, and then alone, are we in a position to control our own acts similarly.

The Solution.

And, if we have thus absorbed Him, what then? Whenever we find ourselves in a difficulty, we possess a ready and sufficient guide to the heart of it, that is, to its solution. Ask, What would Christ do? Or, if it be your privilege to know one in whose character Christian grace plays as a constant benison, inquire of yourself, What would he do? If you face the question boldly, the reply will flash forth clear, and on the instant. Moreover, it is always right! You can be absolutely sure about it, as you can be sure about nothing else. At last, when the final balance comes to be struck, you will find that Christ's reply wears. Undoubtedly, the plain course as He puts it will often mean apparent immediate disadvantage to yourself. I am sure this is very common. But, any man whose experience lies behind him will tell you that, in the long run, failure to accept this momentary disadvantage spells more lasting misfortune. It breeds permanent defect. Every time a professed Christian fails to follow the way lighted by Christ's grace, his soul shrivels by so much, till, at length, he is in dire danger of becoming like that pitiful figure, Kipling's Tomlinson; one whose soul has sunk to microscopic proportions.

And the reason is plain. The man who knows Christ's grace, and refuses to accept its guidance, may perform all the motions, may rehearse all the propositions, that religious convention requires; none the less, in veritable reality, he is an infidel. On the other hand, let Christ's grace have free course, and you will go from strength to strength in the basal reality of manhood. For, there is no appeal here to the abstract intellect, but to the wholeness of ripening manliness. Here we have a manifestation of the true values of things as they affect our attitude toward the awful solemnities that surround the mystery of our being. This, then, is what we mean when we say that "Grace came by Jesus Christ." This is the practical way—the way with reference to action—into the very roots of our nature. Mediated by it, we grow into discernment, and into strength in all that renders human occasions worth while.

What Is Truth?

"Truth came by Jesus Christ." Truth is the object of life. And, while partly an affair of intellect, it actually involves all functions of our spiritual constitution in normal co-operation with each other. Our power to think, to overlook our selfhood, is there; so, too, our power to will, with its ability to motivate action; so, too, our powers of feeling, our emotions, our passion, with their force to grip a purpose and make it our very own. Truth is the aim of all these subordinated to a person who employs them so as to achieve a fuller life, one that he has not as yet realised. It is in this sense that "truth came by Jesus Christ." And it came simply, so simply that it is truth for the plainest of plain men as for the most elegant, for the ignorant as for the scholar, for the sinner as for the saint.

What, then, is this simple truth? We may reply, the revelation of a new dimension in life. Religion witnesses man's attempt to realize harmonious relationship with God. No religious soul has any other problem in his religion. He feels vaguely that he is made in God's image, but he has a painful awareness that he cannot reproduce the original, thanks to sin. Men are quite conscious, I think, that the quality of existence centers in something completer than they possess now. They seek a fuller, more rounded well-being. But they are not clear what they must seek to assuage their imperfection, or how they are to come at this more excellent possession. It was here that supreme truth came by Jesus Christ: truth that holds fundamentally of all human kind, apart entirely from shifting conditions of time, place, or circumstance. And Christ's revelation was on this wise. Man leads his existence in the continuous presence of some Being who is all that he would become.

But, somebody will say, "any idealist philosopher can do this service for you." Christ did not stop here. He was in His own Person the ideal Being Whose life is the confirmation of those dreams that are, after all,

The Church in Our Town

A Study of the Sectarian Handicap in a Typical Village

BY OSCAR SWEENEY.

EDITORS' NOTE: The Southern California convention of Disciples, held last month at Long Beach, listened to an address by Rev. Oscar Sweeney of Oceanside, in which he boldly dealt with what might be called the "brass tacks" of the home mission problem as related to already well-churched villages. The convention passed a resolution asking that his address be published. He has put the gist of it into manuscript and given consent to The Christian Century for its publication. One thing at least is clear: that the problem of the village church cannot be solved until it is approached in the large Christian spirit of the author of this address.

I have spent a number of the best years of my life as a home missionary. During my present pastorate—lasting four years—all our preachers in the state except seven have changed pastorates.

My heart's desire and prayer is that the church may be united that the world may be saved.

I love Christian union and practice it so far as present denominational conditions will permit.

Permit me to give a picture of "the church in our town."

It is a divided church. The population of our town is one thousand. The divisions of the church number five. Each division contains as faithful Christians as there are in the land.

Only One Self-Supporting Church.

The combined Protestant church membership is 142. Including members of the Catholic mission it is less than 200. The strongest church has fifty members and is self-supporting. All the others are mission churches, four out of five.

The smallest church has twenty-two members. All the churches have pastors for full time. The four Protestant churches raised for local support $2,660. They gave for missions, home and foreign, $1,025. The three missionary churches received $1,040 in missionary assistance. That is, because of its divided condition, and in spite of its extreme liberality, the church in our town receives more than it gives for missions. When accounts are balanced, "the church in our town," in spite of its desire to do, really does nothing for the world's evangelization.

What a United Church Would Do.

A united church in our town could pay a pastor a living salary and have a large part in the world's evangelization, by supporting many workers beyond the sea—with the money now raised. The united church would reach more people. It would grow. Most people in our town don't go to church. They're afraid to. They know the church is so poor they believe it is after their money instead of after them. The divided church lacks inspiration for preacher or people. Preachers don't stay long in our town. During the past four years there have been sixteen preachers—three or four for each church.

The preachers are loyal and royal in their fellowship. They exalt one Christ, preach one gospel, have regular union church services monthly or oftener and promote the spirit of union. United action of churches and preachers drove the saloon from our town over three years ago and united action only has kept the saloon out in spite of repeated efforts to return. We emphasize our agreements and minimize our differences, but there is danger that the divided church in trying to be polite will cease to be as aggressive—as evangelistic—as she should be.

I have drawn this picture of the church in our town as a prelude to the question:

"What can be done about it by churches and by state and national missionary societies?"

In the first place, we can all pray more earnestly than ever before, "Thy Kingdom come." For the Christian world is not yet converted to Christian union. If, with our whole hearts, we loved Him who prayed "that they may be one that the world may believe," and if we discerned Him in our brother Christian who is as desirous to fulfill the Master's will as we ourselves, we would not crucify our Lord afresh and put Him to an open shame by dividing his body, wasting his substance, wearing out his servants in ten thousand communities in the home land when untold millions beyond the sea never heard the name of Jesus or his gracious, "Come unto me."

Denominational Pride.

We must recognize the fact that denominational pride has more to do with the divided church than difference of belief. We are building up principalities at the expense of the larger interests of the Kingdom.

We must get the burden of the world on our hearts, see the Philippines hungry for the word of God, behold China waking up and realize her possibilities for the world's weal or the world's woe, feel India's need for Christ, go with Dr. Loftus and the Ogdens and Sheltons to the roof of the world, Tibet, where the last closed door opens, and listen for the last cheering news from Africa: "120 conversions at Bolenge, 78 at Moneicka," while the native church of Korea, assisted by a handful of missionaries, aspires to win a million souls for the Master in a single year!

The great wall of China was erected in the long ago to protect the Chinese and exclude their enemies. It cost in treasure and human lives more than any other single undertaking in the world's history. And in a short time it proved worthless for the purpose for which it was built.

Denominational Walls Like Chinese Wall.

So denominational walls were erected to protect the truth and to fence out error. Like the Chinese wall, they today prove worthless for the purpose for which they were intended. Today business, family and social relations have as much and more to do in determining church relations than matters of belief. A great variety of opinion is tolerated in every church. Loyalty to Christ is the supreme test. And the church has reached a point where she knows she cannot be loyal to Christ while she keeps almost the whole army at home to "hold the fort" in spite of the master's command to "go."

State and national missionary societies, conferences and conventions that have expressed themselves favorably to Christian union can learn from the children of this world the methods of the trust for application in new fields and over-churched communities—but of course there should be no "unreasonable restraint" of denominational prerogatives!

United Church Is Possible.

The number of churches needs restriction. Hundreds, yes, thousands of churches are organized every year that have no moral right to exist, in view of the Savior's prayer.

Encourage the people of small communities to come together in one church rather than have a separate organization for every six people. I know two or three such places where Methodists, Baptists, Disciples, Congregationalists, and others worship together joyously. They look upon each other as Christian, servants of the one Lord. And how can there be Christian union if the other churches are not Christian? But these churches are not yet organized. Some of them will probably be organized as Christian churches. What, then, shall we do with the unimmersed Christians who were good enough Christians so long as there was no church roll? Why have a church roll, anyway except for convenience?

For my part, I think it would be wrong to follow the plan of E. S. Ames of Chicago and make them "members of the congregation." My own position is a matter of opinion that I have not yet put in practice, but I think it ought to be practiced. I would receive them into the church.

"Heaven Membership" Is Quite Good Enough.

One of our strictest brethren has said that such people have 'heaven membership' but we ought not to admit them to 'church membership;'" Anyone having "heaven membership" is good enough for me to associate with in earthly church membership, that the church may be one that the world may be won for Christ.

State and national missionary organizations can encourage trial unions for certain periods, each local church retaining its identity. Thus there could be union for local work while the churches gave to different foreign missions.

But the final test is love. If we love Christ enough; if we love the great Christian brotherhood in the home land enough; if we love the lost world for whom Christ died enough, we will find a way to practice Christian union.

Willing to Pay the Price of Union.

Often when we have a union service and the house is filled with people and the fellowship is delightful, and the singing angelic, I think I would like to preach for a union church all the time. But if the union of churches should cause an "exodus from the ministry" and I should be part of the exodus, I would rather be a doorkeeper—a sexton—in the united church than have my salary trebled as pastor of one of the divisions.

Whittier, the poet-prophet, utters this prayer:

Forgive, Oh Lord, our severing ways,
The separate altars that we raise,
The varying tongues that speak thy praise.
Suffice it now, in time to be,
Shall one great temple rise to Thee,
Thy church our broad humanity.

White flowers of love its walls shall climb,
Sweet bells of peace shall ring its chime,
Its days shall all be holy time.
The hymn long sought shall then be heard,
The music of the world's accord,
Confessing Christ the inward word.

That song shall soar from shore to shore,
One faith, one hope, one love restore,
The seamless garb that Jesus wore.

The Moral Leaders of Israel

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XXXVI. Haggai and the Remant in Judah.

Sept. 10. Text for Special Study. Haggai 2.

I. THE NEW EMPIRE.

It was the confident prediction of the unknown Prophet of Consolation that the release of the Hebrew people from their enforced residence in Babylonia was to be accomplished by the conquest of the Babylonian empire by Cyrus, the "ravenous bird" from the north. In fact the prophet was willing to stake all his claim to be a true messenger of God, and all his affirmations regarding the greatness of God, upon this power of accurate forecast regarding the great political changes that were imminent. Perhaps there were few of the statesmen of Babylon who would have taken such an assertion seriously. It seemed little likely that the power of the empire would be shaken by an adventurer like the Persian soldier. Yet Cyrus went from success to success till even Babylon could not resist his advance.

It was in the year 538 B. C. that the final crisis came. The issue was not fought out in a single battle, nor was the fall of the capital the one event which gave the world a new master. It was only after a series of campaigns that the end came. Nabonidus, the last of the rulers of the Babylonian empire saw his dominions gradually stripped from him, and the fall of Babylon was only the last act in the tragedy. The map of the world was now changed. Babylonia, which had held the reins of power since the fall of Nineveh in 607 B. C. was now to give place to another leader of empire, and the sovereignty of the world, which had hitherto been in Semitic hands, now passed into those of the great Aryan race, to remain.

2. THE DECREE OF CYRUS.

The policy of new ruler differed widely from that of the former masters of the world. Their chief ambition was to crush the nations by the hugh forces of warfare, and to extract from the lands the last profit of spoil and tribute. Cyrus inaugurated a new and revolutionary program of government. In the wide dominions of which he now found himself the chief there were many fragments of nations torn violently from their ancient home and compelled to accept the hard lot of exile. It appeared to this astute ruler a far more effective policy to bind these peoples to himself and his government by permitting them to return to their powers and re-establish, as far as they were able, their ancient institutions. To this end a decree was promulgated soon after he took the throne, granting this privilege to such groups as cared to avail themselves of his good will.

It was the first serious effort in history to unify the divided forces of a great empire. Such an act of clemency gave Cyrus the advantage of striking contrast with the brutal rulers of the past. The peoples who returned to their former homes under the inspiration of the royal decree took the images of their gods, and the generous promise of the king that if further help were needed in the reconstruction of their former civic life he would assist them. Gratitude succeeded hatred, and the foundations of stable and loyal national life were laid.

In the form in which the decree of Cyrus is reproduced in the Old Testament (Ezra 1:1-4) it would appear that the king singled out the Jewish people for his special favor, and issued an edict liberating them and granting them permission to return to Palestine. But two facts are fatal to this view: first the air of keen personal interest in the Jewish faith, which would be inexplicable in a document coming from the king of Persia; and second, the well-known fact that there was no discrimination between the subject nations of the empire, but that it was intended that all alike should benefit from the decree. The form in which the document has survived in the Hebrew sources betrays the zealous nationalist, who was keenly anxious to interpret the act of Cyrus as the token of particular interest in the one people and the religion. There is no evidence in the fairly adequate records of Cyrus' reign that he was even aware that such a people as the Hebrews lived in his dominions. He dealt with all on the same broad basis of tolerance.

3. BEGINNINGS OF RETURN.

It might have been supposed that at the moment when the royal permission was given, the entire Jewish people in the land of exile would rise as one man to return to the fatherland. In fact such has been the popular conception of the matter. In reality, however, nothing could be further from the truth. Ideally it might have seemed a desirable thing, and if the exiles could have been consulted at the moment of their arrival in Babylonia, no doubt they would have taken up with joy the long and weary journey back to Palestine.

But since those days everything had changed. Jerusalem had perished. Only a poor remnant of the population remained in the land where once Solomon and Josiah reigned. The neighboring nations, Moabites, Edomities, Philistines, and Samaritans, had encroached as far as they could upon the territory, and there was little to make the place attractive. Furthermore, a new generation had given up since the fall of Jerusalem. The men who made the long journey to Babylon in the caravans of captives were now dead or too old to think of return. The younger generation had never known Canaan. They were to the manner born in Babylonia, and many of them were living in prosperity. Gradually the inconveniences and sorrows of the exile had passed away, and the east was counted as home.

Why should they go back? It would be an abandonment of all that was desirable for a life of hardship in a region which had nothing to attract them. Only the one motive of fidelity to the purposes of God and the national history could be urged in favor of so unwelcome a task. And such motives appealed to but few of the Jews in the rich lands of the Euphrates. It was only the urgent appeals of the groups of prophets at work among the people that secured even the feeble response recorded. The glowing hopes uttered by the Prophet of Consolation may have been used effectively in securing the small beginnings of return.

That these beginnings were very small is clear from a variety of facts. A small company started from Babylon, under a leader nemed Sheshbazzar, bearing the sacred vessels of the temple. Those who were willing to go were assisted by their brethren who had no mind to make the journey or to leave their Babylonian homes (Ezra 1:5-11). Soon after, Zerubbabel, another representative of the royal line of Judah, led a second company of unknown size. He was accompanied by a priest, Joshua or Jeshua, and on their arrival they rebuilt the altar of burnt offerings on the site of the ruined temple, and soon after held a feast (Ezra 3:1-6). More than a century later a census report, which included all who had come in the various caravans up to that time, both Nehemiah and Ezra, gives a list of some forty-two thousand enrolled Jews in the province Ezra 2, Neb. 7). But the fact that this list includes the companies that came under leaders so widely separated in lines proves conclusively that no one company was of any considerable size.

4. EFFORTS TO REBUILD THE TEMPLE.

In the meantime there was a decided effort among the Jews who had remained in Judah to revive the fortunes of the community. It is probable that the decree of Cyrus, and the arrival of some returning pilgrims with the sacred vessels of the old temple stimulated the resident population to action. They looked for immediate and considerable augmentation of their members and resources from this movement of their brethren.

Their lot had been a hard one. They were the least resourceful of the inhabitants of the land when Jerusalem was destroyed, and for that very reason had been left, as little likely to cause trouble or assert themselves. But they had suffered still further from the aggressions of the peoples about them since they were no longer defended by the fortress of Jerusalem. In numbers they were probably more significant by far than the returning exiles, at least for a considerable period. And that they had leaders who were as capable of courageous and effective action as any who rose in the east is proved by the subject of this and the succeeding section of our studies.

When the first companies of exiles arrived in Jerusalem, wearied with the long journey, and fully disillusionized regarding those brilliant hopes of divine highways and supernatural aid in the great adventure, they built the altar, and kept the feast. But Jerusalem was a ruin, and there seemed little promise of its ever rising from the debris that was piled in heaps on every side.

But at this moment all effort was made by the people living in Judah to take up the work of revival, and in the emergency two prophets rose to lead their people to effective coöperation in the rebuilding of the temple. There were Haggai and Zechariah. They were not of the exiles, but were members of the community which had remained in the land. And it was chiefly to their brethren of his class that they addressed themselves. Repeatedly is it stated in the records of their work that they spoke to the "remnent" of the people, i. e. those who had been left in the land where the exiles departed for Babylon. And probably the total number of ventured pilgrims at the time was inconsiderable in comparison with the people of this local group. But the great work for the movement, as they felt, was to get the temple rebuilt. Walls, public buildings, even homes might well wait for this all-important feature. So these two prophets set to work, and by dint of earnest appeal, secured the beginning of the enterprise (Ezra 5: 1, 2).

5. THE WORK OF HAGGAI.

The two brief chapters of this prophet's book tell the story of his earnest efforts in the years 528 and 519 B. C. He called upon the people to concentrate their efforts upon the execution of the temple. They were living in the region round about, many of them in comfortable homes, yet the house of God was still unbuilt. How could they expect the divine favor? Their harvests were poor, and their prospects meagre for this reason. They must at once bring timber from the mountains, and go forward with the work.

Such words stirred up the people, and even the leaders of the returned exiles, Zerubbabel and Joshua, were moved to action. The work was spasmodic and half-hearted, because the people were discouraged. But some progress was made at least, and that the second temple was built at all was due in large measure to the efforts of these men.

the profoundest realities. He rendered everything subservient to His indwelling capacity for the rule and exhibition of this Divine Spirit. We recognize Him as the Son of God, and we worship Him, because He was able, nay rejoiced, to forego all else, even life itself, for the spiritual presence of the ideal that is the only gain worthy of the name manhood. In short, the complete truth of human life, as it came by Christ is, that men may grow into the divine image, may become one with God, and that, if their existence is to have any permanent justification, they must carry themselves as in face of Him who is Invisible and Immortal.

This manifestation of the internal reality of our being thus reaches us with plangent, overwhelming testimony. Life is hidden with Christ in God, or it is a mockery, the most devilish travestry, and heartless trick that the universe shows. This fundamental truth, as we have it in the Charter of Christianity given by our Lord in the most profound utterances about our common humanity ever spoken, you will find in the 14-17 chapters of St. John's Gospel. You should read them till they have bitten into your memories indelibly. Here is the pivot of it all: "I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one"—and this one is God, the Ideal Being towards Whom we yearn. And Christ Himself, in His spiritual purposes, insists that, having seen this glorious vision of truth, our career here below cannot but be empty or meaningless except as we attempt to build it into our lives. For this reason, our petty day loses its insignificance, and takes on tremendous import, an import guaranteed by His faithfulness even unto death.

Here, then, is the miracle brought to pass by a divining personality out of His own originative fulness. This personality inverted the entire view of life possible to man. He rendered the ideal a patent fact, and made us trustees for that one far-off divine event

To which the whole creation moves,— the restoration of man to his lost wholeness. Serving Himself the prototype of our sole veritable destiny, Christ says continually, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." This is Christianity—the way into the sublime worth of our existence. If any among you doubt, there can be but one reason—you have never tried it.

I beseech you, young men, with the promise of the future upon you, with the destiny of the coming generation committed to your care, Try it. Attempt this idealism! No one who has ever done so seriously, has found it in vain. And we students of older growth, who have tried it, as we have followed many wandering lights in the course of our sinful lives, claim, not only a right, but a duty to tell you the unvarnished truth thus intimately.

An Alarming State of Affairs

By Hilda Richmond.

When the small city was to have a religious meeting of an inter-denominational character, the pastors and some lay members of the various churches undertook to find meals and lodging for delegates among the people who belonged to the churches, apportioning the number of delegates carefully in proportion to the size of the congregation. It seemed an ideal plan, as each church received only a moderate number, but when a thorough and complete effort to place all visitors had been made the committee agreed that they had never known there was so much ill health in their midst, as at the time when the convention was about to be held.

At first the members of the committee retired from the various houses with expressions of polite regret on their lips and apologies for intruding, but by degrees the regret was of a different character, and amusement or disgust took the place of the sincere sorrow of the first few visits. Everywhere they were met politely, but the mistress of the house or whoever answered the bell, unless a maid, had the same expressions. "I am sorry, Mr. B.—" was the conventional form, "but really I cannot undertake it. I have not been well for some time, and it is simply impossible to take on any more burdens. I hope you may be more successful elsewhere and I assure you that if I felt strong enough, I would take several delegates. Good morning!"

Sometimes the ladies varied the set form by saying, "My doctor has forbidden me to do anything extra," or "My husband simply will not allow me to do any sort of work until I am better," but for the most part they blandly took the responsibility themselves. On one street about half a mile long closely crowded with residences, and almost every residence occupied by church members it was found that there were six able-bodied women able to keep two delegates for two nights, while two more ladies said they would take someone though physically unable to do so. One minister said he felt as if he had been making sick calls all day, though in most instances the invalids were up doing their work or else enjoying themselves in various ways.

If the ladies in the churches are all so delicate surely the future of the great work is in grave danger. Invalid mothers cannot bring up healthy children, and upon the children rests the future of each and every church. If women are too delicate to have a stranger or two in their homes forty-eight hours or longer, surely an alarming state of affairs exists in every community where such a condition prevails. And, judging from reports brought home by men and women who have been delegates, and by ministers who are obliged to fill appointments in cities and towns away from home, the inability of ladies in the churches to entertain delegates or visiting ministers is not confined to one little region. Entertainment is provided in boarding houses and hotels in most instances, but as a rule the homes either resemble hospitals or sanitariums, from the reports given out by the families of the church people.

A man whose wife was down in bed with a fever sought among the church people for a place to lodge a visiting minister who was to preach in the vacant church pulpit next day, and though the man was a personal friend of his and one he could highly recommend, he tried just twenty-seven homes before he could find one where the mistress of the house felt well enough, according to their own statements, to receive the uninvited guest. As he listened to the various tales of illness ranging from threatened nervous prostration to incurable heart trouble, the man thanked his lucky stars that his wife had only a common fever and was on the road to recovery.

Since those in authority are investigating everything under the sun a committee ought to be appointed to look into the state of health of the women of churches of all denominations, with a view to finding a remedy for the many diseases now working upon the good ladies of the land, and routing them root and branch, for certainly something should be done to restore health and strength to the feminine portion of every congregation in our land.

From Chicago to Boston by Trolley

Prof. J. E. Baggett, superintendent Lake Forest schools, completed a trolley trip from Chicago to Boston in a little over three days. He traveled 1,512 miles in 78 hours at a cost of $24.59. All but 177 miles was by trolley, this being by rail and boat down the Hudson. He went by way of South Bend, Fort Wayne, Toledo, Cleveland, Rochester, Syracuse, Utica, Schenectady, Albany, New York city, New Haven, Springfield and Worcester. "It was a beautiful trip all the way," he said. "Beautiful scenery all the way, no accidents, weather cool and delightful, rains abundant." The following is a tabulation of the cost, mileage, stops and details of his trip. Waukegan, Lake Forest, Evanston, fare 35 cents; Chicago elevated, fare 15 cents; East Chicago, 10 cents; South Bend, $1.25; Goshen, Warsaw, Peru, $1.85; Wabash, Fort Wayne, Lima, Ohio., $2.10; Toledo, $1.40; Cleveland, $1.75; Plainsville, Ashtabula, $1; Coneaut, 25 cents; Erie, Pa., 60 cents; Fredonia, 70 cents; Lockport, N. Y., (by rail), 45 cents; Gloversville, Amsterdam, 37 cents; Schenectady, Albany, 50 cents; Hudson by way Newburgh, Middleton, West Point, water and railroad to New York city, $3.22; One Hundred and Seventy-seventh street subway, five cents; New Rochelle, 10 cents; Stamford, Ct., 25 cents; Bridgeport, 35 cents; New Haven, 25 cents; Hartford, 45 cents; Springfield, 40 cents; Palmer, Southbridge, Worcester, 80 cents; Boston, 55 cents. Totals, hours 78, miles 1512, fare $24.59.—Springfield Republican.

Presbyterians and Evangelism.

Evangelism holds a prominent place in the plans of all Presbyterian bodies for the coming year. Both the Southern Assembly and the Northern Assembly have a general evangelistic work; and efforts are made to enlist every pastor in the work of promoting personal evangelism on the part of the members of the church, and concerted evangelism on the part of Presbyteries and Synods. Dr. J. Ernest Thacker, the efficient evangelist of the Southern Church, is pushing the work among our own Presbyteries and Synods.—Christian Observer (Southern Presbyterian.)

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Just to Remind You—

That our State Convention begins at Danville, September 4, and continues to the evening of the 7th. Come to be with us clear through it all. We need you and you need the convention with its fine spirit. Stir up the brethren and sisters and give us the largest delegation your church has ever sent.

And to Remind You—

That the Illinois Traction System—electric lines—gives a rate of one and one-third fare for the round trip on the certificate plan. This only applies to tickets that cost more than 50 cents. Ask the nearest agent abopt it. There is no reduction on the steam roads.

To Remind You Deeply—

That we need a dollar from each church for convention expenses and we ask it as urgently as possible. More church each year take pride in sending this dollar gift to pay our speakers and other expenses. We cannot take our missionary money for that purpose. Kindly make it a matter of personal interest to have the dollar sent. Send your check or a dollar bill and be sure to give the name of the church from which it comes. We want to give proper credit. Yours for the biggest convention of all.

J. FRED JONES, Field Secretary.

Evangelist L. D. Hill, of Decatur, Ill., has closed an interesting and profitable meeting at Dalton City.

Two additions are reported the first Sunday in August from Hoopeston, where Henry F. Kelch is pastor.

The pastor of Dixon Church, S. Elwood Fisher, is conducting a meeting for G. W. Woodward at Capron, Oklahoma.

Herrin Church has secured the services of John B. Dickson, of Albany, Missouri. He is already at work with the congregation.

T. A. Lindenmeyer was unable to be in his pulpit for two weeks on account of sickness, but has recovered and is at his accustomed work again.

J. E. Stout assisted J. E. Story in a meeting at Smithboro, in which there were twenty-six additions, ten being on confession of faith.

Bellflower Church will have a meeting beginning in September, to be held by Roy L. Brown and his evangelistic company. The pastor here is L. S. Harrington.

The church at Pleasant Hill is in a revival meeting conducted by W. T. Freeze, with good prospects for additions. Several had been reported at last account.

Charles Reign Scoville lectured at Galesburg, August 7. The pastor there, J. A. Barnett, accompanied a group of physicians to Yates City to deliver an address favoring the establishment of a tuberculosis sanitarium in Knox County.

Polo Church is pastorless. The town has a population of two thousand, the congregation numbers one hundred, and is able to pay a salary of nine hundred dollars. Any interested minister may write to Daniel Wolf, R. F. D. No. 6.

H. D. Williams, pastor of Fourth Church, Danville, has accepted a call to Newton Falls, Ohio. This is a strong church with a splendid building for a progressive work. Mr. Williams will begin there October 1.

Du Quoin Church will be ministered to by Charles E. Smith, lately employed as financial agent of Bethany College. Mr. Smith was educated in Drake University and Bethany College, and comes well equipped for the pastorate of this large church.

Before assuming the superintendency of schools at Ramsey, J. E. Story, assisted by several helpers, is in a meeting to last for three weeks at Stewardson. Mr. Story conducted a meeting at this place one year ago with more than two hundred additions.

J. E. Pritchett, pastor at Metropolis, is holding a short meeting at Joppa, where there is a church of the Disciples pastorless. In the county where these churches are located, there are eight congregations with only one resident pastor.

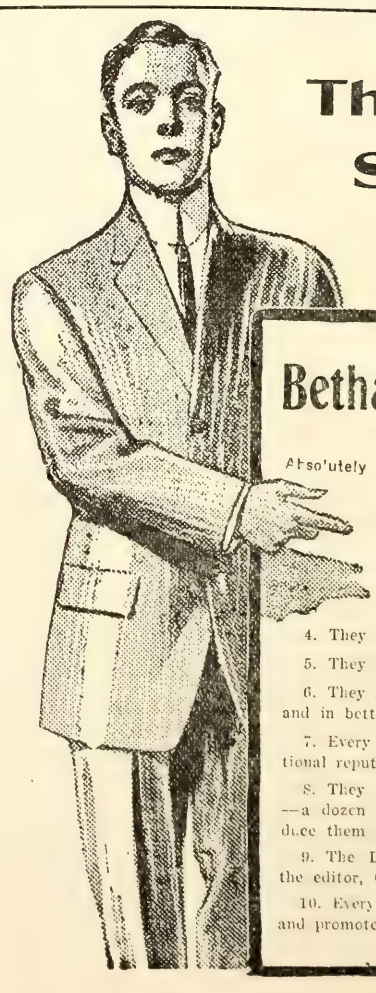
W. S. Mesnard concluded a two weeks' meeting with Buckeye Church, which resulted in twenty additions, fifteen of whom were on confession of faith. The meeting closed earlier than the interest warranted, on account of other engagements. Mr. Mesnard is pastor of this church and will continue in the pastorate for another year.

In a meeting at Brown's schoolhouse, conducted by O. M. Eaton, the latest report showed eighteen additions by confession. There is no church of the Disciples in this region and the evangelist is showing a commendable spirit by refusing to organize a new church in a community which is already over-churched. The converts will be received into churches already established.

Central Church, Peoria, is looking forward to and preparing for a Sunday-school campaign under the direction of Miss Eva Lemert, who succeeded in wonderfully stimulating the school at Champaign. It is the hope of the pastor, W. F. Turner, that a six months' campaign for the Sunday-school will be an appropriate introduction to an evangelistic meeting to be held at its conclusion.

Albert Schwartz, after a successful pastorate lasting through several years at Clinton, has concluded his work there in order that he may become rested from the strain of active pastoral duties. He will, however, be open to engagements for his lecture on the Passion Play, and for Sunday-school institute work, or for an occasional short revival meeting. His address will be Galesburg, R. F. D. No. 3.

The First Church, Bloomington, Edgar DeWitt Jones pastor, has just had placed above the main entrance a handsome electric light. The letters which spell the name of the church are over a foot in height and can be read three blocks away. So far as is known this church is the first in the brotherhood to utilize such a modern method of calling attention to the building and inviting people to come and enjoy the services.



The Wide-awake Superintendent Says

Bethany Graded Lessons are

Absolutely the Greatest Achievement in the History of Sunday-school Literature.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have coöperated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

The Gospel of the Kingdom

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the two years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature,

Beginning Next October

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that have ever been offered to Sunday Schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to see the work start off in the autumn with zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these classes in the study of Social Reform.

Send 5c in stamps for a single copy of the magazine. Do it now and begin at once to talk up the new program for the Fall Quarter! Address,

The New Christian Century Company
700 E. 40th St., Chicago.

Secretary's Letter

A. T. Shaw, of Indiana, formerly of Pontiac, in this state, has accepted a call to Macomb, beginning in September.

Story and Stout closed a meeting at Smithboro with twenty-six additions in two weeks. They are now in a meeting at Stewardson.

J. F. Rosborough, of Centralia, takes the work at Clinton, September 1.

Adam K. Adcock has accepted the work at Carbondale another year.

C. E. Smith, of Bethany, W. Va., goes to Du Quoin September 1.

The church at Mt. Pulaski has called J. Newton Cloe of Eureka and he has accepted.

Joseph Gaylor, of Springfield, Mo., will hold a meeting at Arrowsmith in September. He has other open dates.

It is now too late to get statistical reports in the new Year Book. We called loud, long and often for them ever since June 1, ten weeks ago, and some are still coming. It is remarkable how slow some people are. However, we received 534 reports this year against 511 last year. This breaks all records and we rejoice. Some of our best churches will have a star before their names in the Year Book; that means no report.

Before this is in print our books will be closed for this missionary year. Quite a number are rushing their offerings to us at the last minute and we are glad to get them—hope none will be left out.

State convention is the "common talk" just now. The Danville folks are making great preparations for a large attendance. Newspapers all over the state have been announcing it and publishing the program. We are thankful for their kind interest and willingness to boost. Don't lose the date, Sept. 4-7. Reserve these four days for Danville.

Have you asked your church for the dollar for convention expenses? Don't forget to do so. Send it to our treasurer or take it with you to the convention and hand it to the registration committee and take a receipt.

Our office force is making an extra effort at this time of year to perfect our list of preachers and their addresses for the Year Book. We need to know every change that has been made in recent months, both in addresses and preaching points of our ministers in Illinois. A great many seem to forget that we need this information in the office.

New ministers in the state should report to us at once, so we can get them enrolled in the regular way, for without such enrolment their names will not appear in the Year Book.

J. Fred Jones, Field Secretary.

Church Life

A new church is nearing completion at Frankton, Ind.

F. G. Myrick, pastor at Princeton, Kans., has accepted a call to Oxford, Kans.

J. E. Chamness has resigned the pastorate at Coyle, Okla., to take effect September 1.

Irving E. Wade, who has occupied the pastorate at Grand Junction, Colo., for the past year, has resigned there.

Wm. Sumpter has resigned his pastorate at Cumberland, Iowa, and returned to his former home in Nebraska.

H. C. Holmes has resigned at Redlands, Cal., and will take up the work at Watsonville, Cal., September 1.

Howard E. Jensen of Lawrence, Kans., has closed a meeting at Potter, Kans., with ten additions.

J. A. Longston, for a number of years pastor at Independence, Kans., has begun work in his new field, Davenport, Iowa.

C. A. Park, formerly pastor at Great Falls, Mont., has accepted a call to Austin, Minn., and will begin there September 1.

G. I. Hoover, who was recently offered the chair of Bible history at Christian College, Canton, Mo., has declined and will remain with his church at Tipton, Ind.

J. H. Craig, pastor of Ninth St. Church, Logansport, Ind., who received a call to New Castle, Ind., has declined and will remain in Logansport.

A new church edifice will be erected in the near future at Haigler, Nebr., where Joel Brown and Charles E. McVay held a meeting recently.

William H. Knotts, pastor at Storm Lakes, Iowa, has accepted a call to Highland Park Church, Des Moines, Iowa. Mr. Knotts will succeed J. McD. Horne who has taken the pastorate at Charleston, Ill.

J. P. Rowlison has entered on the third year of his pastorate at Tiffin, Iowa. As an appreciation of the progressive work Mr. Rowlison has done there, he has been voted an increase of salary.

Churches of Grant County (Ind.), held their annual meeting at Swayzee, Ind., August 26-27. Among the speakers were Geo. W. Winfrey, Vernon Stauffer, C. J. Sebastian and J. P. Myers.

Plans are being discussed for the erection of a new church at Coeur D'Alene, Idaho, where Wm. Bedall ministers. It is expected that the building will represent an expenditure of about $15,000.

The fiftieth annual meeting of the Janesville (Wis.) Baptist Association will be held September 5-6 at Union Church, Monroe, Wis., where Cecil J. Armstrong ministers. One of the addresses will be given by C. C. Wilson, pastor of First Church, Milwaukee.

The many friends of Dr. W. T. Moore will take pleasure in knowing that he celebrated his seventy-ninth birthday on August 27, at Eustis, Fla. Although he has been quite ill for several months in the interim of the good days he has been writing another book. He preaches for the church at Eustis, and hopes to have James Small of Kansas City with him in a meeting in November.

The work is progressing nicely at Highland Church, Cleveland, Ohio. B. H. Bruner, pastor. The church has recently been recarpeted and electric lights have been installed. The pastor began his second year with the church the first of May. Since then there have been five additions. The pastor will be in Hiram College again this fall.

Benjamin H. Smith, for five years pastor at Zionsville, Ind., has accepted a call to Payette, Idaho. During Mr. Smith's pastorate at Zionsville, three hundred members have been received into the church, a parsonage has been built and the church remodeled extensively.

Claude J. Miller, who recently accepted the pastorate at Maryville, Mo., is spending a two weeks' vacation at Grundy Center, Iowa. The work is progressing in an encouraging way at Maryville, due to the loyal fellowship of the congregation there. There have been four accessions during the past few weeks. Maryville will entertain the annual meeting of the churches of that district, October 24-26.

There have been seven recent additions to Grand Ave. Church, Minneapolis, Minn., where H. G. Connelly ministers. This congregation gave a farewell reception to Dr. and Mrs. C. L. Pickett shortly before their return to the Philippine Islands. A token of appreciation in the form of a purse was given to Dr. Pickett to go toward the splendid work these missionaries are doing in their field.

F. P. Arthur, the newly appointed city missionary of Detroit, Mich., began his work there August 1. A committee composed of five business man of Central Church will have general direction of the work and Mr. Arthur will open several Sunday-schools in growing sections of the city as rapidly as possible, and proceed to build them into self-supporting churches. He will give each field his personal care.

Good reports come from the church at Atchison, Kan., where Jesse Bader recently became pastor. Ten were added to the membership on August 6, five by baptism and tne Sunday-school had an enrollment of 290. The church is harmonious in every department, with a united membership ready to coöperate in all the work. The splendid new building will be completed by next year, when it is hoped to secure the state convention.

Four years ago the church at Prosser, Wash., had less than twenty members, a debt of $2,600 and was in a discouraging condition generally. The congregation has now grown to a membership of eighty, the debt is reduced to $600 and they are now ready to locate a minister. Lee Furgeson has been preaching for this congregation for some time, while residing on a near-by ranch. The Sunday-school has made excellent progress under his leadership, being the first front rank school in the state, and every missionary cause has been remembered.

The northwest Texas camp meeting came to a close Sunday night, August 13, after sixteen days of services. The meeting this year was held at Crowell, Tex., with Evangelist W. A. Haynes in charge of the preaching and E. C. Tuckerman leading the music. From 1,500 to 3,000 people attended the services. The immediate results were ninety-two additions about seventy of whom were by primary obedience. The church at Crowell labored tirelessly for the success of the meeting and has grown from a weak struggling congregation into a strong church, as a result of this meeting. Our cause has been splendidly placed before the entire community and the church will continue to reap the good therefrom. About $550 was pledged on the next year's expenses and the evangelists recalled for service next year. Knox City secured the meeting. J. E. Chase is pastor at Benjamin.

Indiana Preachers, Attention!

"Every church in Indiana would contribute to State Missions if the preachers would do their duty." This was the remark of a prominent layman to the secretary recently at the close of an address at a county meeting. If this is correct it carries with it a serious charge against a good many of our Indiana preachers. A very large number of our churches have failed to send an offering for home missions this year. Some of these will take the offering in September and will appear in the annual report. The books of the Home Society close September 30. A new fiscal year begins October 1. Will not every preacher who reads this try to enlist one or more of these delinquent churches? A list of the churches that have contributed will be sent you soon. Let us make a final effort to give Indiana a creditable report for the year. We can do it if we will. I believe the responsibility rests very largely with the preacher. Remember the old saying, "Like priest, like people." Remember, too, that we are trying a new policy in this state. We have formed a partnership with the national organization in response to a general demand for a closer co-operation of our missionary societies and the unification of our missionary interests.

Send all offerings to The American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Building, Cincinnati, Ohio. Send an offering before September 30 and make this the best year in the history of the work.

Notes From the Foreign Society

On the 2nd of July, 122 were baptized at Bolenge, Africa. Messrs. Moon, Wilson, Hedges and Hensey all baptized at the same time. The work in Africa was never larger. More evangelists will go out this year than ever before.

Dr. Dye writes that his physician has told him that if there is no new inflammation his eye is safe, but if it should get inflamed again it might be necessary to remove it to save the other eye.

Leslie Wolfe reports twenty baptisms in the Tagalog Provinces in the month. He has received two urgent calls for help recently. One was for an evangelist in an important town near Manila.

Mr. and Mrs. Guy W. Sarvis have sailed for China. Shortly before sailing he was charged with having boasted before the Volunteer Band of Drake University that he had deceived the Executive Committee with evasive answers, when examined by them. The committee fe't that if this charge were true his appointment should be cancelled. Three members of the committee went to Des Moines and thoroughly investigated the charge. Though diligent search was made no one could be found who would affirm that he had heard him say this, or anything like this. Seven volunteers, all who could be reached, declared he made no such statement in their presence. Brother Sarvis himself affirmed that he never so spoke to anyone. The Executive Committee, after a thorough examination of him, being perfectly satisfied with his qualifications, and having full confidence in his integrity, sent him on to China. In doing so it acted in harmony with the suggestion of Charles S. Medbury, who knows Brother Sarvis as well as any man knows him. Brother Medbury wrote, "In God's name hurry him forward. I will trust him and I think I love the cause we stand for as much as any man. The need is so great. Trust the man and send him on." The committee believes with Brother Medbury that Guy W. Sarvis is a true man of God and that he will worthily represent Jesus Christ in China and the brotherhood that supports him.

J. C. Ogden, Batang, announced that he would give $200 outfit money and pay the traveling expenses of H. A. Baker to Tibet. A sister in California, reading this item, sends $200 to take the place of that proposed by Brother Ogden, and says: "The missionaries should not be allowed to make all the sacrifices nor monopolize the joy of giving." Besides this, she sends $100 cash as a direct gift to the general fund—$300 in all.

The commencement exercises of the Girls' School of the F. C. M. S. were held in our Drum Tower Christian Church, Nanking, China, June 27, 1911. There were twelve graduates. Miss Emma A. Lyon is the principal.

Some of the churches propose to send a second offering to the Society before the year closes. They are anxious that the watchword for the year should be realized.

The missionary year will close on the last day of September. All offerings intended to be included in this year's report should be in hand by noon of that day. Individuals who propose to make an offering this year should do so without delay.

Miss Emma Lyon, of Nanking, China, reports the baptism of two women. They appear to be very much in earnest.

J. C. Ogden, of Batang, Tibet, writes that since the land question has been settled all the officials are friendly. Some who were real enemies before have invited him to their homes. He is preaching the gospel and distributing Christian literature.

Dr. Wm. M. Hardy is giving most of his time to the study of the Tibetan and Chinese languages. It is necessary for a missionary at Batang to understand both. He treats four or five each day. He feels that it will be to the advantage of the work for him to get a good working knowledge of the language before beginning the practice of medicine.

Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Baker are making their arrangements to start for Tibet in the near future. They are endeavoring to raise their traveling expenses and their outfit money among their friends and the special friends of Tibet.

The purchasing agent for the mission in Damoh, India is a fine Christian man who spends much time in the market laboring to buy supplies for the orphanage at the lowest possible prices. In his last report he remarked: "The men of the town are asking me who is that poor, bewitched, skin and bone child whom the Masahib is hauling everywhere in his buggy. On being told that he was a poor cripple and an out-cast boy the men in admiration said: 'There are no persons that love like the Christians.'"

S. J. Corey, Secretary.

The Life of Jesus

In Fifty-two Lessons

BY DR. LOA ERMINA SCOTT.

A manual for young peoples and adult classes. It is conceded to be the most practicable text for its purpose on the market.

The book grew in the actual experience of teaching. From the moment it came from the press it has been in great demand. Another edition is now being prepared for.

It is just the thing for classes of young people of high school age. But it is equally well adapted to adults.

Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The graded lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' grade was complete the past year. The Primary grade will be complete for the opening of the new year—October 1. Three of the four years of the Junior grade will be complete October 1. The second year of the Intermediate grade (ready October 1) supplies boys and girls of 15 and 16 years.]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

Every lesson writer is a recognized authority in the Interdenominational Sunday School world!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that coöperation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

A NEW YEAR BEGINS OCTOBER 1

The Sunday-school calendar is made to conform to the public school calendar. While the graded lessons may be begun at any time, there are obvious advantages in starting at the beginning of the new cycle.

Send today for Price List, Order Blank and Prospectus!

If you state which grade you are chiefly interested in, we will send, in addition to prospectuses of the entire series, a teachers' and pupils' text for that particular grade. We do not send a complete outfit as free samples.

Volume XXVIII September 14, 1911 Number 37

Extended One Week

The publishers are receiving so many indications that our readers wish more time in which to prepare their lists of names for our TEN WEEKS FOR TEN CENTS offer that it has been decided to extend the time one week. POSITIVELY ALL NAMES MUST BE IN BY SEPTEMBER 22. It is a great list we have already received. New lists are coming in fast daily now. Hundreds of new subscribers will result from this campaign by our readers. The publishers take this occasion to express their hearty appreciation of the busy people who have taken time to think up a list of their acquaintances and to send them to us with ten cents for each one that they might be made acquainted with The Christian Century. Others who intended to make such lists and have allowed the time to pass by will be glad to have this extension of the opportunity. The two editorial series announced to begin September 21 will also begin a week later. Let every friend of The Christian Century have a part in this propaganda! Make up your list of names now!

Our Readers' Opinions

No Occasion for Surprise

Editors The Christian Century:—The fact that W. H. Thomas, of Fulton, Missouri, is surprised at the doctrines which he attributes to Z. T. Sweeney shows that he knows little of the doctrines and traditions of the Disciples, especially as they were taught forty years ago. To speak after the manner of some of my ancestors the rock upon which the earlier Disciples built their church was water. Their chief text was the "Great Commission" given in Mark 16: 15,16. And they not only "supposed" but emphatically affirmed that the commission there given was "The organic or constitutional law of the new kingdom." And under the letter of this "law" their whole scheme was necessarily legalistic and formal.

To them the New Testament was a sort of "Hardee's Tactics." Especially were the steps to be taken by the sinful recruit, who would become a soldier of the cross, defined by rigid rules. He was forbidden to waste any time in lamenting his sins, or in useless prayers, which he had no right to make, and was told to "obey the commandments." His "conversion" was promptly accomplished in "one time and three motions." God was in the church or the world only through his word, as recorded in the New Testament.

The idea which Mr. Thomas ascribes to Dr. Sweeney that "No person can be a Christian who has not been immersed in water for the remission of sins" is as old as the Disciple movement. It has always been one of their vital beliefs, and is held firmly now by probably seventy-five per cent of the rank and file of the Disciples. (Except in some of our city pulpits and editorial sanctums "the traditions of the elders" are yet very much in evidence.)

Nor should Mr. Sweeney be charged with the "horrible results" of this doctrine. Neither he, nor anyone else who accepts it as of Divine authority, can escape the iron chains of its inexorable logic. For if immersion in water is an essential part of the process of conversion lacking which no one shall be saved then every unimmersed person will inevitably be damned. It is no use to blink that conclusion, though most immersionists do so; even so resolute a stalwart as E. L. Frazier tries to let the unimmersed into Heaven, through some sort of "Sunday entrance," which does credit to his heart, if not to his logic.

To make immersion the only door to the visible church, but not to the spiritual "Kingdom" nor to Heaven, is at once illogical and absurd. For the orthodox immersionist but one position as to the affusionists is possible. It is that they are not Christians, indeed can not be; that there is no promise of salvation for them, not a line nor a word, in the New Testament; that except for some hidden mercy of God they must, to a man, finally "depart with the accursed into everlasting torment." That is the logic of the immersionist doctrine, awful though it be.

But Mr. Sweeney can not rightly be charged with having either invented or discovered "cruel and unusual punishments" for the unimmersed. He only accepts an old and accredited doctrine of his church and follows it to its logical conclusion; not to his own volition, but like Martin Luther at Worms, he could not do otherwise.

Indianapolis, Ind. F. M. WILEY.

[Mr. Wiley's statement is far from a fair interpretation of the Disciples' history. There has been much of the kind of teaching which he describes and there has been a strong tendency in most of our historic teaching in the direction our good brother indicates. But this tendency has been resisted by the greater souls among us and is today effectually inhibited. This movement of resistance to legalism and a mechanical conception is the true key to the Disciples' history.—THE EDITORS.]

Dr. Sweeney Suggests Basis of Agreement

Dear Brother Morrison:—The Century for July 13 containing my letter and your reply reached me a day or two ago very much belated. It seems that we do not understand each other's position. I know you misunderstand mine and I think I must misunderstand yours. A discussion under such circumstances is profitless. It is an established principle of logic—and a correct one—that we should always reason from the incontrovertible to the controvertible.

Let us make up an agreement on certain things that we both hold to be incontrovertible before we discuss controvertible things.

(1.) I agree with you that there is no membership in the Church of Christ without Christian baptism.

(2.) Christian baptism is an act in which the candidate consecrates himself to Jesus Christ and by which he is initiated into the Church of Christ.

(3.) In the time of Christ and his apostles that act was administered—or if you prefer solemnized—exclusively by immersion.

(4.) [The solemnization of] That act has been changed to affusion in many instances.

(5.) No one ever had authority to make the change and no one has that authority today.

(6.) The substitution of affusion for immersion is a human device. [This statement as it stands is, of course, true. Such a statement, however, The Christian Century has not made, and would have no occasion to make in a discussion on baptism because the inference our readers would naturally draw from the phrase "human device" would possibly be misleading.]

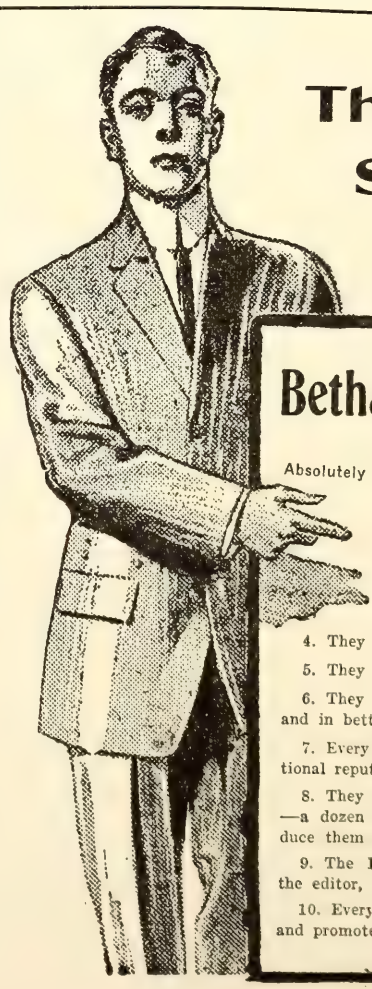
(7.) Baptism to be Christian baptism must contain [instead of the words "must contain" we prefer simply the word "is"] the self-consecration of the candidate and his initiation into the church. It may contain more—I think it does, much more—but we both agree that it must contain that much.

(8.) Christian union can not be entered upon except between parties who are members of Christ's church. [At any rate, the Christian union which Disciples are interested in effecting concerns itself only with those who are members of Christ's church.]

I understand you to hold all the above statements to be true but I have taken the liberty to state them in my own language. I can understand it and I don't always comprehend yours. Now, if I have fairly stated your position, say so; and we have something in common to build upon for I believe them all. If I have not correctly represented you, please show just wherein I have not. Hoping we can get together so I can answer your last reply and show wherein you have misunderstood me I remain, sincerely and fraternally,

Windermere, Ont. Z. T. SWEENEY.

[The words in brackets are inserted by the editors. With the slight modifications they suggest, The Christian Century is, in substance, in accord with Dr. Sweeney's theses.—THE EDITORS.]



The Wide-awake Superintendent Says

Bethany Graded Lessons are

Absolutely the Greatest Achievement in the History of Sunday-school Literature.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have coöperated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

Topics and Teams of Men's Campaign

The Men and Religion Campaign, which begins its conventions in Minneapolis in October, continuing them in Omaha and South Bend in order, announces the suggestions which it makes to men and boys of individual churches, and also as Christian men of cities, for personal and aggressive co-operation. To the men of each church it lays out seven lines, as follows:

1. Getting men into church membership, into organizations within the church, and developing them into workers.

2. Boys, their interest and influence. Providing summer camps and club rooms for them, looking into and after their amusements.

3. Study of the Bible, in Sunday-school and Bible-class where men are to be held, and in the family circle.

4. Evangelism—the conduct of special meetings, house to house visitation, and calls on Brotherhood lines.

5. Special service, including the maintenance, if needed, of an employment bureau, and studies in labor problems.

6. Mission study classes, and training of men for service on mission fields. Work at home and abroad is given equal emphasis.

7. Taking part in Christian work of the city, in co-operation with men from other churches.

The suggestions for general work in the city cover the same as in the individual churches, with proper enlargement of them, and with two new ones added. These are:

1. The use of the daily newspaper to secure Christian publicity, reporting for religious papers, and the publication of a church periodical if needed.

2. A staff of preachers and speakers, ministers and laymen, to go into factories, trolley barns, into tents, and upon the streets.

The plan to be followed by the Campaign itself will be that of speakers sent out in teams, six or seven men in each team. Up to December there will be only two teams, but in January a third one will be added, for service chiefly in the East. These teams cover, in their make-up, the special things to be taught, as Bible, Social Service, Evangelism, Missions and Boys' Work, and a team, concluding an eight-day institute in one city, will go to the next, and so on until about eighty cities will have had conventions.

The Campaign will have, in its teams of evangelists, the Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, the Rev. W. R. Lane, Mr. David Russell who comes all the way from Australia, and the Rev. Dr. C. A. Barbour, who is with the Y. M. C. A. and will be a specal preacher at some of the conventions. The others will give all of their time.

In the teams representing Social Service will be the Rev. Charles Stelzle of the Presbyterian Home Mission Board, the Rev. I. J. Lansing, and Mr. Raymond Robbins, whose conversion while in the Klondyke was widely heralded.

The Bible work will be conducted by Mr. Fred S. Goodman of the Y. M. C. A., Mr. W. C. Pierce, who is furnished by the International Sunday School Association, and Mr. William A. Brown, who is a famous Bible teacher of Canada and comes from Toronto.

On the team to speak for work among boys will be, among others, Mr. J. L. Alexander, formerly with the Boy Scouts. In the shop meetings team speakers will include Mr. C. A. Drum, furnished by the Y. M. C. A., Mr. A. H. Bruner, who has had successful experience in Y. M. C. A. work in Illinois, and Mr. John Dean, who comes from San Jose, Cal.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement will furnish the team members for missionary instruction. The plan is that the Y. M. C. A., the Brotherhoods, the Sunday-school Association, and others taking part in the campaign will lend their men in so far as they have them. The respective organizations loaning their men on this plan will continue their salaries the same as if they were working as formerly. New men drafted into the team will be paid salaries by the Campaign. Everything is on a business basis, support guaranteed without unseemly appeals. Committees in the cities where conventions are held will assist with travel expense, and take care of entertainment of members of the teams.

As has been widely published, the Campaign will reach upwards of one hundred principal centres, chiefly the largest cities, with conventions, and subsidiary conventions will be held in other one hundred smaller cities. Each convention will last eight days, and consist of institute and study work rather than mass meetings. The Campaign is to open in October and continue until May of next year, but plans for permanent work are being perfected. Practical Christian unity is exemplified, since the whole range of Protestant organizations, all bodies, are joining in the Campaign.

Americans in a New Mission Society

The new pastor of Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, the Rev. Dr. John Henry Jowett, particularly invited by the King of England to his coronation, has entered, with the Rev. Dr. Len G. Broughton, the famous Baptist preacher of Atlanta, into a new missionary enterprise of general character. Associated with them are the Rev. Campbell Morgan of London, well known here, and two English laymen, and the name of the new enterprise is the Evangelical Union for South America.

Within the last few years, and along with United States Senator Root's South American enterprise while Secretary of State, there has been in England and here a new idea on the part of Protestants that they must divert some of their foreign mission money from Asia to South America, or better, continue the streams to Asia and raise new money for our sister American continent. The new venture grows out of that spirit, but is unusual in that it represents individuals and not a religious body as such. It is the English rather than the American plan, and will have an American headquarters.

One of the great figures of the missionary world of recent times was the Rev. Dr. H. Grattan Guinness, who died only last year, an English evangelistic enthusiast, who in a single life time was able to accomplish much for foreign missions. His plans were, first, to train men to go out as workers under all societies having schools in London for the purpose, and second, to induce men and women who are especially devoted to foreign missions, to go into parts of the world where nobody has yet ventured. And so he called his society the Regions Beyond Union.

Two of his Union's ventures, both successful in small ways, were into eastern Peru, and into the western and extreme southern parts of the Argentine, almost under the Andes and along the line of disappearing civilization which geographies of thirty years ago called Patagonia. These missions in Peru and the Argentine have now been turned over to the New York Presbyterian and the Atlanta Baptist divines, and their associates, and at Keswick, one of the summer conference centres of England, the other day this new Evangelical Union for South America was formed. While independent, and while also depending much upon the English laymen and the London headquarters, it is stated that the Rev. Dr. Jowett and the Rev. Dr. Broughton will press in future the matter of North America helping South America, especially through Presbyterian and Baptist connections.

—A movement, originating in an informal porch conference at Bethany Park, Ind., is now under way to establish a chair of religious pedagogy at Bethany College in memory of the late Herbert Moninger, whose latter years were given to promoting interest in Sunday-school work among the Disciples. Mr. Moninger was an alumnus of Bethany. It is believed that his host of friends the country over will rejoice to have a part in founding this appropriate memorial. Contributions may be sent to the President of Bethany College, Bethany, W. Va.

Social Survey

In Defense of the Home.

The diversity of marriage and divorce laws in the several states and the abuses which arise because of that diversity form a problem of considerable gravity. From South Carolina to Nevada are represented all the wide range of laws of varying mixtures and laxity; the former with its absolute denial of the divorce institution, the latter with its brazen laws permitting unlimited granting of divorce under trivial provocation. The matter would not be of such serious import, but the scandalous freedom with which certain idle-rich classes trifle with the sacred bonds of marriage at Reno, and in other parts of the country in only lesser degree, is having a deadly effect upon social ideals of the nation. The most sacred social institution will come to be regarded with contempt unless some vigorous means are soon provided to protect it from this foul pollution. Out of this need the National Divorce Congress sprang into existence, having for its object the creation of a national sentiment for uniform laws upon this subject. The problem was carefully worked out by the congress, and a set of laws outlined which, if generally adopted and enforced, would do much toward correcting the peril. Already three states, New Jersey, Delaware and Wisconsin, have adopted laws embodying practically all the principles endorsed by the divorce congress. But this movement is very slow. With a view to hastening it as much as possible the matter was carried to the national legislature, not, however, as a constitutional amendment. A resolution was passed requesting the President to invite each state governor to appoint delegates for another convention in Washington. The object of this gathering was stated to be to formulate a uniform law of marriage and divorce which would be submitted to the President. He, in turn, would submit it, through the governors, to each state legislature. This congress would undertake a thorough investigation, and, if the law recommended by the former divorce congress is found adequate, it is to be endorsed. By this bit of strategy the movement will be given a political standing which it could scarcely gain in any other way. There will be nothing binding in the action of the congress upon the governors. It will furnish them with a basis upon which to work toward social betterment. They should do what lies within their power to secure laws along the lines recommended. If a governor realizes the tentative measure outlined could not be passed in his state, he should use his influence to secure the adoption of at least a portion of the recommendations, notably the jurisdictional clauses. That would mean a long stride toward the coveted goal. We do not believe it wise or necessary for South Carolina to adopt the recommendations. She is leading all her sister states in this respect, and to do so would be a step backward. Nothing would be gained. Her advanced position can in no wise weaken the movement. On the contrary we believe it to be a call to arms, a challenge to other states to advance, an example which they may seek to emulate.

The Franco-German Crisis.

The Franco-German dispute over Morocco has reached a crisis and uneasy heads are anxiously awaiting the outcome. Not the least alarmed of the interested parties is Belgium. Fear that in case hostilities break out the neutrality of her boundaries might be violated has prompted hasty preparations for war in the little kingdom. Munitions of war have been hurried to both the German and French frontiers, and every fortress is being put in condition to repel invasion. Between France and Germany the negotiations are said to be at the breaking point. France has instructed her German ambassador, M. Jules Cambon, noting just what concessions she will make. According to rumor, France proposes the concession of certain lands in central Africa, in return for which she demands the German recognition of her absolute right in Morocco. Germany has made no answer and all Europe is waiting in breathless suspense for her to speak. Her demands were far in excess of the supposed maximum concessions of France. Moreover they were in excess of privileges granted to England, and it would be almost impossible for France to grant them, since to do so would only further complicate the question and make future litigation inevitable. England has sided completely with France, and the weight of her support actuates Germany to be a little more conciliatory. It does not seem probable that war will be precipitated, but the situation is a delicate one, and one that will arise again if not carefully smoothed out now.

Better Mail Service for Country Districts.

Improvements have been invented in the United States mail service which are bound to benefit the suburban districts everywhere. In 1869 the postoffice department first endeavored to serve rural districts where through trains did not stop by throwing off mail sacks, and slowing down the train so that a man on the train might catch a mail sack held out to him by a man on the station platform. Then developed the crane which could take a single sack containing less than twenty-five pounds of mail while the train moved at a high rate of speed. Little further improvement was made for nearly forty years, though the service was so limited as to be unsatisfactory, and thousands of sacks every year, by reason of poor delivery, were drawn under train wheels and ground to shreds. On Aug. 10, 1910, Albert Hupp, at Kansas City, submitted a new device to the government, which will gather any quantity of mail, in any kind of sacks, and of any weight, and at the same time by means of a trip device, will deliver any amount of mail. The mail is gathered by means of a long, curved arm. The sacks are caught from a series of any desired number of cranes placed several feet apart. Sacks are carried into the car by their own momentum, the curve of the steel conductor absorbing the shock and depositing them uninjured upon the floor of the car. The new invention was tried out for several months and received high praise from the officials who have inspected it. It is said to be less dangerous in operation and less destructive of mail and sacks alike, as well as more efficient than the old device. Its general adoption will make possible as good mail service for the country as for the city districts.

Capturing a Will-o-the-Wisp.

Glittering success and the angel of death alike beckon man to attempt ever greater things. But the slip of a hand, or the snapping of a single strained wire, or a treacherous air current and the most cautious birdman may find the success he thought was in his grasp, but the draped figure of death. It is but an ell from immortality to eternity. Three more deaths are recorded in a single day's events in conquering the air, and these while we are yet contemplating in wonder the achievements of other aviators. Is it worth while? We think it is. All great causes are won only after sacrifice. A current magazine devoted to aëronautics recently declared that with ordinary precautions, aviation is now safe. That is over-indulged optimism. The time may come when it is, and we believe that much progress is being made in that direction. But a greater sacrifice is being made prior to that consummation than is necessary. Flights at many of the aviation tournaments have largely devolved into circus "stunts," at which the aviators perform the most reckless antics merely to amuse the spectators. But little good will ever come from them. We believe the tendency is already away from flying of this description. Of the three world's records made in the United States in the past few weeks, two, at least, are of flying of a different kind. The altitude record might be excepted. It is doubtful whether reaching such high altitudes will ever be of much practical value. But the other two records, that of carrying a passenger for the longest sustained flight, and the overland trip from St. Louis to New York made by Harry Atwood, are of real value as stimulating further endeavor in a field in which the aëroplane promises to become of greatest value in the future. Flights of the character in which these records were made are said to have the additional recommendation that they involve as little risk as any form of flight. If a little sanity can be introduced into the great tournaments, not only will there be fewer accidents, but commercial use will be hastened by more rapid development, due to concentration of effort, and by the instillation of greater public confidence. The fact that the recent aviation exhibition in Chicago resulted in a loss to its sponsors amounting, it is asserted, to $100,000, will be apt to discourage other similar affairs with their accompanying tendency to "show off."

Make Ours Different. An old darkey wanted to join a fashionable city church, and the minister, not wanting to hurt his feelings, told him to go home and pray over it. In a few days the darkey came back. "Well, what do you think of it by this time?" asked the preacher. "Well, sah," replied the colored man. "Ah prayed an' prayed, an' de good Lawd he says to me, 'Rastus, Ah wouldn't bodder mah haid about dat no mo'. Ah've been trying to get into dat cha'ch mase'f fo' de las' twenty yeahs and Ah done had no luck."—National Monthly.

American Bible Society.

The American Bible Society finds fields for its Bibles not alone in Asia and South America, but last year it prosecuted a considerable work along the line of the large canal now building across New York State, and in the $100,000,000 works under construction in the Catskills to supply New York city with water. Even Coney Island was entered, and with some success in the sale of Bibles.

On the large canal there are at work Greeks as well as Italians. A Greek colporter has been at work among his fellow-countrymen, and has had the good fortune to wake up ministers of regular churches in central New York cities to the fact that foreign missions have arrived at their doors. In consequence Syracuse, Utica, Rochester and Buffalo churches have entered upon work for Greeks, Bohemians, Scandinavians, Italians, and others.

Throughout Long Island religious destitution and Bible need have been generally found. Even in Brooklyn, a city of churches, the Society's agent discovered a great lack of Bibles and succeeded in placing Bohemian, Scandinavian and Italian colporters in the field both to reach laborers of their nationalities and to stir up the churches to the needs at their doors. The agent reports that the ministers knew, in most cases, of the needs but lacked workers to supply them.

The Power of Friendliness.

One of America's most highly honored ministers writes in his old age that he has come to think of religion as friendship. God is the friend of man and it is man's wisdom to rely upon God's friendship. The religious man is a friend to all other men. The Young Men's Christian Associations are expressing the religion of friendship according to the needs of men. America's industrial growth is forcing the "overall man" upon the attention of the Associations. The men in mining and lumber camps, the immigrant, the man out of a job, and many other sorts and conditions of men are finding in the Association workers the friends they need. Writing in Association Men, Chas. R. Towson says the mission of the Association is friendliness, and he gives this warning to any who may be inclined to trust in buildings and machinery:

> Its impulse comes from friendship with Jesus—its true manifestation is friendliness with men. The Association that expresses itself in anything less fails. In this day of much method and more machinery let us remember this human objective. An Association may be galvanized into keeping up a routine of events or traditional activities—and be dead.
> Here is a letter from one who signs himself "an overall man"—biased and possibly unfair—but suggesting the danger of failing in friendliness: "I suppose you don't care what I say. I know you don't care to shake hands with me because I am a common man in overalls with no education. You will call me a knocker, as Doctor Stone does in the July Association Men. Nevertheless what I say is from experience. There are a few secretaries that are good men and are doing good. I will tell you what I saw one of them do; nobody knew I saw it: A drunken man stumbled into the Young Men's Christian Association. Several secretaries were there. He boned them for money. They all laughed at him but one fellow. After a while he said to the drunken man, 'Say, pard, come outside, I want to talk to you.' They went to a kind of dark corner of the building and it was not long before they both went down on their knees. I heard him say, 'If you keep sober for a week I will pay for a week's room rent and get you a job if I possibly can.' To my knowledge that drunken man to this day has not had a drop of whiskey—that was four years ago. When an overall man goes into the Association where that secretary is he always feels at home.
> "But most of them are not that way—they are like the secretaries in a big Young Men's Christian Association where I once went when I was broke and needed something to eat as well as a good bath; there was a big sign made like a hand pointing to the door, on which it said in big letters, 'Welcome Strangers.' I walked in. Was there anybody to welcome me? Well, I should say not. I asked a few questions. They barely answered. I walked out just as dirty and hungry as when I went in.
> "You are getting a bunch of men as secretaries that never did a day's work in their lives, and consequently have no sympathy with the man who works hard. The overall man may sit in their lobbies and reading rooms, and no one will come near and say a kind word and shake hands with him, but here comes a preacher or some business man or young fellow with a swell suit, and if they are doing something they drop their work, meet them at the door, shake hands with them, joke and have lots of fun.
> "I don't expect you to print this, but tell it to some one and make things better for the common man if you can."

This friendliness, born of the spirit of Christ, will distribute wealth fairly, prevent two-thirds of the accidents and of occupational diseases, insure a fair day's work for a fair day's pay, open to women and children the doors to better home life, establish the best insurance, relief and pension plans, and end the bitterness and cruelties of strikes and lockouts, industrial dynamiting and wars. On the function of the Association Mr. Towson says:

> The Association Movement in the industrial world is an engineering enterprise—like the great irrigation projects of the West—connecting with the streams of individual and organized industrial influences and transfusing this power through channels of friendliness so as to make fruitful many hitherto barren fields. The challenge to the Association movement is to furnish leaders: experts in knowledge of the needs of men and sources of supply; masters in discovering and directing energy: engineers who can tap the great industrial sources and harness the released power to the machinery of the Kingdom by the genius of Friendliness.

Catholic.

The Root of the Divorce Evil.

The indignation of Protestant ministers and editors over the approaching marriage of a divorced man of wealth moves some Roman Catholics to say that easy divorce and indifference to the sanctity of the marriage vow are the logical outcome of the Protestant theory. The well-informed Protestant is not likely to be convinced of the correctness of the Catholic contention; it will profit him, however, to know what can be said against his own view. We take the following from the Catholic World:

> The press of the country for the past month has been filled with the details of a marriage, the very mention of which disgusts every clean-hearted man and woman. Wealth, social position and a previous scandalous divorce have contributed to give it a widespread notoriety.
> The fact that a divorced man, prohibited by the law of one state to enter wedlock, is to marry again and have his marriage sanctioned by the very state that prohibited it, and is to marry a young girl of seemingly respectable parents, is certainly nothing new in this country. The frequency of divorce and remarriage has made our land the laughing-stock of the world. Such an occurrence—the word well signifies the little importance attached by some to marriage and divorce—is quite common not only among the rich, but also among those not ever-blessed with this world's goods.
> To those who have eyes to see, divorce is an evil that is doing more than all else to undermine our life as a strong, patriotic people. For decades has it cursed our land like a plague and its infection is year by year, with ever more disastrous results, spreading further and further. The reason of such loose morality is the general belief that marriage is simply an institution of the state; that it should be regulated only by civil law. The non-Catholic press of this country, and in fact of the whole world, savagely attacked the latest legislation of Pius X. on the subject of marriage, claiming that it was another instance of how the Catholic Church seeks to tyrannize over the state, and to rob the state of its just rights.
> Marriage, this non-Catholic press maintained, can be regulated by the state and the state alone. The law of the state is supreme in this matter and there is no other law. Of course, this robs the vows of husband and wife of all sanctity and subjects them to the caprice of human, very human, legislators. The legislature might tomorrow declare that all marriages contracted up to date were invalid; disrupt every family and throw into chaos the whole social body. Under stress of anger or hatred or jealousy or lust or any other passion a man will readily argue that no merely human dictate of fallible legislators can bind him for life, and will just as readily act upon his conclusion.
> If nothing were needed to show the unworthy and oftentimes corrupt influence that govern our legislators, the daily and monthly press of the country for the last five years has supplied testimony more than sufficient. And many of the American people seem to have concluded that such unworthy influences will continue to be effective, for they are preparing to arm themselves with the referendum and recall. To call marriage holy and plighted vows sacred and then entrust them into the hands of legislators is like storing great treasures in a pasteboard box.
> Yet this is exactly what Protestantism has done from the very beginning. It denied marriage to be a sacrament. Christ did not elevate the vows of husband and wife to a supernatural dignity beyond the reach of man. Marriage is a purely human institution. Protestantism has become so saturated with Erastianism that it accepts the state as sole and final arbiter in every question relating to marriage and divorce.
> It is idle to say that thousands of individual Protestants would enter a disclaimer to this; that many clergymen and bishops of Protestant churches cry aloud against the abuses that are daily increasing because of the teaching that marriage has no essentially religious character. The Protestant churches have sanctioned divorce; their ministers have re-married divorcees; they have officially preached that marriage is entirely under the control of the state.

The Sin of the Unforgiving Disposition

"I never forgive," said a self-confident man to a distinguished preacher. "Then I hope you never sin," was the reply. The man of the unforgiving disposition asks for himself a special privilege, for he expects and demands that others forgive him. He may deny that he needs forgiveness or that he will accept it when he wrongs his brother, but his denial does not change the facts. He would cry out in wrath against God and man if he were to receive the treatment he is so willing to mete out to other men.

There is so much to do in this world and our time and energy are so limited that we cannot afford to turn away from the work of the day to hate any man. The more zealous we are for our work the less likely are we to remember with bitterness the injuries we have received. The feuds of the Southern mountains will disappear when the mountaineers have something else to fill their minds besides the gossip of a small community. The feudists have time to nurse their wrath. They magnify little things because they have never seen the big things of life.

We wrong ourselves by withholding forgiveness. It is our right to enjoy peace of mind. This is far from us while we refuse to share in the regeneration of an evil-doer. Ignorant men think revenge is sweet. They imagine that their importance in the world depends upon the defeat and disgrace of their enemies. Our Lord and Master thought otherwise. He sought to win his enemies to right ways of living. His triumph was not in the ruin of men's hopes but in the transformation of their lives. He rejoiced in the salvation of sinners, not in their punishment. By retaining our anger and bitterness, we rob ourselves of the highest joy.

We are unjust to others when we harden our hearts against them and decline to give them our sympathy in their efforts to gain self-control and efficiency. One way to keep men in sin is to let them know that we hold in memory all the unkind words they speak and all their evil deeds and that we have no knowledge of the strength of their temptations and no understanding of their desire for spiritual growth. If the kindness of God is not seen in the conduct of men, it is not available for us in renewing the souls of the wicked. We profess to be Christians. We have no right to act so as to give the impression that God is not gracious and full of compassion.

The emphasis is placed where it does not belong when there is no disposition to forgive. The other day a man preached a sermon which left upon his hearers the impression that he had unbounded confidence in the ability of the devil to run the universe, but that he was very doubtful of the power of God. In the judgment of this preacher sin abounds and super-abounds; it seems to be a question whether grace is of any consequence. This sort of preaching is worse than useless. The preacher helps men by convincing them that it is worth while to make a fight for righteousness and by giving them a vision of the greatness of the opportunities before the man of faith. We put the emphasis upon the evil and ignore the good when we refuse to forgive. We reject faith in Christ.

Where there is forgiveness there is love. There may be love where there is no forgiveness. We are told that the sinner must repent that he may be forgiven. God loves his children even while they are in sin. Every fact of Christianity testifies to this love. The father loves his wayward boy. God seeks to save the lost. He calls sinners to repentance. He discloses his love that all may know he will forgive. The good father tries to win his boy to sobriety and honesty. But God does not pronounce a man right until he is right. He admits to his fellowship those who have a mind to do his will. It is not a question of what they have been, but of what they intend to be. The father does not say the conduct of his boy is right until it is right. When the boy turns about and shows a disposition to quit his meanness, the father gives his approval to the main purpose of the boy's life, whereas before he had been compelled to withhold it. By forgiveness we admit men to moral and spiritual fellowship. We need the cooperation of all men in the fight for truth and holiness. We cannot cast out of the company of the workers any one whose purposes are approved of God. We must allow every man to take the place for which he is fitted. If a man has sinned, we ought to encourage him to do all he can to make amends for the injury he has done to himself and others.

A Disappointing Response

Some months ago The Christian Century called attention to the habit of equivocal, timid and non-committal speech used by Disciple writers in speaking of the Christian status of their religious neighbors. These writers are unaccustomed to make the outright admission that Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Methodists are Christians, members of the Church of Christ. They are spoken of in euphemistic terms as "believers," or "our religious neighbors," or "the pious unimmersed," or "members of the denominations." Of if they are called Christians, our writers feel that they must add the words "in a sense" or "as it were," or otherwise qualify the Christian title by calling attention to their "imperfect obedience."

Just prior to the appearance of our editorial one of the most disgraceful sentences ever appearing in our literature was published in the Christian Standard, when that paper characterized the converts to Christianity made on the mission field by Methodist and Presbyterian missionaries as "unbaptized heathen enrolled by denominational missionaries."

We felt that this misrepresentation of the temper and belief of the Disciples called for a positive and ringing utterance by our papers and ministers which would set us right with our Christian brethren who would, no doubt, be shocked by the Standard's statement.

Meanwhile the Christian Evangelist was engaged in a criticism of the Christian Century for its advocacy of the practice of Christian union. Certain editorials whose authorship we could not impute to Dr. Garrison were appearing in our St. Louis contemporary purporting to deal with the position of this paper. These editorials seemed to us to entirely evade the essential issue. The Christian Century had stated its position in the clearest language it could command, namely, that Presbyterians, Congregationalists and the others are Christians, members of the Church of Christ, baptized members of the Church of Christ, and as such should be received into the fellowship of any Church of Christ to which they apply.

In view of the hesitant and shifting treatment of this point so basic and essential in our plea for union, we carried the case from lesser editorial writers on the Christian Evangelist to Dr. Garrison himself, asking him to join us in making such a clean-cut statement of the true attitude of the Disciples toward other Christians and their churches as would lift us in their eyes far above the sectarian level upon which such statements as that of the Standard above quoted would reduce us. Our appeal to Dr. Garrison at the close of a lengthy editorial was in the following words:

"Why cannot we have from The Christian Evangelist a great ringing, unqualified, unequivocal statement that Presbyterians and Methodists and Congregationalists are Christians, members of the Church of Christ, baptized members of the Church of Christ, and that the congregations to which they belong are churches of Christ just as truly as our own.

"Cannot Dr. J. H. Garrison, long time pleader for Christian union, himself the embodiment of the fraternal spirit, lover of all Christian souls and causes, champion among his brethren of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, which includes Presbyterian and Congregational churches on the same level of Christian status with Disciple and Baptist churches,—cannot Dr. Garrison take the editorial pen from the timid, finessing hand that wrote the above paragraph and fling out such a statement as has never yet appeared in our literature; a statement wholly in the declarative mood, without indirection, without any reservation or ambiguity, without the usual qualification on account of "imperfect obedience" (a qualification which must, of course, be taken for granted not in their case only but in ours as well); a statement that will commit him and the paper he founded and the great majority if not all of his brethren plainly to the basic presupposition of our plea for unity which is that those to whom the plea is made are just as truly Christians as are we ourselves?

"This Dr. Garrison, would be a crowning word for your great editorial career. This word would be emblazoned on our banners after you are gone. It would abide in the world longer than any word you have spoken in your more than forty years of public utterance. It is the most potent asseveration yet left for you to make. God give you grace to make it!"

In the Christian Evangelist of last week appears an editorial presumably in response to this appeal. We assume that it was written by Dr. Garrison. It will prove a disappointment to a multutude of discerning readers who are listening for a statement in ringing language, positive and decisive, and easily understood.

The editorial begins by reviving a distinction which has always been discredited among the Disciples as irrelevant and misleading—the distinction of an invisible and visible church. Dr. Garrison says: "If we fail to make the distinction between the church actual and visible as we see it today, and the church ideal and spiritual as Christ sees it and knows it, we will land ourselves in confusion and contradiction." He then proceeds as follows:

What is called "the church" in its largest sense today, including both the Roman Catholic and Protestant bodies, consists of many members, whose baptism, while perverted in form, has no connection whatever with any personal faith on the part of the baptized. They are enrolled as members of the church. Many of them have developed lives of piety and devotion to Christ. Other members are baptized in a more scriptural way on profession of their faith in Jesus Christ. Those who practice what we regard as a defective baptism, have done so in the name of Christ, and believed that they were carrying out his will. Are they, and the members whom they thus baptize, members of Christ's church, even those who manifest the Spirit of Christ in their lives and character?

This is a plain statement of the question and encourages us to hope for a clean-cut answer. The answer comes, however, in the form of another question, namely, "Whether Christ can have a faulty church—a church that is in grave error on many points." This question is answered affirmatively: "In actual fact He can have no other and has had no other since the beginning of His reign."

With a faulty church conceded, the article proceeds to define the place and purpose of the Disciples of Christ who, it says, found their origin a century ago "in a movement to restore the unity of the church through a return to its original basis and fellowship." The editorial continues (the italics are ours):

It is out of this condition of things that there have been raised such questions as "Who is a church member?" and "Ought we not to recognize as members in these churches of the reformation, those who hold membership in any other church, regardless of their conformity to what we are seeking to establish—the New Testament conditions of membership?" It is not necessary for us to determine the question whether such persons are members, in any sense, of Christ's church, or whether their imperfect obedience has been accepted by the Head of the church—questions which lie beyond our knowledge, and which we are not called upon to solve. It is enough for us to ask, Is this reformation which we are seeking to carry on worth while? And if so, Can we be true to its principles and accomplish the purpose for which it was inaugurated, by recognizing any other standard of membership than that which we are seeking to enforce as the essential condition of Christian union? If we could dismiss from our minds such questions as "Will God save this or that class of persons?" or "Does he recognize as members of Christ's church this or that class of people?" and confine ourselves to the single inquiry as to what Christ requires of us, we should hasten far more rapidly the work to which we have been called, and promote to a much greater degree the glory of Christ and his church.

This is a surprising piece of writing. Coming, if it did, from Dr. Garrison, our surprise is intensified. Is this the best word our revered brother and leader can speak in response to the earnest appeal we addressed to him?

We are sure Dr. Garrison's hesitant words do not represent the great brotherhood to which he and we belong. At the risk of impertinence we must say that we do not believe his words represent his own true mind.

We do not believe Dr. Garrison has the slightest doubt that Methodists and Presbyterians are members of the Church of Christ, not simply "in a sense" but in the truest sense. To say that the question "whether their imperfect obedience has been accepted by the Head of the church" is one of those "questions which lie beyond our knowledge" is to embarrass our entire brotherhood in its plea for unity.

The Disciples of Christ are just as certain that the "imperfect obedience" of Presbyterians and Methodists is accepted by the Head of the church as that their own imperfect obedience has been accepted.

Instead of its not being necessary "for us to determine whether such persons are, in any sense, members of Christ's church" the Disciples' movement has been inspired from the beginning by the burning knowledge that they are members of Christ's church and in the fullest sense. Our plea is a mockery without this knowledge. At the risk of being impertinent again we must say that we believe Dr. Garrison himself knows that they are members of Christ's church.

Our pleadings for Christian unity will awaken nothing but indignant resentment by the Christian world if we hold to the position taken by the Christian Standard in characterizing unimmersed Christians on the foreign field as "unbaptized heathen enrolled by denominational missionaries." Those words insult our brethren and grieve our Lord.

And no less abortive will be our pleadings for unity if when we are asked concerning the Christian character and status of Presbyterians and Methodists our words, like those of the Christian Evangelist, choke in our throat.

The question whether Presbyterians and Methodists are accepted by the Head of the Church must be a matter of knowledge by a people commissioned with a plea for unity. Our answer must be sharp, clear, definitive. Our tone of voice should disclose a wound in our heart that such a question should need to be asked at all.

It is not possible to "dismiss from our minds" such questions as these upon which Dr. Garrison has written this editorial. Upon our answer to these questions depends our practical relationships, our fellowship in the church, the extent and character of our practice of Christian unity.

Even if we confine ourselves, as Dr. Garrison admonishes us, to "the single inquiry as to what Christ requires of us" we are led directly up to this problem of the membership of Christ's church. For there is no more fundamental requirement of Christ than that we should recognize as members of His church those whom He has received into it, and treat them as fellow disciples in a unity like that between Himself and the Father.

This requirement of Christ is just as fundamental and imperative as is that to preach the gospel to sinners and to baptize them.

We cannot believe that Dr. Garrison will lay down his editorial pen without uttering those convictions of his own soul that lie far deeper than those he has expressed in this article whose publication is bound to prove disappointing to a multitude of his brethren.

A Call To Baptists

As president of the Baptist World Alliance, the Rev. Dr. R. S. MacArthur appeals to Baptists of the United States and Canada to make the week beginning September 10 a time of prayer in their churches and families "that God may open the heart of the Czar of Russia to permit the founding of a Baptist College in St. Petersburg, to grant larger liberty to Jews, and to manifest a spirit of justice and clemency to the Rev. William Fetler," the Baptist delegate to the late Baptist Alliance who must soon return to Moscow to stand trial for preaching the Gospel in that city under Baptist auspices.

President MacArthur appeals also in behalf of Rev. Norbert Capek, a Moravian, and states that Baptist interests in that land are in the midst of a crisis. In behalf of both he asks Baptists to give money on Sunday, September 17, in the case of Pastor Fetler to complete a Baptist Prayer House in St. Petersburg, now partly built but stopped by lack of funds. It is pointed out in the appeal that Pastor Fetler must return to Moscow, for a Baptist must keep his word, but that if St. Petersburg be assisted by American Baptists they can, in turn, help to build a Baptist Prayer House in Moscow, for Pastor Fetler proposes, whether convicted and perhaps banished to Siberia or not, to press the plan of Baptist work in the historic capitol of the Czar's empire.

Toward the Baptist College in St. Petersburg, which President MacArthur hopes the Czar may favor, American Baptists have contributed $70,000. The purpose is to found a college for the training of Baptist ministers.

Early Religious Beginnings in Illinois

BY RUSSELL F. THRAPP.

EDITORS' NOTE: The Illinois Convention program committee undertook this year to project the sessions on a higher level of thought than state conventions have usually assumed. The pragmatic details of church work and organization were attended to with dispatch, and there seemed to be a more leisurely and thoughtful consideration of the greater problems. Politics and wire-pulling were conspicuously absent. Again and again the speakers led the convention to the heights of visions. One of the most interesting sessions was that of Wednesday morning when three speakers undertook to relate our work as Disciples of Christ to the actual conditions and existing forces of the commonwealth of Illinois. The first of these addresses, that by Mr. Thrapp, was especially interesting. His address showed that he had put industry into the preparation of an address on a theme in which materials are scant. Delivered in the Jacksonville pastor's vigorous, reserved and clean-cut style, it was one of the most fascinating addresses of the convention. One of its tangible results was the passing of a resolution to authorize a competent authority to prepare a history of the Disciples in this state.

To write the history of any state that has made an impression for good upon the world is to recount the deeds of the moral leaders who were its first settlers. If we go backward through the centuries, where shall we find a great commonwealth that was not founded by a moral leader? Abraham, the founder of the Hebrew commonwealth, a moral leader; Moses, accomplishing the redemption of Israel and establishing the theocracy in the Promised Land, a moral leader. The Greek cities trace their beginnings back to men who stand for wisdom and morals; Martin Luther stands back of modern Germany; religious teachers back of Holland; back of the Pilgrim Fathers we behold the form of the preacher, John Robinson. In the settlement of the great West, a minister led the first group of pilgrims across the Alleghanies. The history of Iowa, Illinois and other western states is one story. Twenty-five home missionaries led twenty-five different hands of colonists out of New England, to settle these middle states. They were men who believed in God, in Jesus and in the Bible. Like Abram of old, they were led by the unseen hand out from the eastern land into a new, to establish a great country with institutions that would bless the world.

Puritan Source of Present Commonwealth.

Then New England grew great men. Great in soul and heart, university men and at the same time religious to the center. When in the isolation of New England they had developed their message and were ready as evangels to the great west, then in 1789 the barriers went down, and our fathers on foot and horseback started for the Mississippi Valley. It was a strange procession that formed that morning in front of the church at Ipswich, Mass. It was led by Manasseh Cutler. Men in hunter's garb, boys carrying their guns, woodsmen with axes, packhorses heavily laden—all these made up a strange procession when they marched away. Some of them came to Illinois and founded Illinois College, Knox and Lake Forest and Shurtleff Coleges. Some went to Iowa and founded Iowa College, Tabor and two academies. Groups of theological students banded themselves together. They determined to take the West for higher education. These were picked men, the finest scholars of their era. They were statesmen. Witness the fight that they and their sons made for liberty. The Christian home, the Christian Church, the Christian College and the free school were the instruments they fitted for the development of manhood. On their way to this new state one day they paused on the summit of the Alleghanies, and the leader placed his hand to his ear and stood in the attitude of an eager listener. "What do you hear?" whispered one of his companions, fearing an ambush of Indians. Uncovering his head, the leader answered, "I hear the tramp of coming millions." On this procession came and founded here the institutions we love.

French Catholic Pioneers.

And now passing back beyond the coming of Puritan influences to Illinois, we will notice briefly the work of missionaries of the Roman Catholic faith. With the French there came to Illinois Jesuit and Recollect priests, whose names are familiar to all who have read the history of our state. They moved along together, the explorer and voyager giving protection to the missionary, and the latter in return aiding them to conciliate and make friends with the natives. Of the missionaries connected with Illinois, Fathers Marquette, Allovez, Gravier, Pasle, Marest were Jesuits; Fathers Membre, Douay, and Hennepin belonged to the Recollects. These two sects were at war with each other, which very much hindered the spread of Catholicism. To the Recollect Monks of St. Francis was first assigned the care of the missions, but subsequently Cardinal Richelieu superseded this order and confided the spiritual welfare of the people to the priests of the Society of Jesus, the disciples of Loyola. The former felt very keenly their exclusion from the field and left no means untried to regain their supremacy.

Father Marquette and the "Illini."

Father Marquette was a native of Laon, France, born in 1637. He was the first in the company of Joliet to make a journey down the Mississippi coming first in contact with the Indians, a tribe named the "Illini," meaning "the Men." This was in 1674. Down the Misisippi these intrepid men floated in a frail canoe as far as the mouth of the Arkansas River; and then after four weeks on the unknown river, forced their way against the swift current, toiling by day under a July sun and sleeping by night amid mosquitoes and the deadly vapors of stagnant marshes, on and up until several weeks of hard labor brought them to the mouth of the Illinois. Here they were informed by the Indians that this stream furnished a near route back to Wisconsin. Acting upon this information, they entered the river. Their journals tell in picturesque language the beauty of the country they passed through. They tell of prairies spread out before them beyond the reach of vision, covered with tall grass and undulating like waves of a sea. The surface was studded with clumps of timber. Flowers, surpassing in the delicacy of their tints the pampered products of civilization, were profusely sprinkled over the grassy landscape. Immense herds of buffalo and deer grazed on their rich pactures. The river as now, swarmed with fish, great quantities of wild fruit grew in the forest and prairies and so numerous were the birds and waterfowl that the heavens were frequently obscured by their flight. These explorers spoke of the land as a terrestrial paradise, in which earth, air and water, unbidden by labor, contributed the most copious supplies..

Founding of Kaskaskia.

Passing far up the river, they stopped at a town of the Illinois, called Kaskaskia, whose name, afterwards transferred to a different locality, has become famous in the history of the country. They proceeded further to Lake Michigan by way of the rivers Illinois, Desplaines and Chicago. Following the western shore of the lake, they entered Green Bay the latter part of September, having been absent about four months and traveling a distance of 2,500 miles.

Joliet hastened on to Quebec to report his discoveries, while Marquette remained to repair his shattered health, and the following year established a mission on the plain between Illinois River and the present town of Utica. Here he preached to some 500 chiefs and a great concourse of warriors, women and children. He spoke to them with great earnestness on the duties of Christianity and the necessity of making their conduct conform to its teachings; the audience was deeply impressed with the sermon, and eagerly besought him to remain with them, a request which his fast wearing strength rendered it impossible to grant.

Death of Marquette.

On his return home he passed to his reward. His companions buried his body on the shore of Lake Michigan. Three years afterward, a party of Ottawas, opened the grave and carried his bones to Mackinaw, where they lie buried under the floor of a rude chapel. The piety, energy, and self-denial of this noble man gives him a high place in the affections of religious people. He is a type of a multitude of Roman Catholic Missionaries the world over, who have shown great zeal and heroism in the propagation of their faith. Whatever may be said in disparagement of their methods, it must be admitted that the world today is better because of their existence and work.

More than 100 years before we have any account of any Protestant minister within the bounds of the territory of Illinois, Marquette, LaSalle, Joliet and Hennepin traversed the long distance from the Atlantic communities through the unbroken wilderness to minister to the scattered French settlements and Indians. As early as 1673 they established missions at Kaskaskia, Cahokia and Peoria, and other points on the Mississippi.

Father Claude Jean Allonez arrived at the Kaskaskia village of the Illinois on April 27, 1677. Here he erected a cross twenty-five feet high, and preached to eight tribes there congregated. He made frequent visits to this mission until 1687, when he returned to Wisconsin, dying in 1690.

The Peoria Station was established by Father Gravier.

With the coming of English control the French priests gradually withdrew from Illinois territory and few results of their labors remained. But for the victory of Wolfe on the heights of Quebec in 1759, our country would have been French Catholic instead of English Protestant. The question of dominant religion of Illinois and the whole of America was settled of God and English bullets in this famous battle. The rule of Louis XIV, meant the rule of Despotism. The English gave us the Puritan foundation in Illinois upon which is built our cherished institutions.

First Protestant Minister a Baptist.

The first Protestant minister to enter Illinois was James Smith, a Baptist. He came from Kentucky in 1787 and in fellowship with David Badgley and Joseph Chance, Baptist ministers, formed the first Protestant Church at New Design; the first association of five churches, four ministers, with 111 members, was formed in 1807. A division growing out of the slavery question, occurred in these churches in 1809. Other causes of difference resulted in the formation of three parties of Baptists, which existed for ten years and two of them much longer. The most numerous branch of the church is denominated the Regular and Missionary Baptists. Of this church, John M. Peck was the great missionary and organizer in Illinois from 1822 until his death in 1858. Worthy successors in central Illinois were Justus Buckley, D. Read, Washington Leverett, Alvin Bailey, James Lemen and B. B. Hamilton.

Beginnings of Presbyterian Influence.

The first Presbyterian minister who visited the Illinois country was John Evans Finley. He landed in Kaskaskia in 1797. The next ministers of that faith to come were Samuel T. Mills and Daniel Smith, who had been sent from the Massachusetts Missionary Society of the West. They came in 1814, but no church was formed until 1816, when James McGready of Kentucky came into White County and formed a church at Sharon. The members were mostly from Georgia, Tennessee and Kentucky, whose families were of Scotch-Irish extraction. The second church was organized in Illinois at Shoal Creek, Bond County, in 1819; and the third at Edwardsville the same year. Long pastorates among this people seem to be a rule. Albert Hale was pastor at Springfield twenty-seven years. Livingston M. Glover at Jacksonville, thirty-two years; while that of Robert W. Patterson was maintained in Chicago, that city of marvelous changes, for thirty years. The controversy between the old and new school branches culminated in a division into two separate organizations in 1837, but happily at Pittsburg in May 1870, measures were adopted which resulted in unity.

Methodist Beginnings.

The first Methodist minister who visited the state was Joseph Lillard, a local preacher of Kentucky, who gathered a few scattered Methodists into a class and appointed Capt. Joseph Ogle as their leader. This was in 1793. Four or five years later John Clark visited the settlements of Illinois. He was a Scotchman. In the same year that Mr. Clark came, Hosea Riggs, the first resident local preacher, settled in the American bottom in St. Clair County. In 1807 Jessie Walker held the first camp meeting ever held in the state, about three miles south of Edwardsville. The meeting was a powerful one, and many present were affected with that strange movement—"the jerks." Among the powerful preachers of Methodism in Illinois was Peter Cartwright. His career is without parallel among his people. He was a man of great physical power, great energy, superior mental force and remarkable organizing and executive ability. Much of his life, after coming from Kentucky, was spent at Pleasant Plains, in Sangamon County. He was a fighter for what he believed to be the truth. He was a type of many of that day, who contended earnestly for the faith. Announcing the text, "they went everywhere preaching the word." Their preaching was largely doctrinal, polemical and hortatory. They had deep and clear convictions concerning the great truths they proclaimed.

Unique and Eccentric Preachers.

Among the early preachers were some noted for various eccentricities. William Stribling was an illustration of this. He was a very able and eloquent preacher. His command of language was most extraordinary. The following specimens will show his love of the larger and more profound words of the dictionary. Being violently opposed to the use of tobacco, he administered the following reproof to an old slave of the weed: "Venerable sir, the deleterious effluvia emanating from your tobacconistic reservoir so overshadows our occular optics and so obfuscates our sensorium, that our respirable apparatus must shortly be obtunded, unless, through your abundant suavity and preeminent politeness, you will disembogue that illuministic tube from the stimulating and sternutatory ingredient, which replenishes the rotundity of the vastness of its concavity." The proverb, "You can't make a money purse out of a sow's ear," he refined in this manner: "At the present era of the world it has been found impracticable to fabricate a sufficiently convenient pceuniary receptacle from the auricular organ of the genus suo."

The Congregationalists and Episcopalians.

The First Congregational Church was organized at Mendon, Adams County, in 1833, followed by others the same year at Naperville, Jacksonville and Quincy. Among the pioneer preachers were Jobez Porter, also a teacher in Quincy, Asa Turner, Julian M. Strutevant, Truman M. Post, Edward Beecher and Horatio Foot. The leading spirits in the organization of Illinois and Knox Colleges were Congregationists.

The pioneer Episcopal leader was Philander Chase, coming in 1833. In 1834, three churches were organized, at Jacksonville, Rushville and Galena.

Disciples Early Immigration.

The pioneers in the movement for the restoration of Apostolic Christianity were on the ground early. They came from Kentucky, Ohio and West Virginia. They were of rugged type and believing in Christian education. Early in the century colleges were established at Eureka, Abington and Jacksonville. The Bible was the text-book in religious training. Various parts of the state today religiously bear the mark of the early religious impressions. Draw a line east from Rock Island to Joliet. North of that line in Illinois the Congregationalists and Presbyterians are numerous, while south of that line the Disciples of Christ have the larger number of their seven hundred churches in Illinois. The religious divisions of the state today are determined by the religious opinions of the early comers. Many churches known as simply "Christian" or "Churches of Christ" were organized before 1830. Feeble was the beginning of this now powerful and influential body of Christians. They now number 116,954 in Illinois, with 746 churches, and are at the forefront of every movement for good. Sometime in the early twenties the church now known as the Christian Church at Cantrall, Sangamon County, was organized as a Baptist Church by Stephen England and later joined with the Disciples. This is believed to be one of our oldest congregations. In 1828, a group was organized at Hittle's Grove, under the leadership of William Miller. The church at Armington grew out of this movement. There is till a congregation at Little Grove, near Paris, Edgar County, which was established in 1826. On Sept. 27, 1824, Ebenezer Rhodes, effected an organization at Blooming Grove, south of the present city of Bloomington.

Some Early Churches.

The church at Jacksonville was organized in Oct. 1832. Among the leaders are the names of Barton W. Stone, Josephus Hemett, William Happy, Jonathan Atkinson, the first president of Berea College, A. J. Kane, John Eads, Matthew Elder, Harrison W. Osborne, E. G. Rice, D. Pat Henderson and Enos Campbell. Here in 1832 took place the union of the early church and a similar religious organization, known as Stoneites.

The church at Springfield was constituted in 1833. Josephus Hewitt, Alexander Graham, Jerry P. Lancaster, William Brown, and A. J. Kane are familiar names with the older members of this congregation. The Sangamon Journal published at Springfield, Ill., in its issue of March 16, 1833, made this announcement: "Rev. Josephus Hewitt, of Jacksonville, will preach in the Court House in this town today and tomorrow. Services to commence at 11 a. m." How he had the courage to announce himself as "Rev." I am not quite able to understand. However, no damage seems to be done as I find no record of reproving editorials or heresy trial. Charles P. Kane describes Mr. Hewitt in the following language: "Mr. Hewitt was a remarkable man. He had qualities that would have distinguished him in any society, in any age. Large of stature, dignified of mien, he at once impressed individual or assemblage. As a speaker he was effective and forcible; I have heard many persons describe him as a great preacher." Thus is described for us a type of that heroic body of men who stood for "the faith once for all delivered to the Saints," often misunderstood and the very nature of their message calling out bitter opposition, yet in the love of the truth they crossed these prairies, proclaiming the watchword, "Where the Bible speaks, we speak; where the Bible is silent, we are silent." All honors to them. We have entered into the enjoyment of the fruit of their labors.

Interesting Biographical Sidelight.

Julian M. Sturtevant records in his autobiography an incident illustrative of the opposition to the Disciples in an early day: "From a very early period in the history of Jacksonville the people known as 'Disciples,' the followers of Alexander Campbell of Bethany, Virginia, were very active. They were then regarded with much distrust by other denominations, and in fact were scarcely considered an evangelical body. Having occasion to spend a night a few miles from Jacksonville, at a house of entertainment kept by a prominent member of this body, I was invited by him to preach on some Sabbath before long, in the church near his house. As it was my practice to embrace every opportunity to preach the gospel I accepted the invitation, leaving it to him to fix the day. After some delay the appointment was announced. On reaching the place on the appointed day I found a large meeting of the Disciples in progress and several of their prominent preachers in attendance. The great congregation gave close attention to my discourse. It would appear that my utterances on that occasion were orthodox, since Dr. Beecher after listening to the same sermon, delivered two or three years later in his church in Cincinnati, cheered me at its close by exclaiming in his characteristic manner, 'That's right!'

A Communion Dilemma.

"When I promised to preach for the Disciples it did not occur to me that the question of joining with them in the communion service was also involved. But since it is the invariable custom of that denomination to follow the Sabbath morning discourse with the observance of the Supper, I perceived the moment I entered the church that I must face that question. There was not much time to think. Nor did I see much reason

The Moral Leaders of Israel

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XXXIII. Malachi and the Messenger of Jehovah.

September 24. Text for Special Study, Mal. 3, 4.

1. JUDAH AND THE EMPIRE.

It was the hope of those who returned from Babylon in 538 B. C., and the following century and a half that with the coming of the pilgrims from the East and the revival of the national spirit among the remnant of the people in the land, the fortunes of Jerusalem would immediately find amendment. The favor of Cyrus the Conqueror had promised well for the little community in Palestine. A native prince, Zerubbabel, a descendant of the kings of Judah, was the royal governor of the province, and this was almost equivalent to a native and independent government. To be sure there was an annual tribute to be paid the imperial court at Susa, but this would not prove burdensome if a fair degree of prosperity could be attained.

To add to the hopes entertained by the Jews, the permanency of the Persian rule was highly questionable. Cyrus (536-529 B. C.) was succeeded by his son, Cambyses, (529-522). Then the Magian pretender, Barda, the Pseudo-Smerdis (522-521) usurped the throne for a brief period. But he was soon unmasked and slain, and it was necessary to choose a ruler from among the close friends and warriors of Cyrus. When Darius I (521-485) the son of Hystespes, was made king, it was an open question whether he would be able to control the unruly elements gathered by Cyrus under his sway. In fact Judah shared the widely entertained hope that he would fail, and that the various fragments of the empire would find opportunity to seek their own fortunes in independent action. This is the motive of such oracles as are found in Hag. 2:6, 7, 20-22; Zech. 1:17-17.

It seems probable that during these uncertain years the current opinion in Judah favored the erection of the province into an independent kingdom, with Zerubbabel as king. This may be the meaning of that mysterious and mutilated passage in Zech. 6:9-15, in which there seems to be a reticent and reluctant reference to the use of gold brought by some of the returning exiles to make a crown for the new ruler. It was a moment of hope for Judah. But those hopes were doomed to an early disappointment. Darius brought the empire to submission, and the abortive efforts in Judah were frustrated. From that moment Zerubbabel disappears from view. Was he removed from office as provincial governor? Was he thrust into prison for his audacity? Was he even put to death as a traitor? The records are silent, and all is left to conjecture. All that is known is that from that time onward, for at least a century, Persian governors were in control of the province, and maintained their residence at Jerusalem at the expense of the people.

From this time onward for at least a half century the affairs of Judah were unchanged. Darius I died in 485 B. C., and was succeeded by Xerxes I (485-464 B. C). In this reign the events recorded in the Book of Esther occurred, as far as they possess a basis of fact. And in this period it is probable that the message of Malachi has its place.

2. DAYS OF DISCOURAGEMENT.

This Persian age was one of great discouragement for the Jerusalem community. The hopes with which it opened were glowing and confident. Ezekiel and the prophet of Isa., 40-55, had affirmed the coming greatness of Zion in the most optimistic terms. The exiles were to return from the East along a divine highway beside which the desert would burst into bloom and the parched ground become pools of water (Isa. 35). Jehovah was to lead his people home in triumph, and the rehabilitation of the city was to be rapid (Isa. 40).

But nothing of all this had come to pass. The few straggling companies of exiles who responded to the urgent call of the prophets had trodden the long trail of the caravans only to find Jerusalem in ruins, the people of the province poor and scattered and the prospects most disheartening. To be sure the temple had risen, through the earnest and persistent efforts of Haggai and Zechariah. But it seemed little worth in the eyes of those who saw Solomon's sanctuary in its glory, and moreover it was almost the only building of any moment in the city. Was there an effort to build the walls again? And is this the attempt against which a protest was made by the local enemies of Judah (Ezra 4:6)? We cannot be certain, in the scant record left us.

At any rate the condition of the community was deplorable. The neighboring tribes were hostile and watchful. The burden of Persian rule and tribute was heavy. The soil of Judah was not rich, and its neglect for two generations had made more difficult the processes of agriculture. The crops were poor, and there was no other source from which an income could be expected. The few Hebrews who came from time to time from the East added but little to the resources of the province. Neither in their social relations with their neighbors nor in their own industrial experiences was there any realization of those high hopes which the prophets had kindled in the hearts of the people. On the contrary the entire situation was depressing to a degree.

3. EVILS OF THE TIME.

The effect of such conditions was unfortunate. The temper and the courage of the community alike suffered. The evils of a period of disappointment and reaction were apparent. The high hopes of prosperity vanished as the trying reality pressed upon the people. The joy of service at the temple declined as it became evident that the mere presence of the sanctuary was no safeguard against poor crops and trying experiences. The offerings, which were supposed to be best the land afforded, were allowed to decline in character until even blemished sacrifices of grain and animals were unblushingly presented. Gifts, which it would have been an insult to offer to the Persian governor of the province as a part of his supplies, were taken to the temple, and accepted by the priests as worthy sacrifices to God.

More than this, the priesthood was becoming infected with the habits of the time. Instead of maintaining the high character of the worship, in accord with the traditions of their order, the members of the priestly tribe were forgetful of their high place in the nation, and were willing to compromise the dignity of their tribe and vocation by permitting unworthy ministries to take the place of the prescribed ritual of the sanctuary.

More serious still was the growth of mixed marriages. In the earlier days of Israel when the nation was large and vigorous, little was thought of inter-marriage with the people of the region. In fact the inhabitants of Palestine were absorbed rather than subdued. But as time went on, and especially after the exile, when the population entitled to the name of Hebrews was small, the sense of national integrity became more intense, and the sentiment against marriages with foreigners more pronounced. This was the feeling of those who held in reverence the sanctions of Israel's national life. To those who, under stress of the depressing influences of the age, abandoned their loyalty to the covenants of the past, the practice of foreign marriages appealed as attractive and advantageous. And thus arose the scandal of this custom, to which the faithful were increasingly sensitive.

In the wake of these evils came others of a sort to disquiet, still further, the peace of the community. Sorcery, adultery, falsehood, oppression of the poor were on the increase. The times were very evil. The will of God was little regarded.

4. THE MESSAGE OF MALACHI.

In such a time appeared the oracle which is contained in the four brief chapters of the Book of Malachi. Of the author, nothing is known. It is not even certain that the name of the book is that of its writer. The word "malachi" is the Hebrew term for "my messenger," and the appearance of this designation, in 3:1, has led some students to the view that the book is anonymous, and that the name was taken from the text as its most descriptive word.

Opening with an oracle against Edom, the hereditary enemy of Judah, the prophet proceeds to rebuke the priests who offer polluted bread, and blind, lame and sick sacrificial victims at the sanctuary. Why not shut the doors, he says, if such worthless offerings are to be made. They would not dare take such presents to their Persian governor. Why should Jehovah, whose name is great in all the earth, be so insulted by his own people? (1:6-14).

Then in stinging words he reminds the priests of their honorable position as the descendants of Levi, and the legitimate teachers of the nation. The priest should be the messenger of Jehovah to his people. But what does their conduct imply? (2:1-9).

In the section 2:10-16 the subject of mixed marriages is considered, and especially the injustice of abandoning Hebrew wives or betrothed maidens for the daughters of another people. For all such conduct there will be the inevitable penalty, for Jehovah will send his Messenger to punish and refine the people. Then all the evil conduct of which Judah was guilty, would be brought to condign punishment (2:17-3:6).

Once more, the failure to bring the tenths of their produce to the temple is denounced. This conduct is the robbery of God. They must bring all the tithes in, and then mark how God will open for them the heavens, and shower upon them blessings beyond their power to receive. Then the poor crops and the evil days shall cease (3:7-12).

5. PROMISE AND WARNING.

In the depression of past days some of them had wondered if it were worth while to serve God. They had thus reversed the values of life, and doubted of the outcome of his providence. But in all such moments there was a faithful circle that kept the covenant. They spoke often with each other in their little gatherings, and were the hope of the future, jewels of God to be spared and prized in the day of testing to come. (3:13-18.)

For there would be a day of God, a time of judgment, when the evil should be consumed and the righteous blessed. Such a day would see all the seemingly ill-balanced accounts settled in absolute justice (4:1-3.)

The oracle closes with a fresh injunction to obey the Mosaic institutes of the past, and the promise that Elijah shall be sent to prepare the world for the Day of Jehovah which hastens apace. His task is to be the reconciliation of fathers to children, old to young, ancient to modern, conservative to progressive, for only in such agreement can the curse of confusion and ruin be avoided (4:4-6.)

Thus closes the book which in process of time was placed last in the canon of the old Testament. That it was not the latest book of that collection will appear in the progress of these studies. Yet there were in it elements of warning and of promise which may have induced, and at least in a measure justified, this assignment of position. It is, at least, a significant commentary on the social and religious life of Judah in a period between the erection of the temple and the later reforms of Nehemiah and Ezra.

And the Jews of later days laid much stress upon its warnings of judgment, and its promise that Elijah was to appear before the final days were ushered in, to prepare the world for the final issue of events, and to achieve his high design of world-wide reconciliation.

FOLLOWING STUDIES.

The subject of section 39 will be "Prophetic Voices in Judah" and of 40, "Nehemiah and the Rebuilding of the Walls."

TOPICS FOR FURTHER STUDY, REPORTS AND PAPERS.

1. The political hopes of the Jerusalem community.
2. The temple cultus of the Persian period.
3. The sentiments regarding mixed marriages in oriental communities.
4. The relation between the prosperity and the morals of a community.
5. The literary features of the Book of Malachi.
6. The use of Malachi in the New Testament.

QUESTIONS.

1. What hopes for Jerusalem did the people entertain in 538 and the succeeding years?
2. What were the grounds of these hopes?
3. What political expectations did the Jews have after the return?
4. Why did these expectations fail of realization?
5. How did the current of events affect Zerubbabel?
6. What prophets had predicted the prosperity of Judah?
7. What were the actual conditions?
8. What was the attitude of the neighboring tribes?
9. What other difficulties confronted the new colony?
10. What effect did these conditions have on the spirits of the people?
11. What was the character of the service rendered at the temple?
12. What were the special sins of the priesthood?
13. What serious social custom menaced the integrity of the community?
14. What was the history of mixed marriages in former times in Israel?
15. What other evils found their place in the society of Jerusalem?
16. What is known regarding the name, authorship and state of the Book of Malachi?
17. What sins were especially rebuked by the prophet?
18. What class of leaders was particularly reproved?
19. What warnings are voiced by the prophet?
20. What promises for the future are held out?

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

The Asbell and Butler meeting at Detroit had resulted in nine additions on confession of faith, up to last report.

L. H. Huff, formerly of La Harpe, began his new pastorate at Mt. Sterling September 3, succeeding A. L. Cole.

Mrs. S. M. Crank is holding a revival meeting at Maroa with large congregations, and a decided spiritual interest.

Secretary J. Fred Jones will hold a meeting at De Land, assisting George W. Wise, the pastor. The meeting will begin the latter part of September.

J. D. Williams, who is district worker in the Third District, is holding a revival meeting at Colmar Church with favorable prospects.

D. W. Conner, pastor at Palestine, ordained Chauncey Mullens to the ministry last Sunday. Mr. Mullens has been at Kimberlin Heights School for the past two years.

Centennial Church, at Shirley, is having a revival meeting conducted by its pastor, Thomas Starbuck. This pastor held his own meeting last year with almost fifty additions.

W. O. S. Cliffe, of Christopher is preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on Old Testament characters. On the last two Sunday evenings, the characters used were Daniel and Balaam.

The church at Greenup is pastorless, L. E. Hughes having concluded his pastorate there September 3. The latter will be glad to hold meetings, or can be secured for another pastoral field.

Youngstown Church, where G. F. Chandler preaches, made an offering to the Benevolent Society on solicitation of Secretary Fred Cline, which amounted to sixteen dollars in cash besides one life membership.

A. W. Conner of Indiana lectured at the County Teachers' Institute, at Albion on "The Boy Question." Mr. Conner has spoken in a large number of cities in Illinois, and has received commendation without exception.

Springfield churches are sending nine young men and women to Eureka College this year. If other churches in the cities of the state are proportionately represented, Eureka College will have the largest student body in its history.

Waynesville churches held union services during the summer months. The pastors of the various churches did the preaching. No announcement was made prior to the service, regarding the speaker for that occasion. The ministers worked in perfect harmony. F. L. Davis is pastor of the Church of Disciples.

A new congregation with seventeen members was recently organized at Beech Bluff School-house, in Wayne County. The meeting, which resulted in the organization, was held by W. H. Keen. A building site has been donated, and some money already pledged for the building, which is to be erected next year.

The second week of the Story-Stout meeting at Stewardson, resulted in sixty-two additions, making a total of ninety-one in two weeks. Mr. Story baptized forty-five in the river on Sunday. Only last year the evangelist held a meeting for this congregation resulting in more than two hundred additions, and since that time has been pastor of the church.

Allen T. Shaw, of Spencer, Indiana, has become pastor of the church at Macomb, succeeding A. M. Hale, whose pastorate there was marked by enlargement of the congregation and the construction of a beautiful church edifice. Mr. Shaw comes from a successful pastorate in Indiana, lasting over a period of two and one-half years, and with the highest commendation of the congregation he is leaving.

The pastor at Pekin, O. C. Bolman, spoke to nearly a thousand people at the union meeting held at the Court House Square the first Sunday in September. Mr. Bolman has been pastor of this church for a year, during which time there have been forty additions without special services. The Sunday-school has doubled in attendance, and the church building is not large enough to accommodate all the classes. Beginning near the first of October, Leroy F. Sargent of Havana will assist the pastor in a revival meeting.

W. W. Weeden has removed from assumption to Mt. Carmel where he takes charge of the church.

Any church wanting a preacher, who is an enthusiastic Sunday-school and Endeavor man, whose wife is a splendid church worker, will be put in correspondence with him by writing to Chas. M. Fillmore, Indianapolis, Ind.

The new building of First Church, Springfield, is being constructed with such rapidity as that it is anticipated the dedicatory services will be held by the first of March, instead of several months later, as anticipated when the contract was let. The walls are almost completed, and without unforseen hindrances, the roof will be placed by the first of November or earlier. It is probable that the congregation will begin holding its services in the basement by the middle of November, and utilize other parts of the building as the contractor progresses with the inside work.

Charles Reign Scoville dedicated the new edifice at Dallas City, August 6. The structure cost $10,000 and $5,500 was required to be raised. This amount was exceeded by more than $1,000, and during the day there were fifteen additions, all but one on profession of faith. The minister is C. L. Stauffer. He has served through a period of three years in an unusually competent and faithful manner, and with loyal support from the membership numbering almost four hundred.

News Editorials

A Midweek Sabbath.

The church at Vermont celebrated its sixteenth annual roll call on a recent Thursday. This roll call has become an established institution. It surprises the visitor to see three great congregations fill the church morning, afternoon and evening in the midst of the week. Farmers and tradesmen lay aside their work to answer the roll call. The Christian church is much the largest in this town of 1,200 people. The present pastor is Geo. B. McKee. For seventeen years Geo. W. Ross ministered here and died in the midst of his work less than a year since. Mr. McKee came to them last winter from North Park Church, Indianapolis. A total of 386 names were called at the morning service with responses from perhaps 250 persons. All the societies of the church made excellent reports. C. C. Morrison, of The Christian Century preached at this service on "Present Day Confirmations of the Disciples' Ideals." The afternoon service was devoted to the Sunday-school and young people while the evening was set apart especially for the men. The house was packed on each occasion. Mr. Morrison spoke at both these services also. The new minister, Mr. McKee, and his wife, are held in high esteem. The church is going on to greater victories.

Heed This Call!

The call from Stephen E. Fisher, pastor of University Church, Champaign, and published recently in our church papers, should receive the attention of Illinois pastors. Mr. Fisher, together with his two pastoral helpers, is in a strategic position to influence the developing life of many young men and women of the University of Illinois. It is a simple matter for every Christian minister to drop a letter to Mr. Fisher or one of his assistants, advising of any young person going from his church to the University. Or, if there is some young person who is only partly under the influence of the home church, this fact made known to the Champaign pastor will hasten effort on his behalf, and will make this effort considerably more effective. The pastor of a university church is a very busy man, and often compelled, by the requirements of his local congregation, to be more or less indifferent to the student body. The Christian Church at Champaign is fortunate in having as its minister a man who is eager to minister to students, and is ready to do so in addition to the multitudinous demands of his large local congregation. Every Illinois pastor from whose flock a young person goes to the University will hardly be exhibiting a proper pastoral instinct who does not fulfil the simple request made by the Champaign pastor.

Congratulations, Eureka College!

The Disciples of Illinois are rejoicing with Eureka College over the successful culmination of its campaign to raise one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. The authorities were not satisfied to rest with raising the exact amount, and succeeded in receiving one hundred and thirty-three thousand dollars. Of this amount, five thousand dollars was received by check on the last day of the campaign. Twenty-five thousand dollars of this amount will be utilized in the payment of indebtedness, and one hundred and eight thousand dollars will be set aside for permanent endowment. This will give the college an endowment of approximately one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. With this fund as the starter for a worthy endowment, together with a faculty of scholarship and devotion, and a loyal student body, Eureka College will do a work in the future superior even to that it has been able to accomplish in the past. New interest has been awakened in the college by recent appeals for endowment, and every individual who has pledged money for the college's support will be a friend throughout the years to come. The Disciples of the state and the Brotherhood will be able to continue their pride in this institution. It should not be thought, however, that the state has fulfilled its obligation to the college by the latest increase to its endowment fund. A college like Eureka today demands not less than one-half million dollars for its proper maintenance, and men who are making wills or seeking channels for their money to accomplish good, should not lose sight of this college which so merits and requires financial aid. In addition to the financial asistance, ministers and laymen interested in Christian education, should be glad to influence young men and women ready to begin their college education, to consider Eureka College. The Brotherhood of Illinois, thoroughly coöperating in this latter regard, can send into the halls of the college such a company of young people that the capacity of the college will be taxed. Congratulations are due Mr. H. H. Peters, the Finance Committee and the entire College Board for the success which has attended the money-raising campaign of the last three years. And the Brotherhood of Illinois should feel itself indebted to every one who gave and made possible the raising of this splendid fund.

Chicago

G. W. Muckley, secretary of our church extension board, spoke Sunday morning, Sept. 3, at the West End Church.

The Christian Business Men's Association met Tuesday evening, Sept. 12, at the Jackson Restaurant. The purpose of the meeting was to consider the Douglas Park situation. John W. Thomas of the Evanston church was recently chosen president of the organization, and W. S. Trescott, Memorial, is the new secretary.

Union services were held Sunday the 10th by the Douglas Park church and the Douglas Park Congregational Church in the house of the latter, the pastor of the former preaching. Recently there have been seven

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the two years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature,

Beginning Next October

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that have ever been offered to Sunday Schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to see the work start off in the autumn with zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these classes in the study of Social Reform.

additions to the church at Douglas Park.

Invitations were received by many of our city workers from the Central Church of Christ at Gary, Ind., relative to the dedication of their new building, Sept. 3. Claude E. Hill, Valparaiso, and C. J. Sharpe of Hammond were the chief speakers.

With appropriate services, Sept. 10, the Austin Church welcomed their new pastor George H. Brown, who began his work there Sept. 1. Several additions at this service proved encouraging for both the congregation and their new and aggressive leader.

VAUGHAN DABNEY.

THE STATE CONVENTION

BY O. F. JORDAN.

Although held on the extreme eastern border of Illinois, the convention at Danville, September 4-7, was well attended. Nearly four hundred registered, very few local names being included in this list. The different sections of the state had good representation.

Danville is a good convention city. It has a population of over thirty thousand, and is rapidly growing into larger things. It is the home of "Uncle Joe" Cannon and of an unusually large soldiers' home. It is in the center of a district where the Disciples are unusually strong. In this city there are four of our churches well housed. The First Church building, in which the convention was held, is a commodious and beautiful building which may be counted as one of our best buildings in the state.

The Program.

We may compliment the program committee with having arranged the best state program in years. There was balance and vision in the arrangement. For the most part men who knew their subjects represented the different interests.

The C. W. B. M. session drew a large crowd early in the convention. Though their program is placed in the most unfavorable section, at the beginning of the convention, the deep human interest in their many tasks provides them audience. Their program was graced by the presence of some speakers from outside the state. These were Dr. Jennie Crozier of Mandha, India, and C. C. Smith of Cincinnati, who directs the work for negroes. W. H. Waggoner gave his stereopticon lecture on the work of the society. In the business of their convention there was the note of confidence and enthusiasm. Progress is being made in no uncertain way under the leadership of Lura V. Thompson, the secretary.

The session of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society opened with the president's address by John R. Golden. It did not deal with a restatement of the doctrinal position of the Disciples, but with the need of the spiritual life. On the same evening Geo. W. Muckley presented the cause of Church Extension. Though we have heard him often in Church Extension addresses, we have never heard him marshall facts and sentiments in defense of his favorite theme with greater skill. Few things reveal the state of religious people more certainly than their architecture.

The address on Wednesday by R. F. Thrapp is published in this issue of The Christian Century. J. Fred Jones spoke on the state of the cause in Illinois. He has had a long experience preaching in churches with problems where the evangelist does not go. He meets continually the absurd conservatism of the "anti" and the factiousness of the church demagogue. He made us all more liberal because we had laughed at our follies and had seen some vision of larger things. W. H. Cannon spoke of the state of religion among Illinois Disciples. Some of the failures of our people to realize the best in spiritual things were examined.

Wednesday afternoon there was a free discussion of the characteristic problems of Illinois. O. F. Jordan spoke on Chicago under the divisions of Material Prosperity, Moral Failure, Public and Volunteer Remedies and The Relation of the Disciples to the Problem. The subject was discussed by W. F. Shaw and Chas. Reign Scoville. The latter pleaded strongly for careful study of the problem rather than the forming of emotional impressions. His remarks showed insight and sympathy.

The problem of the rural community was presented by J. W. Street. He scattered printed statistics showing the failure of the country churches to co-operate in the brotherhood enterprises as the city brethren did. He deplored the undeveloped state of rural sociology.

The student problem of Illinois was studied in connection with the state university, by S. H. Zendt. The present interest in this institution may lead to interest in all the large student communities of Illinois, let us hope.

Wednesday evening Eureka College had a banquet in the church under the auspices of the alumni association. Happy and optimistic speeches were made by different members of the alumni and by outside friends.

After the banquet, the Brotherhood program began. Secretary Shellenberger delivered the first address. After this came the address of Peter Ainslie on "Christian Union." In this address the mountain peak of the convention was reached. Christian Union was conceived as a spiritual thing and not as some program of church merger merely. It was presented as the outflowering of Christian charity and brotherhood.

"You must get rid of the jealousy, the envy and the prejudice, that infests the church," declared the speaker. "Otherwise, we can't expect the brotherhood to be true and steadfast and abiding. It is not a question of religion merely; it is a question of good breeding and courtesy, whether or not we, as Christians, shall be a guardian of every other denomination. Until we can apply the golden rule, we can not rightfully call ourselves Disciples of Christ. It's not a question of faith, belief or immersion; it all revolves about the more sordid problems of envy, jealousy and pride. The world is weary—heart-sick with controversy; the world wants life, the life that alone can satisfy its heart-hunger."

Thursday forenoon was given over to the interests of Eureka College. This session announced the good news of the raising of $135,000 for our Illinois school. While this does not mean the college problem is settled, it does mean that the school may continue on the present basis without facing an annual deficit. O. W. Lawrence was not able to deliver his address owing to serious illness with pneumonia.

The Bible School session was amply provided with our leading lights in this field. The national superintendent, R. M. Hopkins, was present and spoke. He is an expert in the good devices of the Sunday School world. Our brother, W. C. Pierce, who is in the interdenominational service, also spoke. He stands for the enthusiasm of propaganda in the movement. R. P. Shepherd of the Christian Board of Publication also appeared upon the program. He represented the more serious pedagogical ideals of the movement.

The Business.

The convention does most of its business through committees. A meeting of the state board during the convention prepares recommendations on important matters. These are passed upon by a convention committee and then presented to the convention for final action. Among the important steps this year is action looking to the co-ordination of the state society with the American Christian Missionary society. A motion prevailed requiring state board approval for district enterprises. This looks toward further co-ordination. The state board during the convention period adopted the policy of referring the disputes of churches and the cases of bad preachers to the Ministerial Associations.

The resolutions committee presented a long list of resolutions which were adopted. Among the most important of these was a resolution authorizing the chairman to appoint representatives to the Illinois Federation of Churches. Resolutions were adopted deploring the recent decision of the Supreme Court barring the Bible out of the public schools, and against the decision of President Taft not to allow Philippine school teachers to teach in Protestant Sunday Schools. The convention expressed its humanitarian interest by sending a telegram to the governor of Arkansas concerning the legal execution of a boy of fifteen. The state board re-elected all the present salaried officials. J. Fred Jones makes enemies by his continuous warfare on the devious preachers, but the great brotherhood of Illinois is with him, as this action shows. A lively fight over the place of the next convention took place. Litchfield and Centralia contested. As the convention has never gone into southern Illinois, Centralia was chosen.

The Spirit of the Convention.

Every convention has a spirit. We have seen the brethren meet in panic and suspicion. This year there was more brotherhood, more liberality of thought, more real religion than we have ever seen in a convention before. Even the discussions that evoked radical differences of opinion were always courteous and brotherly.

As an improvement to our conventions, our brethren are demanding music that is religious. Our convention music should lift us to God instead of being a bill-board for the most recent evangelistic song-book. We ought to sing out of the good hymnals our best churches use. We should have solos like the beautiful one of Prof. Mercer.

The Disciples of Illinois have their faces to the light. How far we have to travel, God knows. We seem willing, however, to leave behind some initial things and "to press on to perfection."

to hesitate. These people had been listening with profound and reverential attention to what I believed to be the gospel. I saw no reason to doubt that they received it intelligently and sincerely, and I could not refuse to join with them in breaking bread in the name of the Lord. And I am bound to say that I have seldom witnessed a more reverent and devout observance of that rite. At the close of the service strong men with whom I was acquainted in business relations but whom I had never before met in Christian worship, sang 'Rock of Ages Cleft for Me,' with tears rolling down their cheeks. I could say with Peter, 'I perceive that God is no respecter of persons.' God taught me that day to beware how I called any body of professed Christians 'common or unclean.'

"The reports of my doings on that Sabbath startled the community, the story could not

Church Life

Work is progressing on the church at East Liberty, Ohio.

James R. McIntyre has resigned his pastorate at Santa Monica, Caiif.

Robert Graham Frank began the ninth year of his pastorate at Liberty, Mo., on September 10.

W. K. Pendleton has been called to the pastorate at Independence, Mo., made vacant by the resignation of F. F. Walters.

C. A. Park who has recently accepted the pastorate at Austin, Minn., began his work there September 3.

E. D. Eubank, pastor at Broken Bow, Neb., has organized a congregation at Colburg, Neb. a house of worship seating 250 has been built.

S. E. Brewster of Beaver, Pa., is at present occupying the pulpit of First Church, Colorado Springs, Colo., made vacant by the removal of the former pastor, George B. Stewart to Muncie, Ind.

A parliament will be held at First Church, Joplin, Mo., September 25-26, in the interest of Home Mission work. Among the speakers are I. N. McCash, D. Y. Donaldson and F. L. Moffett.

Ground has been broken for a new building by the congregation of Riverside Church, Buffalo, N. Y. Although working amid unusual difficulties, about $1,500 has been paid and the work here bids fair to prosper.

A farewell reception was recently tendered Mr. and Mrs. Owen Livengood by the congregation of Central Church, Weatherford, Tex., where Mr. Livengood has ministered for the past two and a half years.

John W. Marshall has closed a good meeting at Amarillo, Tex., where W. J. Jennings is leading his congregation in a successful work. Mr. Marshall began a meeting at Denison, Tex., on September 10.

Evangelists Abberley and St. John are in a meeting with Geo. L. Peters, pastor of Central Church, Springfield, Mo. There were eleven additions at the first service and a good meeting is expected.

The annual convention of Kansas churches will be held this year at Parsons, Kan., October 2-5. An attendance of 600 of 700 is expected and extensive preparations are being made for the entertainment of the visitors.

Work on the new church at New London, Mo., is progressing rapidly and will be completed by about the first of December. This building is being erected at a cost of $14,000 and will replace the structure destroyed by fire some months ago.

The pastorate at Fairmont, Minn., is now vacant owing to the resignation of Miss Ada L. Forster who has been pastor there for the past four years. During this time the church has grown both in numbers and efficient work. At the closing service of the retiring pastor every church in the town was represented. Miss Forster will give her full time to C. W. B. M. work in the future.

W. J. Minges is in a meeting at Herington, Kan., where F. H. Schmitt ministers. There were eighty-nine additions at the first Sunday service, with large audiences attending. This congregation, which has a membership of two hundred, will erect a building in the near future at a cost of $20,000. One of the members of the congregation has already subscribed $13,000 of this sum.

Fred Marsh Gordon, has resigned at Knoxville Church, Pittsburgh, Pa., after a pastorate of twelve years during which time the membership has grown from 150 to 1,200. Mr. Gordon will preach for the congregation at Flatbush, Brooklyn, N. Y., and will take courses at Columbia University and Union Seminary. E. A. Cole of St. Louis will occupy the pulpit left vacant by Mr. Gordon.

Roy E. Deadwood, of Brooklyn, N. Y., closed a three weeks' meeting with D. H. Bradbury at the Throopsville, N. Y., church, September 1. There were thirty responses, twenty three being for baptism. Sentiment for uniting the local Disciple and Baptist churches was strengthened. This was the best August meeting in Central New York for years. A farewell reception was tendered and a generous free-will offering raised for Mr. Deadman.

The churches of Knox County, Ind., held their annual meeting on September 3, with the Wheatland congregation with 1,600 in attendance. I. N. McCash gave an address on "The Solidarity of the Race" and presented the interests of the American Missionary Society. The point of coherence in the county association is in the agreement of the churches to unite their offerings for Foreign Home and State Missions, Church Extension and Education. Other benevolences will have united support in time. There are three thousand members in the Disciple congregation of Knox County, and the church property has a value of over $222,000.

Central Church, Gary, Ind., Nelson H. Trimble, minister, was dedicated on September 3. Cecil Sharp, pastor at Hammond, Ind., and Claude E. Hill, of Valparaiso, Ind., assisted in the services. Owing to certain building restrictions a church edifice costing $17,000 was required for the site, so a building containing an auditorium with two flats on the second floor was erected at a cost of $8,000 including the site. The rental from the apartments will be applied on the mortgage. Three buildings have been erected in this district since Mr. and Mrs. Trimble began work here a little more than a year ago. The congregations at Tolleston and Glen Park churches are growing and the Sunday-schools of all three congregations have received front rank certificates.

Good News From the Foreign Society.

The receipts for Foreign Mission for the month of August amounted to $31,307, a gain over the corresponding month last year of $12,682. The church as churches made a gain of $1,606, the Sunday-schools $918.

Let the friends remember that the books close September 30. Please see that all offerings are sent in before that date.

F. M. RAINS, Secretary,

Terre Haute, Indiana.

The beautiful new building erected by the congregation of Central Church, Terre Haute, Ind., was dedicated on September 3, by Charles Reign Scoville. Three services were held and all were largely attended. S. D. Dutcher, who has been pastor of this church for two and a half years has led his congregation in a progressive work here. The building and lot represents $103,000. Thirty-five thousand dollars was asked for and $42,115 was raised more than taking care of total indebtedness. The congratulatory speeches by visiting pastors at the afternoon meeting manifested the high standing the pastor and church has on this city. The building is of grecian architecture, built of pressed brick, beautifully decorated with bed-have been circulated with greater rapidity or repeated with more emphasis had I committed an infamous crime. A few defended my action, but most of my good neighbors were shocked."

An Additional Testimony.

In 1860 this large hearted man wrote of the Disciples in Jacksonville: "It is my belief that no portion of the religious community around us has grown in grace more rapidly than that denomination. If my efforts have in any degree contributed to that end I am thankful. I ascribe their remarkable progress to the fact that from the beginning they have consistently held that, 'The Word of God only is the rule of our faith.'"

In Danville and vicinity the work began in 1835. In that year Dr. W. Walters, a physician, settled in Danville. The nearest body of the Disciples was eighteen miles away. He went there to worship regularly until the church was constituted in the city of Danville. Time would fail me to tell the whole story of this powerful people in Illinois. Their early labors were characterized with heroism, sacrifice and a devotion to the truth, which won the admiration of many. The Illinois Christian Missionary Society, constituted in 1850 has organized over 300 churches in the state. Among them the churches at Quincy, Peoria, Gibson City and Champaign. Among the many who have served as president of the society, I find the honored names of Happy, Jones, Enos Campbell, Allen, Hobbs, Gilbert, Hardin and many others who are still living.

And now, may a double portion of the spirit of our fathers rest upon the sons of the present. We have mighty problems in Illinois, which can only be solved by the principles of the gospel. This is no time for rest, compromise or soft words. Shall Illinois be Christian? We must help in the solution of that question. The best that is in us must be used without stint for the King.

Notes From the Foreign Society

F. A. Sherman of Hatta, India, states that a new missionary, a doctor, if possible, and his wife are needed. The purpose is not to open a hospital or dispensary, but to carry on work in the district. A doctor could preach and heal as he went from village to village where there are no hospitals or dispensaries.

Dr. John Sergis arrived in Oroomiah, Persia. Doctor Sergis preaches the gospel and cares for the sick. He writes that the political conditions are still in a bad way. The late abdicated shah has come to the capital with twenty thousand wild Turkomans. It is expected that if he shall succeed he will deal harshly with the people who deposed him.

In a few days O. J. Grainger and family start back to India. They have greatly enjoyed their furlough and are returning to India full of enthusiasm.

Andrew Murray says that it is one thing for a minister to be an advocate and supporter of missions. It is another and very different thing for him to understand that missions are the chief end of the church, and, therefore, the chief end for which his congregation exists.

The new church in Bolenge, Africa is in course of erection. The walls are now nine feet high. The window frames are all in and the timbers and sheet iron for the roof have arrived.

The work at Longa, Africa, has gone on with but few interruptions throughout the year. Dr. Jaggard made fifty thousand bricks, but did not burn them. Several acres of additional ground were cleared. Upward of four thousand feet of lumber were sawed; besides considerable work was done on the home of Dr. and Mrs. Jaggard.

There was a gain from every source of receipts for Foreign Missions during August except bequests.

A sister in Michigan will in the future support Mrs. Justin E. Brown, at Luchowfu, China. She will pay $150 each quarter, beginning October 1. This is another new Living-link.

Hiram College Calls Vernon Stauffer

The friends of Hiram College and of Christian education will be gratified to know that Vernon Stauffer has accepted the call of his alma mater to become Dean of men and Professor of New Testament Literature. He won marked distinction in his college days as a student, an orator and a leader. Since his graduation in 1901 he has held two important pastorates, the first at Richmond Street, Cincinnati, and the second in Angola, Indiana. In both he showed exceptional power as a preacher and as an ececutive. In Angola, the seat of the Tri-State College, beside doing the usual work of a minister in a large and aggressive church, he has established and for some years occupied one of the most successful Bible chairs under the direction of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and he has led the church in the erection of a splendidly appointed house of worship. In addition to these undertakings he has found time to render valued service to the cause at large in his own and in neighboring states, and withal to enter upon graduate study in Columbia University and Union Theological Seminary.

Quite naturally Mr. Stauffer has been persistently sought after for some of the most prominent pulpits and important college positions among the Disciples. The fact that after years of deliberation he turns to the work of the Christian College as the most fundamental and far reaching ministry to which he can devote his life is itself significant. As Dean he will touch directly every young man in college and as Professor of New Testament Literature he will have much to do in shaping the faith and the purpose of every student who will preach the Word. In what other way could he accomplish so vast and multiple a ministry?

Mr. Stauffer leaves his pastorate in October to again take up courses in Columbia and Union Seminary. With the opening of the college year in September 1912 he will begin his service at Hiram. In an unusual degree Mr. Stauffer's own personality is the embodiment of the essential spirit of the institution he returns to serve.

SEPTEMBER IS THE ONE MONTH

Specially Devoted to Offerings for

CHURCH EXTENSION WORK

WHY TAKE THE OFFERING?

1st—To help house homeless brethren; 2nd—Our brotherhood declared in the National Convention of 1888 that a Church Extension Fund was absolutely necessary since the Mission Church can borrow nowhere else and in most instances must borrow to build; 3rd—We should support a work that is our own; 4th—Up-to-date church buildings furnish the basis for all church work and missionary enterprise; 5th—209 appeals for aid to build necessary buildings for missions have come during the past ten months and the Board has answered but 59.

LET NOTHING SET IT ASIDE

The Board begs that the churches will devote themselves during September to offerings for Church Extension. This is only fair since it is the last month of the missionary year and the only month for this offering.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The graded lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' grade was complete the past year. The Primary grade will be complete for the opening of the new year—October 1. Three of the four years of the Junior grade will be complete October 1. The second year of the Intermediate grade (ready October 1) supplies boys and girls of 15 and 16 years.]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

Every lesson writer is a recognized authority in the Interdenominational Sunday School world!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that coöperation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

A NEW YEAR BEGINS OCTOBER 1

The Sunday-school calendar is made to conform to the public school calendar. While the graded lessons may be begun at any time, there are obvious advantages in starting at the beginning of the new cycle.

Send today for Price List, Order Blank and Prospectus!

If you state which grade you are chiefly interested in, we will send, in addition to prospectuses of the entire series, a teachers' and pupils' text for that particular grade. We do not send a complete outfit as free samples.

Hard to Say Halt!

It is hard to say halt to our readers who are sending in their lists of names for the TEN WEEKS FOR TEN CENTS offer. The latest mail delivery has brought a handful of splendid lists—one containing 120 names and a draft for $12. The publisher is stirred to the deepest appreciation of the co-operation which our readers have given him in this campaign. This paper will reach many subscribers on Wednesday. You still have time to get your list to the office by Saturday, September 23, when the offer is closed. Positively no names can be received after that date at this rate. The publisher will now turn this page over to the editors who loaned it to him for this campaign. He may wish to use it again when he has some special offer to make and so he extends his appreciation to the editors and to the hundreds of readers who have co-operated to make this campaign a success.

Our Readers' Opinions

"Church Membership and Heaven Membership" Again

Editors The Christian Century:—I have said The Christian Century is consistent. I think it is fair also, and while it is giving, and using much space on one side of a great and vital question I am sure it will give some space to an honest man who is on the other side.

The Christian Century says, "This Heaven membership is a new thing'" and would make me its sponsor.

Wrong you are. It is by no means a new thing, nor am I its father, inventor, or discoverer. Ask so great a light as the editor of the Christian Evangelist and many other greater or lesser lights among us and they will tell you plainly that many to whom they deny church membership are going to heaven. This thing is old and common. I have only voiced a sentiment. It may look new to The Christian Century for the reason that The Christian Century does not believe it. The Christian Century sees no difference between church membership and heaven membership—others do. Again I say it is common, very common.

The Christian Century says my "position of course is preposterous." What is my position? It was stated by a quotation from a very high authority in these words: "Except a man be born of water and of the spirit he can not enter into the kingdom of God." If The Christian Century thinks he can enter the kingdom of God in some other way, come out boldly and openly and say so. I think he can not. Do you think he can? The word "preposterous" uttered by The Christian Century may be ponderous but it can not blot out John 3:5.

The Christian Century says of heaven membership, "We do not read of it in the New Testament." True, nor do we read of "immersion-baptism" or of receiving unbaptized people into the church in the New Testament.

What is the "heresy," the "serious heresy" of which I stand accused? Is it of saying there is a difference between church membership and heaven membership? Look over what I have written and see if I have said it. I have not said it. I do not say it. I have no right or authority to say such a thing. It is not said in the New Testament.

Nor have I the right or authority to say there is not a difference between church membership and heaven membership. God has told us what church membership is and what it promises. Outside of that He may do or not do. That is His promise. I have not affirmed it. I have simply voiced a very common sentiment.

Yes, the New Testament says, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." I believe that one is saved from past sins, has entered into the condition of being saved when he believes and is baptized; not before. Does the Christian Century so believe and teach? I believe that those who repent and are baptized have the remission of their sins. Let me ask, does the Christian Century so believe and teach? Where is the heresy? I have not said, I do not now say, those who are not "saved" and have not the remission of sins go to heaven. You must not think heretical thoughts for me. Neither do I say they are not going to heaven. It is not my say.

The difficulty lies just here. The Christian Century makes faith in God and Christ and right living the way into the church. The New Testament makes that and baptism into Christ the way. I stand by the New Testament. Your idea applied to the naturalization of foreign born people into our government would ignore the oath of allegiance and make every foreigner who leaves his native land and comes here and behaves decently a citizen with full rights and protection. You are wrong. You are weakening our plea for a return to New Testament Christianity and hindering the cause of union and delaying the conversion of the world. E. L. FRAZIER.

St. Petersburg, Fla.

[There are too many points involved in the above communication to warrant a reply, even were one needed. Having poked a little fun at so strict a constructionist as our correspondent, we feel like giving him the last word. One point only do we wish to correct. The Christian Century does not "make faith in God and Christ and right living the way into the church." We agree with our good brother Frazier and the New Testament in making "that and baptism into Christ the way."—THE EDITORS.]

Do the Wicked Progress After Death?

Editors The Christian Century: The praise you bestow upon Prof. Karl E. Guthe's lecture, published in your issue of August 17, entitled "Materialism, the Way Out," I think is justly bestowed. I should think that nineteen twentieths of it would be endorsed by all of your readers. Only in one place would I place an interrogation point. It is here:

"While I have to content myself with the assertion that mind is as indestructible as matter and energy, my firm belief in evolution and in an orderly plan of this universe leads me to doubt that there can be a retrogression in its development. I believe my spirit will after death be more advanced in all the characteristics of the human soul."

That means, if there is any meaning in language or thought in human speech—universalism.

"Evil seducers" according to Paul, and according to our own observation, even here do not "wax worse and worse."

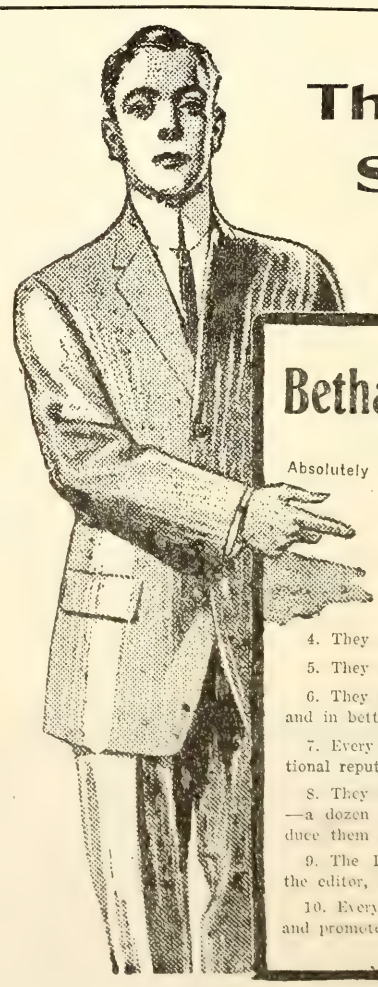
By continually resisting God can we not gradually change our nature?

Do not acts of deliberate rebellion harden into habits, do not habits harden into character and may not character become fixed forever, so that it can be said of a soul "He that is filthy let him be filthy still?" In that paragraph to which I have called attention I do not think that the professor has helped unpenitent men nearer a decision for Christ. Do you?

I seriously doubt if the professor would accept the authoritative word of Jesus on the subject or not, Sincerely,

Kansas City, Mo. JAMES SMALL.

[We do not see any connection between universal salvation and the statement quoted from Professor Guthe. He had in mind no such problem as the destiny of individual souls, but the destiny of the universe. He was confessing his faith in a teleological world, a world that is going somewhere, definitely, and that its goal is good. Such a confession from a teacher whose main intellectual interests lie in the field of physical science is a weighty word indeed on the side of the Christian view of the world. The opposite view among physicists, formerly quite common, was to regard the universe as a mathematically fixed system, a closed circle, with a place for change but none for progress. Mr. Small misconceives Professor Guthe's utterance when he attributes to it the color of theological universalism.—THE EDITORS.]



The Wide-awake Superintendent Says

Bethany Graded Lessons are

Absolutely the Greatest Achievement in the History of Sunday-school Literature.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have coöperated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

A Mission Travel Study Class

Circulars have just been issued announcing the Sixth Oriental Travel Study Class of the University of Chicago. The former classes were intended particularly for biblical students, and included Egypt, Palestine and the other Mediterranean lands; save in 1907, when Professor Willett took a portion of his class to Mt. Sinai. The first went out under Dean Mathews in 1902; the second and third in 1904 and 1907 under Professor Willett; the fourth in 1909 under Professor Price; and the fifth in 1911 under Professor Soares.

The present plan has a much wider scope. It is projected as a survey of mission lands and activities. It will include Japan, China, Korea, Burmah, India, Ceylon, Egypt, Palestine, Asia Minor, and Greece with stops at Honolulu, the Philippines and parts of Arabia.

It will require about eight months, leaving San Francisco in September of the next year, and concluding the work of the class at Rome in the following April or May.

The class will be conducted by Professor H. L. Willett, and will have the same careful supervision, both as to equipment and educational features, that has made the previous classes of the University so successful. The objects of the trip will be two-fold; first to provide a competent knowledge of the countries, religions and missionary activities of those oriental regions where the Christian propaganda is achieving its most notable successes. Second, to contribute to the missionary work of the lands visited such assistance in the way of lectures, studies, institutes and addresses as the leader and members of the class may be able to offer. Both of these features have been approved by some of the leading missionaries in the Orient as eminently practicable and valuable.

The class will visit and study the representative mission stations of the different denominations, including those in the chief centers and some of the remoter districts, and will gain an adequate knowledge of the methods, evangelistic, educational, medical and social, by which the Gospel is interpreted to the oriental world.

The class will probably include about fifteen, and will be definitely limited to twenty. A course of reading, covering the principal subjects of the class work, will be provided for the members during the months preceding departure. The work of the class will be of precisely the same nature as that provided in the class-rooms of the university, with the additional advantages of the field work. The same credits are given for this course as for others in the university. It is understood that the members of the class will be members of the University of Chicago, either by previous residence, or by registration for this course. In exceptional circumstances persons may be admitted to the class who do not wish to obligate themselves to pursue the class work, provided they are sufficiently interested in the program and purposes of the class.

The business management of the class will be in the hands of the well-known firm of H. W. Dunning & Co., Boston, who have had charge of all the details in connection with the various travel classes of the University of Chicago. But the personal management of the class will be entirely in the hands of Professor Willett. Circulars of information will be sent on request.

Religion Among Army and Navy Men

The good deeds of Miss Helen Gould are come upon in many places. An employee in a Chicago packing house was summoned home in the middle of a forenoon, there to find his house in ruin from fire, happily his wife and child safe. In the pocket of his best coat, gone with the other things, there was a New Testament which bore on its fly leaf, Miss Gould's name. The other day the man wrote, telling of his loss, and asking if he could secure another book.

When on board a United States battleship, serving Uncle Sam, the man had received one of the fifteen hundred New Testaments, with the Psalms, handsomely bound in leather for pocket use, which Miss Gould gives annually to men in the service who show by attendance upon Bible classes that they are interested. Completing his term in the navy, the man came to Chicago and secured the packing house job. His wife found the New Testament in his pocket and began to read it. Soon both husband and wife joined a Congregational Church here. The New Testament that was burned had memories attached to it, but alas! it was gone in the fire.

A new New Testament now takes its place. For years Miss Gould herself wrote the inscriptions on the fly leaves, but the number of books grew so great that at least the Scripture passage accompanying her name has now to be printed with a stamp.

The public does not appreciate how great is this Christian work among army and navy men of the United States. Under the conduct of the Army and Navy Branch of the Y. M. C. A. in 1911 there have thus far been held, in the army alone, 890 religious meetings, with 41,866 men in attendance. There have been 968 sessions of Bible classes, with 22,504 men as members. Up to July 1 there were enrolled in the Enlisted Men's Bible and Prayer League 3,674 men. There are what are called church parties. Men in groups go together on Sunday evenings and hear well-known preachers. There have been thus far this year 188 such parties, with 1,693 men composing them.

The total attendance for religious meetings and classes in the army this year is 66,063. Of these 531 men professed determination to lead the Christian life, and 840 joined the Enlisted Men's Abstinence League. It is often found difficult to get men into actual church membership, for they are shifted from one post to another, their terms of enlistment expire, and there are the usual removals found everywhere in civil life.

"A Denominational Promoter"

In some churches the minister is expected to do all the serious thinking on religious subjects and to be the sole leader in every enterprise of the church. The best churches have leaders who are not preachers. These leaders attend to the finances of the church and try to put the church in the front rank of moral forces. The Standard proposes that there be appointed in every church a denominational promoter. Its reasons follow:

There should be in every church a "denominational promoter," one who has been chosen by the official board of the church, and who possesses general information regarding denominational affairs while convinced of the importance of creating a right denominational esprit de corps. The "promoter" should keep the church well informed upon all movements of general interest by looking after and pushing forward the work of every denominational enterprise. The pastor may be able in a general way to keep his people informed of denominational progress, but he has not the time nor should he be expected to become a distributor of literature. One of the chief and most valuable services which a "promoter" could render the church would be that of securing from every family identified with the church a subscription to a denominational paper. Astonishing ignorance is too prevalent among members of churches as to both denominational and religious movements because so many homes have allowed the magazine and the daily press to crowd out the best denominational papers. The family has become indifferent through ignorance and the criminal neglect of the church in having nobody to look after the matter in a businesslike and commendable fashion. In most cases the families do not take their denominational paper, not because they cannot afford it, but for the reason that no one has come to them to present its importance and to forward their subscriptions. Get your "promoter" and then watch results.

The Fate of Reciprocity in Canada

On Sept. 21, the fate of reciprocity between the United States and Canada will be decided. Not that a vote on the bill will be taken in the Canadian parliament at that time, but the people, in general elections, will decide the matter by choosing to parliament a Conservative or a Liberal majority. Premier Laurier is as determined in keeping his pledge to support reciprocity as was President Taft. While reciprocity could once have been easily carried at Ottawa, it is now opposed as it was in the United States. If one in the United States has entertained doubts of any advantage which may accrue to this country through reciprocity, he would be almost convinced of its value by reading the results which will follow the ratification of the measure, as they are presented by the opposition party in Canada. Important as the issue is in establishing an abiding relation of mutual commercial dependence and helpfulness in America, the Canadian opposition persists in injecting a significance which is foreign to it. With the encouragement of England, the point is raised that the issue is loyalty to Great Britain or annexation to the United States. Attention is called to the fact that for forty years the United States refused reciprocity. A national policy of expansion, Canadian opponents claim, is admitted by many prominent United States government officials, and includes annexation of Canada. The sudden desire for reciprocity in the United States is credited to a conciliation policy. In this light an appeal is made to patriotism of loyal Canadians in behalf of the opposition and constitutes its most potent argument. Such reasoning, we believe, is fallacious and should not influence the well informed. The annexation statement made by Speaker Champ Clark in jest, and afterward repudiated by him, is being strained to the breaking point by Canadian politicians. There may be a few expansionists in this country, but the great mass of the people are not anxious to annex Canada. The reciprocity question was put before the people in the recent elections, and the verdict proved only that a desire for friendly coöperation with their northern neighbor exists. Canada is a rapidly-developing country, and the establishment of mutually beneficial relations means much to the future commerce of both countries, for Canada is certain some day to become an important source of food supply for the United States.

Behind the Curtain in Portugal

Although the new republic of Portugal has been in operation for several months, almost nothing is generally known of the conditions which maintain there or of the progress being made in the establishment of a liberal government. The press is muzzled and all dispatches are strictly censored. Reports are, therefore, often conflicting and confusing. The socialistic editor of Humanité felt the necessity of making a tour of Portugal satisfactorily to clear up much that is hidden behind the scenes. He had felt that President Braga is a "bluffer," and that there is a strong opposition element which was ready to rise up in a counter revolution. On the contrary he now reports the country is not "in a condition of growing disorder and permanent anarchy." He continues: "The country is calm, engaged in its ordinary labors, and enjoying prosperity. . . . The citizens know that this country . . . possesses remarkable natural resources. They know that under a wise administration conducted with integrity and economy it will easily free itself from the embarrassment bequeathed to it by the monarchy, and they trust the men raised to power after the revolution as guides in this reformation. The republican sentiment throughout the country has kept up all the intensity of its early enthusiasm, and becomes every day stronger and more confident. . . . I believe that the least attempt at a counter-revolution would find itself confronted by a magnificent uprising of the national forces. All the Portuguese whom I have questionel about monarchist intrigues have spoken of them contemptuously. They have even exhibited anger on the mention of them. Such intrigues do not terrify, but merely make them nervous. . . . They can scarcely control their wrath when they consider that an incapable and spendthrift dynasty, which fell under the weight of the people's hatred and contempt, should so persist in disturbing the reconstruction of the country it had long so scandalously exploited. They are aware that in order to repair the accumulated blunders of the past, to reduce to order the administration and the finances of the country, they will need a long period of toil and of effort, and they are indignant that those who have done so much injury to the nation should still seek to deprive the people of that liberty of mind which is so necessary to them. What are these emigrés but poisonous flies which come back to buzz once more about the fruit they have lost? . . . They will fail miserably in their undertaking, but it is possible that they will deprive the Portuguese revolution of that fine and magnanimous serenity which it has so far enjoyed. And more than this; as the gatherings of Portuguese conspirators on the Spanish soil have excited the mistrust of Portugal almost solely toward the Spanish monarchy, so the crisis may possibly reach such proportions as heedless Europe, which has so often shown herself meddlesome and mean toward the Portuguese republic, may not anticipate." Notwithstanding this emphatic denial of the power of the monarchistic party this week's telegrams appear to show a considerable force of royalists on the frontier ready to attack the government troops. The probability is that both parties are exaggerating their strength.

Now for Parcels Post

The promise of the express companies to give lower and more equitable express rates, and their recent acceptance of the order of the Illinois Railroad and Warehouse Commission to reduce their rates from 10 to 25 percent in intrastate business, are significant in the attitude which they indicate as well as important in the partial relief which they afford at least in one state. Since the government has taken up arms against the extortions of monopoly it has found no more powerful and wily foe than the express trust. Few trusts have been operated more profitably at the expense of the public. In this country the express companies and the United States mail service grew up side by side, but each carries on a distinctive business. In England, and in fact in most other countries, the postal service is extended to the carrying of packages up to twelve pounds in weight, and in some cases those of even greater bulk. There is thus established an express monopoly with exceedingly high rates in this country, and a gradual lowering of rates and betterment of service elsewhere. Good Housekeeping for July presents an illuminating story of a party of Americans who in England "posted" fifteen packages of varying sizes to Liverpool at a total cost in postage of $1.25. When this party reached America $26.50 was required to express these identical packages to their destinations. Two cents a pound is the flat rate in the British Isles. The United States has made no endeavor to nourish a parcels post, but such transportation is bound to come. This country does not now have such privilege because the people do not know of the conveniences of which they are now deprived. Is it generally known that a United States postoffice will accept a package for delivery in a foreign country, or from a foreign country for delivery in this country, weighing twelve pounds, for a flat rate of 12 cents a pound? Are people aware that no package weighing over four pounds can be mailed to any point of this country, and that for such a package a flat rate of transportation of 16 cents a pound must be paid? The foreign post service concession was necessary to coöperation in post service with other countries. Express companies have been powerful enough to prevent extension of post service in this country only because our people, through ignorance, did not demand it. The awakening has been slow, but it is certain now, and the express monopoly, in recognition of it, and in a pacific endeavor, has consented, in some instances, to lower its rates. Congress will probably take up the matter of parcels post legislation this winter. Let no one be deceived, the only way an efficient post service, such as is to be had elsewhere, is to be obtained here is by establishing a federal parcels post, and not through restriction of the demands of private express corporations.

—A considerable falling off of casualties on interstate railways during the quarter ended March 31 last is shown in the accident bulletin for that period, issued by the interstate commerce commission. There were 2,124 persons killed and 16,430 injured during the quarter, including 706 employees killed and 10,974 injured. This is a decrease of 229 in the number killed and of 2,908 in the injured, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year.

—J. S. T. McGowen, Premier of New South Wales, has arrived in this country en route home from the coronation, via the Pacific. He said that the system of equal suffrage in his Australian state had been operated most satisfactorily during the ten years it has been effective. "A higher morality has resulted," he said, "and the home life, on which the vitality of any nation depends, has been strengthened."

Is It Efficiency or "Speeding Up"?

The fast train is a good thing for people that have something to do when they reach their destination. The world would be just as well off if a large number of those who rush from one part of the country to another were traveling in an ox cart or on foot. These persons mistake fuss and noise for work. The "hustler" is useful in the church if he has sense and religion. To hurry just for the sake of hurrying adds nothing to the power of the church. In an address on "Scientific Management and the Church," Dr. Shailer Mathews says:

Contests are arranged between Sunday-school classes or between young men and women or between other groups within the church for the sole purpose of building up membership. There is in this competition no conception of a standard of functional efficiency, but simply the desire to bring as many persons as possible into relationship with the church and, in a general way, under its influences. In many cases such efforts have a seeming success. Attendance upon prayer-meetings, young people's societies, is largely increased, and doubtless some good is thereby accomplished. Such efforts, however, are essentially those of the speeding up process in industry. They are not constructive. There is no training of church members in essential functions, and when once the speeding up process ceases, as, for example, when the minister or Sunday-school superintendent departs, the church very frequently slips back to a lower stage of efficiency.

Pitfalls of the Young Preacher.

President Mullins of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary is one of the wisest friends of young preachers. Lately he has spoken on the question of education. Here are some of the dangers which beset the young minister:

1. First, I name the pitfall of delay in taking a theological course. Many a man imagines that he will take a seminary course after a few years; but he becomes so involved in the work that he finds it impossible to do so.
2. Another pitfall he needs to avoid is the misleading praise of his brethren, who often insist that he needs no special training.
3. The pitfall of the false view that in this age of education he can succeed without special training. If the lawyer and the doctor need special training, so does the minister.
4. The pitfall of premature marriage. Many a young man marries before obtaining his education. Usually this is a mistake, though, of course, the difficulty is often overcome by those who have the will and who come to the seminary after their marriage.
5. I mention next the delusion of an overestimate of self, in considering the needs of the world. The young man entering the ministry, of course feels that his services are very important and that a dying world calls for his prompt entrance upon the work. He forgets, however, that he can do far more in a year, after thorough training, than in a much longer period without the training.

In closing, I mention the case of a young man with whom I talked some time ago, who told me that the greatest mistake of his life was his failure to embrace the opportunity of a theological course a few years previously. With the necessary effort he could have broken away and come to the seminary. He believed, however, that the kingdom could not spare him even temporarily from his work. Then he married, and, according to his testimony to me, it was too late for him to come when he spoke, and henceforth he felt that he would limp all his life because of his lack of preparation. Many a young minister commits this blunder and carries a life-long regret as a consequence. I shall be glad to correspond with any one who may be interested in a theological course.

Methodist

World Conference in Toronto.

Methodists of the world meet in conference in Toronto, October 4 to 17 next, with elected delegates representing England, Ireland, Australia, Canada and America, and visitors numbering thousands. The program, just completed, is based on the theory that Methodism must serve mankind in far larger measure than it has done, and the discussions are intended to see by what means it can do so. Sir Robert W. Perks, the foremost layman in English Methodism, President Haigh of the English Wesleyan Conference, the Rev. Dr. W. H. Fitchett of Australia, and the Rt. Hon. Walter Runciman of the English cabinet are among the speakers from foreign Methodism.

At the very first sessions in Metropolitan Church, where the Conference sits, Methodist achievements will be summed up, but these are to be limited in time. The great emphasis of nearly ten days will be laid on Methodism's tasks for the immediate future in aid of missions, social service, the settlement of theological disputes, Church unity, Bible study, world peace and better government, child welfare, temperance, literature and education, and methods by which laymen and women may help all of these causes in the largest ways, and the number of ministers be increased.

Foremost Methodists of Canada and America are to represent this, the Western section, with Mr. Justice McLaren of the King's Court of the Dominion at the head of the Canadian Methodists and Dr. Henry K. Carroll of New York a leader among American Methodists. One of the Toronto papers will issue a special daily, and city and Dominion are making great preparations. In Canada, Church union has made much progress, and fraternal delegates will speak to the Conference representing Baptists, Congregationalists and Presbyterians.

Not in adherents merely, but in actual members Methodists of the world, represented in this Toronto Conference, number twelve to fourteen millions of persons, and they contribute in the name of Methodism upwards of $75,000,000 a year. The cradle of this vast movement is City Road Chapel, London, where the Rev. John Wesley, once an Episcopal rector in Savannah, Ga., preached; but there is nearing completion in London another headquarters that will rival the world's greatest religious structures. It is on the site of the old Royal Aquarium, and in the company of Westminster Abbey and Westminster Palace.

In foreign missions Methodists lead the whole world in contributions, the Church of England possibly excepted, while in education and many similar lines they are in the forefront. Their growth on the Continent of Europe, in Italy, Russia, Sweden, even Roumania and Austria, is marked and steady, and lately they have set out to regain that once Christian territory, Northern Africa. Conferences like the Toronto one are held each decade, the approaching one being the third.

Turbine or Angel.

A good deal of what is called spirituality ought to go by some other name. We try by mechanical contrivances to lay hold upon the deep things of the spirit. The saints of old came to their knowledge of God by the way of inward conflict. They never found peace by shouting hallelujahs or by singing rollicking songs. The attempt to save the world by shunning serious thinking is thus discussed by the Central Advocate:

Mr. Russell Maltby observed not long ago that Methodists having heard that an angel comes down and troubles the waters, contrived to put a turbine in the waters and run it by electricity in order that the waters may always be troubled. Mr. Maltby suggested that we take the turbine out and wait for the angel.

Stripped of its metaphor we may see in this a hint concerning some of the so-called Pentecostal meetings which have been held at our Annual Conference sessions. Have they not been mechanical, noisy, forced? They have put in the human dynamo when they should have waited rather for the angel. Pentecost was first of all an awaiting. It was continuing steadfastly in prayer until the fulness of time. Our so-called Pentecostal services are altogether too often scenes of pressure rather than scenes of waiting; and wherever this is the case they can but be a mixed and doubtful good. Meetings for the deepening of the religious life are so valuable and so needed in this day, that they should form a permanent part of the Conference program. The coming of an Annual Conference to a community ought to mark the coming of the angel for the healing of the flood. God grant it may be so this year. God grant that the morning watch and the afternoon meetings may be such, for many a life, a passing through the deep cloister of the heart, searching it, seeing it as it is, stripping it of its self illusions, its unconscious hypocrisies, its slowness to appropriate and receive the blessing of the Holy One, a stepping into the pool prepared by God's Angel. This will make the coming of the Annual Conference a period of healing and imperishable memories to the community and to the brothers of the ministry also. This dynamo furore is dust and ashes compared to this.

The cycle of the dynamo-run-by-human-electricity, which has passed as Pentecostal services, has about run its course. Again, now, we will begin to make much of the morning watch together. In the cool and radiant miracle of the early morning the Angel will touch that pool. Again we will frequent the place of private and collective prayer. Again we will sit in the secret place of the Most High. And again, blessed be God, we expect to see come back the sweet and deep, the fresh assurance that we are His and He is our own.

God grant the ministry and all the people of the fall Conferences such a Pentecost—even in this year of Thy visitation, oh Lord our God. May the Angel touch the waters and may we all be cleansed and blessed anew.

My Struggle With Temptation

"The proud words of Julian, 'I die without remorse, as I lived without sin,' we might possibly utter before an earthly tribunal, but can we utter them before the tribunal of our own conscience, before the tribunal of God?" The standard of judgment, to which reference is made in the above quotation from Friedrich Paulsen, has been given to man by Christianity. We judge ourselves by the justice and holiness of God incarnate in Jesus. Whatever tends to the withdrawal of attention from this standard and to forgetfulness of it is a temptation. Men without knowledge of God may not feel the force of temptation, for they may have no standard by which to measure their conduct.

The prophet is tempted to become harsh in his estimates of his contemporaries. He sees the state, the church, the school, or the world as it ought to be and will be. The people about him do not understand the vision. They know him only as a disturber. The old ways are good enough for them. They magnify the good in things as they are. There is dread of change. The prophet magnifies the evil in the ancient customs and creeds. He cannot believe that anybody who is not a scoundrel or a fool will turn a deaf ear to his word. Now all good men are prophets—in spots. There are common fallacies which they wish to expose and there are evil institutions which they wish to overthrow. Hence the sin to which the prophet is inclined is apt to overtake every good man.

If the prophet looks with suspicion upon the patient plodder who is building commonly accepted ideas of morality and religion into human lives and institutions, the latter is tempted to lose himself in the details of administration and the technicalities of instruction and to become unmindful of the larger good without which the machinery of government and the methods of education are useless. The school system becomes more important than the children. The party organization becomes sacred notwithstanding the lack of ideals that give a party the right to exist. There is zeal for the forms of worship and for sound doctrine when neither worship nor doctrine are vitally connected with daily experience.

The peril of the crowd must be met by the normal person. Unless we are sensitive to the opinions and feelings of the time in which we live we are less than men. Ignorance of what our neighbors think and feel is one of the last things to excite our pride. Indifference or contempt for popular sentiments is not a mark of greatness or saintliness. But herein is danger. The demagogue plays upon the momentary passions of the crowd. We are often most noisy about what is least important. The statesman appeals to what is deep and permanent in experience. He must often seem to be against the people. His view is the long view and includes the policies that will endure the test of time. The conduct of our neighbors at a dog fight or a revival is significant, but we cannot learn all we need to know of human nature at dog fights and revivals. The intense interest at both is not abiding. We must observe the hunter with his dogs, the shepherd and his faithful helper, the child and his playmate, the woman at home guarded by the watchdog, before we understand how men feel toward dogs. And religion has other forms of expression than ejaculations of praise. Yet we are in danger of judging religion by the revival and not the revival by its fruits in daily life.

Shrewd men need an unusually good conscience to keep them from laying tribute upon the honest worker who knows of but one way of trading, and that is, to tell the truth and the whole truth about what is put on the market. The great fortunes of this age are not all monuments of the industry of the men who possess them; they too often represent the skill of their owners in getting hold of what the toil of other men has created. Every little town has its men who live by shrewd bargaining that really robs the toilers. When to shrewdness is added the power of wealth, the temptation to live by the sweat of other men's faces is very great.

The weak man has to guard against the suggestion that his lack of success is due to the evil designs of his supposed rivals. It is common for this sort of man to rail against friends who have risked reputation and money that they might help him. Where the weakness is moral, they have had to stand abuse and the charge of cowardice in return for their efforts to help him. For giving an inefficient man another chance they have been accused of inefficiency. We have won a great victory when we discover our own weaknesses and are able to see clearly how they interfere with our advancement. [Midweek Service, Sept. 27. Illinois Missionary Society's New President

The election of Professor Silas Jones, associate editor of The Christian Century, to the presidency of the Illinois Missionary Society for the coming year, gives occasion to his co-laborers to express their appreciation of this rare man. For many years he has contributed an article each week on the prayer-meeting topic, an article upon which many a prayer-meeting speech is based and which always interprets some truth of the spiritual life helpfully to every reader.

One of the most popular departments of the paper is page five, devoted to interdenominational acquaintance. Mr. Jones edits this page and puts into it that fine flavor of tolerance and appreciation so characteristic of his mind. It is patent that the unity of the church waits upon acquaintance. Our denominationalism is nine-tenths provincialism. Doctrinal differences do not divide us so much as misconceptions of one another. We need to look into one another's faces and hear one another's voices. In lieu of this, reading one another's words will help us to cultivate the spirit of unity. This Mr. Jones is doing for readers of The Christian Century in his department "The Christian World."

Professor Jones lives in Eureka where he is professor of Philosophy and Psychology in Eureka College. He is just as popular with the students as with our readers. His heart is lost to Eureka. Lacking any other spouse he seems to regard himself as married to Eureka College, for all the charms of other schools cannot tempt him away. Only a month ago he declined the headship of an educational institution in another state, choosing to remain with Eureka and in Illinois.

The convention to be held next year in Centralia will be honored by his presidency.

A Letter From Wm. D. Ryan

From a considerable number of inquiries and criticisms dealing with virtually the same point the following communication has been selected as typical. It is written by one of the most thoughtful and earnest-minded of our younger ministers:

Editors The Christian Century: As I contemplate one of our churches actually practicing the policy in regard to baptism you so ably advocate, I cannot but foresee inconsistencies even more glaring than those with which we are all too familiar now. I am writing not in any critical mood but in the hope that you can dissolve some of my difficulties in seeing the feasibility of the plan. Let me present some of them in a concrete way:

It is Sunday morning. In one of our churches, a Presbyterian and a Quaker have come forward to be received by letter into the membership of the church. The pastor says, in effect, to the Presbyterian: "This church practices immersion as the only baptism, but since you have been baptized by sprinkling satisfactorily to yourself, we will not go behind the returns. We gladly receive you into our fellowship." And to the Quaker he says: "This church believes in immersion as the only baptism, but since you have not been sprinkled we must go back of the returns. You must permit us to immerse you. Then you will be received." Another has come forward to confess Christ. He halts at the immersion dogma, which the new method has removed for others but not for him. He then goes for his baptism to some church practicing affusion, comes back and is duly received into membership.

Of course I need not point out the absurdity of this procedure, though it would be quite possible in the regime you advocate, as I understand it. You will thus see my need of enlightenment. I am still unable to see that consistency would be gained by acknowledging the validity of an act done by another which on conscientious grounds I refuse to do myself.

I feel sure your frank, vigorous discussion of the question of baptism is contributing helpfully toward the solution of our problem. With every good wish, I am heartily yours,

Youngstown, Ohio. WM. D. RYAN.

The inconsistencies in the procedure which Mr. Ryan describes are many and flagrant. For a church to say, "in effect," the things put into the above hypothetical pastor's mouth would surely land it in endless confusion. The function of receiving new members into such a church would call for ridiculously nice distinctions leading often to great embarrassment if not to actual division.

Such troubles, however, would not grow out of any "policy in regard to baptism" advocated by The Christian Century. The procedure described by Mr. Ryan is totally unlike that advocated by this paper and only superficially unlike the sectarian practice against which this paper contends.

A procedure that raises the baptism question at all in the case of a member of the church of Christ who desires to have fellowship with us is essentially a sectarian procedure. For a congregation of Disciples to receive into its fellowship a Presbyterian because he was "baptized by sprinkling satisfactorily to himself" is just as much a sectarian procedure, in principle, as to deny him admittance on the ground that he has not been immersed.

There is only one question that may properly be asked concerning one who presents himself for membership in a congregation of Disciples: Is he a Christian, a member of the church of Christ?

If he is not a Christian, there is but one procedure scripturally possible: He should be asked concerning his faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and upon his profession of faith he should be straightway inducted into the body of Christ, that is, baptized.

But if he is already a Christian, a member of the Church of Christ, there is likewise only one procedure compatible with the will of Christ: He should be received with joy into fullest fellowship.

The Christian Century insists that a congregation which sets out to practice Christian unity under the sovereignty of Christ has no need nor right to raise the question of baptism as a possible bar to any member of the Church of Christ who applies for fellowship.

To deny admittance to such an applicant because his baptism is defective is to usurp the prerogative of Christ and to contradict His will. For whatever is to be said about the applicant's baptism, whether it be regular or defective, the fact is that Christ has received him into His church and no man or congregation has the right to treat him as an outsider.

The true reason for receiving such an applicant into fellowship is not that he was baptized by immersion, nor that his "sprinkling is satisfactory to himself," but that he is already a full member of the Church of Christ, as truly such as is the Disciple pastor who assumes to pronounce on his baptism.

Let us take up one at a time the three candidates mentioned in Mr. Ryan's communication.

First, the Presbyterian. The pastor is made to say in effect: "This church practices immersion as the only baptism, but since you have been baptized by sprinkling, satisfactorily to yourself, we will not go behind the returns. We gladly receive you into our fellowship."

Such a speech would be, to our mind, entirely irrelevant and misleading. There is no more occasion for talking about the form of baptism practiced by the church or making an apology for the applicant's form of baptism than there is to say: "This church raises its funds by tithing, but since your method of giving to the Lord is satisfactory to yourself we will not go behind the returns but gladly receive you," etc. Or, "This church believes in free will, but since your belief in divine decrees is satisfactory to yourself," etc., etc.

The pastor of a church deeply in earnest in its desire to practice Christian union would say, in effect:

"This church strives to practice Christian union. I have in my hand a letter from a sister church of Christ, Presbyterian by name, certifying that Brother Blank is a member with them in good standing and full fellowship, and commending him to the Christian love, fellowship and oversight of any church of Christ to which he presents this credential. We do not think for a moment of going behind this credential to inquire about his creed or the church's creed or the form by which this brother's induction into the church was signalized. It is enough for us to know that the church which issues this letter is a church of Christ and that he is a member of it. As such we joyfully extend him the right hand of fellowship."

Next, the Quaker. Why Mr. Ryan's hypothetical church practicing immersion only should be willing to receive an applicant baptized by sprinkling, "satisfactorily to himself," and refuse admittance to an applicant baptized without the use of water, equally "satisfactorily to himself," we do not understand. As to the proper form of baptism the Quaker is no more irregular than the Presbyterian —from the point of view of a church practicing immersion only; and on the ground of good conscience in his baptism he has just as much to commend him as has his Presbyterian brother. Why, then, should there be such a discrimination even on the basis which Mr. Ryan erroneously attributes to The Christian Century?

But this, of course, is not the crucial question to raise with respect to the Quaker who applies for membership in a church striving to practice Christian union. That question is precisely the same as in the case of the Presbyterian: Is he a Christian, a member of the church of Christ? If he is, he should be treated as such. If not, he should be made one.

The Christian Century has no hesitancy in saying, and rejoices in the opportunity to say, that a Friends' church is a church of Christ, that its members are Christians, members of the true church of Christ and that a letter from one of its congregations should be honored at its face value by every church of Christ. The same speech of welcome made to the Presbyterian should, therefore, be made to the Quaker.

Lastly comes one to confess Christ. He is not a member of the church, but desires to become such. "He halts at the immersion dogma," says our correspondent in describing him. But where does he find an immersian dogma? Certainly not in the procedure advocated by The Christian Century. Upon no point have we been more insistent than that immersion must be freed from its dogmatic interpretation and allowed to take its natural place in the ritual of initiation into the new life.

Perhaps Mr. Ryan has used the word "dogma" here inadvertently, meaning only to say that the candidate halts at the act of immersion on account of its seeming inconvenience. Most likely this is his meaning, inasmuch as the candidate "goes for his baptism to some church practicing affusion, comes back and is duly received into membership." This seems to Mr. Ryan a very absurd procedure.

And so it does to us. It is a caricature. It is trifling with holy relationships. It is mocking God and the church. The strange thing about this suggested procedure is that anybody could take it as a serious possibility in the sphere of religion. It is conceivable that in the sphere of business or of politics or of jurisprudence a seeming technicality like this might be taken advantage of. But in religion no such obviously immoral subterfuge need be anticipated.

Let us see what moral obstacles stand in the way of the procedure which the clever candidate above is described as adopting:

First of all is his own conscience. His act of becoming a Christian and uniting with the church is essentially an act of conscience. As a sincere and earnest seeker after God he is in no mood to plan a course of indirection, of double-dealing, with those who are to be his brethren. He comes as a penitent, seeking to be inducted into the fellowship of God's people; he will therefore humbly accept the reasonable rite of initiation into the freemasonry of the saints in the same spirit as a candidate for admittance into any social relationship submits to the accepted form, thinking, meantime, not about the form as such, but about the new relationship into which he is entering and of which the form is token and pledge. No man truly fit to unite with the church could gain the consent of his own soul to the unethical and unsocial procedure described above.

Then he must gain the consent of the neighboring pastor to sprinkle him. This will be difficult to do when the purpose is frankly acknowledged. Such an act by, for example, a neighboring Presbyterian pastor, would make him a participant in the trickery of the candidate. It would outrage the most elemental canons of comity between congregations. It is unthinkable that common courtesy alone would not suffice to inhibit such a pastor from performing such a ceremony, which, besides all else, would be hollow and meaningless.

And, finally, he must gain the consent of the church with which he wishes to unite. A congregation and pastor with any sensitiveness whatever to moral values would resent such an act of imposture. Such an applicant is not truly a member of the church from which it is assumed he now brings a letter. He has begun what purports to be the Christian life with an un-Christian act. He has complied neither with the formal requirements of church membership nor with the moral requirements. He would not be received, and should not be.

We would not deal in such detail with a point so obvious as this were it not that many others besides Mr. Ryan have urged it as an inhibitive reason against the practice of Christian unity. On examination its purely fictitious character is revealed. It is a sheer bugaboo. Such a course would not be possible in the "regime" we advocate. It would be a technical violation of the principle of unity. But even if it were not a technical violation, the moral considerations involved are sufficient to guard the church against such subversion of its practices.

But suppose there were sporadic cases of this sort. Would such instances be the first in which insufficient or immoral motives have brought men into the church? Would these be the only instances of unbaptized persons on the membership roster? Of course not, and no point of this character can be urged against the practice of Christian union which cannot with equal force be made against any present practice of receiving members into the visible church.

In the light of what has been said Mr. Ryan can easily enough anticipate our response to the statement of his fundamental difficulty. He says, "I am still unable to see that consistency would be gained by acknowledging the validity of an act done by another which on conscientious grounds I refuse to do myself."

1. Mr. Ryan does already acknowledge the validity of Presbyterian baptism, does he not? The Christian Century is not unique among the Disciples in this acknowledgment. All representative Disciples acknowledge it. Mr. Ryan believes with us and with his Disciple brethren that baptism as administered in Presbyterian churches does induct men truly into the church of Christ. It is valid.

And yet he and we and the Disciples generally refuse to practice baptism in the way the Presbyterians usually practice it. And our reason is a "conscientious" one. But the reason is not because such baptism is invalid, but because it is irregular or defective, as it seems to us Disciples, and we cannot conscientiously participate in it. The Christian Century does not ask Mr. Ryan and the Disciples to accept a new view of baptism: It simply urges that we base our practice on the view commonly held among us from the beginning.

2. But the plain duty of the Disciples toward unimmersed Christians who apply for fellowship must not be obscured by academic discussions over baptism. Even though Mr. Ryan or the Disciples generally should not agree with The Christian Century in its distinction between validity and regularity as applied to baptism, they do agree with us in the acknowledgment that Presbyterians and the others are Christians, members of the church of Christ.

This acknowledgment the Disciples must reckon with, and practically this is the only point that need be faced. It may be that some will grant that Presbyterians are members of Christ's church and yet be unwilling to concede that they have been baptized.

But if anybody can explain how a Presbyterian Christian became a member of the church of Christ without baptism, he is not thereby relieved of the duty to practice Christian unity with such a Christian. The basis of fellowship and unity with him is not that he has been baptized, but that he is already a member of Christ's church, and being such, no congregation can withhold fellowship from him without thereby declaring itself sectarian.

This distinction between the baptism question and the practice of Christian unity it is important to make. The baptism question is an academic controversy, for the most part. Christian union is an immediate, practical duty. The baptism question is a question of human opinion. The practice of Christian unity rests upon the plain will of Christ.

A church that refuses to practice unity with Christians whom Christ the Head has received into His body is a maker of schism in that body. The Disciples of Christ cannot, in the light of their origin and history, consent to bear the brand of schismatics.

Mr. Ryan's letter has included so many points made by others and has stated them in such concrete form and with such precision that it has seemed desirable to respond to his inquiries thus fully.

Do Not Like Their Reputation

Des Moines, Ia., churches, do not like the reputation given them by the mischief-making group of fourteen who signed a petition asking the Foreign Missionary Society to recall Guy W. Sarvis from his appointment to the University of Nankin and who are now lending their names to the Christian Standard's wicked campaign to deplete the treasury of the Missionary Society. Finis S. Idleman, pastor of Central Church, writes in his paper, the Christian Worker, "It is not at all fair to Des Moines churches that we should have had a heresy trial in our midst. Neither is it fair to permit the church life of our city to rest under the imputation of being back of this protest with any sort or semblance of support. A casual inquiry will reveal the deepest conviction of protest against that protest." Dr. Charles S. Medbury, pastor of University Church, wrote a letter to the Executive Committee of the Foreign Society, "protesting against the protest," and urging that Mr. Sarvis be sent. "In God's name," he said, "hurry him forward. I will trust him and I think I love the cause we stand for as much as any man. The need is so great, trust the man and send him on." The state of Iowa and its capital city are in a bad way since its state paper, The Christian Union, was sold out to the Christian Standard. By this move the Standard's power has been greatly increased in the state, and it is using this power in a most wanton and reckless fashion. But the fact that State Secretary B. S. Denny and State Superintendent of Sunday-schools W. T. Fisher have allied themselves with the Standard's unholy cause must not be regarded by those outside the state as indicative of the attitude of the true leaders of Iowa Disciples. Mr. Nichols, formerly editor of The Christian Union, and now Iowa editor of the Christian Standard, is certainly delivering the goods to the man that bought him. Iowa's revolt against this iniquity will be vigorous and decisive when it comes, and it cannot be long delayed.

The Changing Problem of Religion

The old problems are fading out—problems of metaphysical theology, problems of the strict conformity of the church to an assumed primitive model, problems of the interpretation of texts.

New problems engage men's souls—problems of the meaning of this warm, actual inner life of the soul; problems of character and human welfare in the social order; and as to the church, there seems to be a disposition to demand as her supreme virtue not institutional conformity to a model but actual efficiency on behalf of human life.

That the Disciples do rightly value the golden treasure committed to them for just the opportunity of this new day, and that they will wisely invest it in behalf of the true unity of the church is apparent to anyone who meets their leaders with sympathy and frankness.

The Moral Leaders of Israel

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XXXIX. Prophetic Voices in Judah (Isa. 56-66)

October 1. Text for Special Study, Isa. 61.

1. THE LONG DAYS.

The Book of Isaiah naturally divides itself into three sections. The first (1-39) is, with certain easily traced exceptions, a product of the age of Isaiah the prophet, whose activity was contemporary with the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah in Judah, and extended in round numbers from 740 to 700 B. C. The second section (40-55) deals with the period of the exile, and probably dates from about 545 B. C.

The third section (56-66) reflects a still different situation. The people of Judah are again in the old land of Palestine, although many remain in the east, and ought to return to assist in the full restoration of Jerusalem (57:14, 62:10). The temple has been rebuilt in the holy mountain of Zion (57:15, 66:6), but of late it has been damaged by fire or the assaults of enemies, and is almost ruined as a sanctuary (64:10, 11). The bright prospects of earlier days in which the temple was rebuilt have not been realized. For too brief a time did the people possess again their place of worship (63:18). The walls yet remain to be built (60:10), but there are hopes that the nation shall be strengthened by the arrival of fresh auxiliaries from Babylonia, and others yet besides, whose fortunes shall be joined with those of Zion (56:6-8).

There are two enemies who meet specific denunciation in these chapters. One is Edom, the hereditary foe of Judah, whose outrages have more than once roused the prophets and psalmists to vehement outcries for vengeance (See section XXXII of this series). It is the hope of these prophetic voices that when the Messianic conqueror comes to deliver Judah from her enemies he will come drenched in the blood of Edom (63:1-6). The other foe is not so specifically named, but seems even more definitely the object of scorn and hatred. This people makes its chief seat a lofty mountain, where it offers sacrifices. It is a bastard nation, impure in blood and unclean in its conduct, insulting and outrageous in its treatment of Judah. Moreover, it has sent messengers to the distant king of Persia to throw obstacles in the way of Judah's growth. It might have been supposed, from its origin, that it would have more fear of God and higher respect for the holy people. But on the contrary it has perverted its way and practiced evil continually (57:1-13). It is difficult to resist the impression that the people so described are the Samaritans, whose position and hostile attitude toward Judah were of just the sort indicated.

If these hints are to be trusted, the chapters under review appear to have come from that age in which the problem of Jerusalem's revival was still acute, the state of the community most depressing, the opposition of enemies persistent and threatening, and the hope of final success dimmed by present perplexities. It is not improbable that at some period during the Persian age Jerusalem was subjected to fresh outrage and spoliation, and the temple, about the only important public building, plundered. That such was the fact can only be conjectured from repeated hints in the dateless sections of Old Testament literature. At the best it can only be called probable. But the attitude of both Edomites and Samaritans is sufficiently well known to warrant the dating of these chapters somewhere in the Persian time, probably before the coming of Nehemiah to assume the governorship of Judah.

2. SINS OF HEATHENISM.

But if the date of these chapters is obscure, their meaning is fairly clear. The people have fallen upon evil days. In so far as the regular offices of religion are performed, they are merely formal and of no value in the winning of character. The Sabbath is profaned even by those who profess to keep it (56:2; 58:13); fasting, the practice that grew up in the exile, is only a cloak for contention and wickedness (58:3-8); acts of violence are frequent, and falsehood is on every lip (59:1-15). These are the sins that grow on the soil of national failure and depression. As in the days of Malachi, the conditions are so disappointing that the people question whether the service of God is at all worth while. Did not the earlier prophets promise that the close of the exile should be the end of all their troubles? Was there not confident assurance that Jehovah would cast up a highway by which he would lead his people home from the far lands of their exile? Why, then, had none of these dreams come true? Even such obedience as the most faithful had rendered seemed of no avail, and the people asked why they should further attempt the worship of God (58:3).

But an age of trouble and disillusionment easily becomes one of superstition and reliance upon heathenish and unholy rites. The base and obscene practices of the nature religions about easily crept in. At no previous period had the people degenerated to such acts of fetishism and superstition. Our section of the Book of Isaiah is an interesting record of some of the abuses to which religion may be subjected at the hands of a credulous and shallow people, who have met disappointment in the pursuit of their time-honored national faith, and have had recourse to the crude forms of heathenism.

Chapters 65 and 66 contain many references to such debasing customs as would have filled the enlightened men of happier days with contempt and deep concern for the safety of the land. Mention is made of sacrificing in gardens, burning incense upon bricks, sitting among graves, lodging in vaults, eating swine's flesh, preparing a table for God (fortune), pouring wine for Meni (destiny), sacrificing the dog, blessing idols, walking in magical processions, and the use of other vile and obscure acts and creatures in the supposed ritual of a debased religion. To such unhappy days had Judah come in her decline from a strong and living faith.

To be sure it is not always possible to determine just what is meant by these references. Something must be left to the imagination, and something may be charged up to the strong detestation of the prophet. But the general nature of the religion thus described is not difficult to estimate. It was an age in which shallow faith mingled with rankest self-delusion in the production of a vain and superficial cultus. And those who still retained a stable and intelligent faith must have sighed in weariness and chagrin.

3. PROPHETIC REBUKES.

Whether the messages of Isa. 56-66 proceed from a single prophet or from a group of religious teachers may be an open question. The different sections of the work reveal great varieties of sentiment. There are voices of rebuke, denunciation, warning, scorn, wistfulness, yearning, expectancy, promise and confident, rapturous assurance. These are not inconsistent with unity of authorship, though their differences might suggest a reasonable doubt on that point.

Some of the specific sins of the age have been named already. But there appears again the familiar indictment of unworthy leaders so often voiced by the earlier prophets. The watchmen of Israel are blind, they are dumb dogs that cannot bark, dreaming, lying down, loving to slumber (56:10). They have forgotten their tasks of leadership, and have turned to the sordid joys of self-indulgence (56:12). Formality takes too much the place of a spontaneous delight in good (58:10, 11). The people have become as one that is unclean. None calls upon God or stirs himself to take hold of Jehovah (64:6, 7). It is to a rebellious people that God spreads out his hand (65:2). In such a time there is no virtue in the formal exercises of religion. What does it avail to kill an ox, sacrifice a lamb or offer an oblation? It is as if these facts were the common practices of the false worship, unless the motive be right (66:3).

4. PROPHETIC ENCOURAGEMENTS.

But with all the words of rebuke and warning there is abundance of hope and courage It is the duty of the prophet to combat the current skepticism and despair of his age. It is useless to warn men against the neglect of a God in whom they no longer believe. The prophet's first mission is always to affirm his own unquenchable faith in God and in the stability of a moral universe. If he can win his people back to a deeper faith in the Most High, he can hope to reform their manners and correct their religious customs. Therefore the dominant note of these prophetic messages, as of most of those of earlier days, is confident hope of the future. And no part of the prophetic literature contains loftier strains of joyous expectancy than these chapters. If they yield to the First Isaiah in robust and insistent belief in a present reign of righteousness, and to the Second Isaiah in the vision of the Suffering Servant of God, they are superior to either in their confident expectation of Judah's future glory when the days of purgation and trial shall end.

The pictures of the High and Holy One that inhabiteth eternity (57:15), the restoration of all things to more than pristine beauty (58:9-14), the glorious day of future prosperity; when the last of the exiles shall return, and Zion shall be filled with the merchandise and the homage of the nations (60:1-23), the ceaseless and unresting demand that Jehovah shall bless Jerusalem with strength and peace (62:1-9), and the confidence that her foes shall be destroyed (63:1-6, 57:13), and her prosperity be perpetual (65:13-25), in holy Scripture. And if they are mingled with the darker pictures of judgment upon apostates and heathen, it is only to make them more effective by contrast. Nowhere are the visions of punishment upon sin darker nor the blessings of holiness more convincing than in these chapters. And in this fact they prove their right, though anonymous, to a place in that great anthology of prophecy which bears the name of Isaiah.

5. THE PROGRAM OF THE NEW DAY. (Isa. 61.)

It is difficult to choose the most valuable among such majestic messages as these. But perhaps the one selected for our special study has the right of pre-eminence by reason of its choice by the Master on one of the most significant days of his career (Luke 4:16-22).

The prophet is familiar with the great words of the past. The unknown preacher of the exile had spoken of Israel as the Servant of Jehovah. The seer of these chapters, concerned beyond all things else, to have Jerusalem take seriously her task of spiritual leadership, puts into these great sentences his conception of the Servant's mission to the world. For that mission the divine spirit has been conferred upon him. He is to perform the work of an interpreter of God. The poor, unreached in the current plans of religion, are to have the good tidings brought to them. The distressed are to be comforted, the confined are to be set free, and the good time of God's favor is to be made known.

In such a time Zion is to come to her true strength. The desolate places are to be rebuilt, and the shame of the past is to be forgotten in the glory of the present and future. And the chapter closes with a song of praise to God for his wonderful fulfilment of his holy purposes through his Servant.

In this oracle, as in those of Isa. 40-55 concerning the Servant, it is clear that the renewed and redeemed nation is meant. But as in the former case, it is apparent that the full value of the Servant's task was neither appreciated nor undertaken by the Hebrew people. It was Jesus alone who was sufficiently sensitive to the greatness and difficulty of the task, and to the need of its accomplishment both for Israel and for the world, to accept its responsibility and carry it onward to success. In virtue of that fact he laid his hand on these words in the synagogue at Nazareth, and to the astonishment and indignation of the Jews present, affirmed that in him and his ministry the prophecy came to its true fulfilment.

One of the great interpreters of Christianity to our age, Henry Drummond, has called these words the "Program of Christianity." That they contain the message for our age there can be no question. They outline and organize the mission of the church in an age of question, discouragement, bondage and depression. And thus the utterance of a Hebrew prophet in the dark days of Judah's slow revival became the text and platform of the Greatest of the Prophets, and prove themselves not for Israel alone, but for every age and all mankind.

FOLLOWING STUDIES.

The theme of Section XL will be "Nehemiah and the Rebuilding of the Walls," and of XLI. "Ezra and the Priestly Law."

TOPICS FOR FURTHER STUDY, REPORTS AND PAPERS.

1. The divisions of the Book of Isaiah.
2. The foes of Judah in the Persian age.
3. Forms of superstition and nature-worship referred to in Isa. 56-66.
4. The literary unity of Isa. 56-66.
5. The value of this section as a program for the revived Jerusalem.
6. The value of this section as a program for the modern world.

QUESTIONS.

1. What are the sections of the Book of Isaiah?
2. What is the general situation which forms the background of Chapters 56-66?
3. What are the two chief enemies of Judah in this period?
4. What date can be assigned to these chapters?
5. What is the mood of the nation as reflected in these messages?
6. What had induced this state of mind?
7. What elements of a low and debasing nature had entered the religious practice of the age?
8. Name some of the superstitious practices described.
9. What literary problem appears in connection with these chapters?
10. What are some of the sins charged against the people of Judah?
11. What was the ground of the prophet's appeal to the people?
12. How do these chapters compare with other parts of the prophetic writings?
13. What are some of the most important promises contained in Isa. 56-66?
14. What fact makes chapter 61 specially significant?
15. What does the prophet regard as the mission of the Servant of Jehovah?
16. What blessings were promised to Judah as the result of the Servant's work?
17. Who is supposed to be speaking in Chapter 61?
18. What use did Jesus make of these words?
19. In what sense do the words apply to Israel?
20. In what sense do they refer to Jesus?

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

J. A. Bough, minister at Elkhart, has begun a revival meeting in his home church.

G. W. Burnett has resigned his pastorate at Summum, and will conclude his work there the last of the year.

A new church has recently been organized in Quincy, and a pastor will be employed at once.

The remodeled church building at DeLand will be dedicated the last Sunday in September. The pastor is George W. Wise.

Ipava Church is represented in Eureka College by three young people, one of whom is preparing for the ministry.

C. W. Freeman and his congregation at West Frankfort will be assisted in a revival meeting by J. A. Clemens, of Casey, in October.

West Salem Church, with G. W. Ford as pastor, is to have the assistance of W. E. Moyer, of St. Francisville, in an evangelistic meeting for October.

The Young Ladies' Missionary Circle of Arcola Church is supporting a native helper on the foreign field, in addition to the regular work of the organization.

J. G. Waggoner is having frequent additions to his church at Canton at the regular services. During the pastor's absence in the summer, W. O. McPheters preached several times.

O. W. Lawrence, of Central Church, Decatur, has been for several weeks seriously ill with pneumonia. He is convalescing and will soon be able to resume his pastoral duties.

The Stewardson meeting, conducted by J. E. Story and J. E. Stout, and which lasted three weeks, was concluded with a total of one hundred and thirty-one additions, one hundred and ten of these being on confession of faith.

A union meeting, held with the Methodists at Brocton, where C. Floyd Shaul is pastor, resulted in more than one hundred conversions and the life of the community improved. The evangelists were C. P. Carlin and Mary Olive.

B. F. Cato has been pastor of the church at Lawrenceville for one year, during which time the church has liquidated a debt of $4,000, and made a substantial progress in other directions. The second year of this pastor's service is beginning with very bright prospects.

The congregation at Edinburg is in a prosperous condition, under the ministry of B. H. Sealock. The annual rally day was recently observed with Secretary J. Fred Jones present and delivering addresses, in addition to a sermon on Sunday afternoon by John R. Golden of West Side Church, Springfield.

Lew D. Hill and helpers will hold a meeting in October at Marshall, with J. A. Sweet. Mr. Hill is at present in a union meeting at Dalton City, where at last reports there have been thirty conversions. Prior to the Humboldt meeting, the evangelists will assist in a short revival at Antioch, near Decatur, where N. S. Haynes preaches.

The Livingston County Ministerial and Laymen's Association, which meets at Pontiac, where B. W. Tate preaches, passed a resolution deploring the fact that Secretary Wilson of the Department of Agriculture had accepted the vice-presidency of the Brewers' Congress to be held in Chicago. A copy of the resolution was sent to Secretary Wilson, to President Taft, and to the press.

L. A. Chapman, pastor of Carmi Church, would be glad to exchange meetings with another pastor during the fall or winter.

The young men of George W. Schroeder's church at Bridgeport are planning to maintain a public reading room, as soon as the new church building is dedicated. This is a demonstration of practical service for the community.

The Christian Century was in error last week in reporting the revival meeting of Mrs. Sarah McCoy Crank. The place where the meeting is being held is Blue Mound, instead of Maroa. The latest report indicates fifteen additions, with the end of the meeting several days off.

The church at Waynesville celebrated the double anniversary of its pastor's birthday and the preaching of his first sermon, which occurred sixteen years ago. The pastor is F. L. Davis, who will hold his own meeting in October. Both the pastor and the Sunday-school superintendent were sent to the State Convention, at the expense of the congregation.

The church of which William Price is pastor in Peoria, Howett Street, has purchased a site for a new building on account of the inadequacy of its present structure, both for the services of worship and the Sunday-school. This congregation is ministering to the needs of the community and is finding unusual response from the citizens to its progressive work.

During the six and a half year pastorate of L. G. Huff at LaHarpe, there were three hundred and twenty-four additions to the church. The congregation now has an enrollment of nearly four hundred. At the concluding service of Mr. Huff's pastorate, before he departed for Mt. Sterling, the congregation made him a gift of a gold watch as an evidence of appreciation of character and service.

R. H. Robertson, pastor of Shelbyville Church, assisted the church at Windsor for one week in a meeting following a union revival, which was held by Kirkland and Leonard. Of the nearly three hundred conversions from the revival, nearly one-half expressed a preference for the Disciples' church. The Windsor congregation has been so enlarged by the meeting that henceforth they will be able to employ a minister for full time.

J. F. Rosborough, who relinquished recently the pastorate at Centralia and who is now located at Clinton, held two short meetings between pastorates. The first one, held at Donoho Prairie, resulted in eleven additions on confession of faith, of whom nine were young men. The second meeting was concluded at Carter with two conversions and an organization effected, with about fifty members.

O. C. Bolman, of Pekin Church, made his first annual report to the congregation in August. This report showed there had been added to the church during the year, without a revival meeting, forty persons, twenty-three of these being on confession of faith. The net gain was twenty-three. The resident membership numbers almost two hundred, and the Sunday-school has an enrollment of more than two hundred and fifty. The offerings during the year, for missions and benevolence, amount to nearly one hundred dollars, exclusive of the C. W. B. M. and other organizations' offerings for this purpose. The money raised for all purposes amounted to $8.91 per capita. Mr. Bolman continues in the pastorate with the cordial support of the congregation.

Secretary's Letter.

The unanimous verdict is that the Danville convention was one of the best ever held in Illinois, and that is saying a good deal. To be sure, the attendance was not as large as some have been in central cities, but it was quite good considering that Danville is at the eastern edge of the state.

Geo. W. Schroeder of Bridgeport had four additions September 10. He announces the dedication of their new building for October 15, and the Field Secretary will have charge.

When W. W. Weedon closed his work at Assumption August 27, the four Protestant churches united in a union service in his honor. He goes to Mt. Carmel.

W. J. Simer had twelve additions at Smiths Grove, six by obedience, at his last appointment there.

Nebo is building a new church.

M. M. Hughes is in a good meeting at the Copeland church, thirteen the first week.

J. W. Hiett closed his work at the Meridian church recently.

We tried very hard to get the required 100 Interurban Certificates at the Danville convention, but failed. If all who came over the interurban lines had asked for certificates or receipts for full fare paid it would have been easy. So many forgot it.

Wood and Rice are in a meeting at Keithsburg with Pastor L. F. De Poister. Prospects are bright. Four added just before the meeting began.

Frank H. Vernor has made a fine start in his new work at Homer.

E. E. Hartley, of Alvin, has taken the work at Flanagan.

G. Calvin Campbell, of Kansas City, Mo., has taken the work at the Armour Ave. Church, Chicago. We congratulate our colored brethren on securing so able a man as Bro. Campbell.

G. W. Zink, of Pleasant Plains, has located with the church at Chambersburg.

That dollar for convention expenses—it would be most thankfully received. It would help us out fine. It is not too late yet. Not so many have responded as last year. Ask your church for it. They will be glad to help, if they have not already done so.

Chicago

Ellsworth Faris, founder of the mission at Bolenge, Africa, spoke Sunday, September 17, at Hyde Park Church. On September 10 the members of this congregation were addressed by Cecil J. Armstrong, pastor of the Union Church at Monroe, Wis. Dr. Ames, minister, spends this month at Pentwater, Mich.

Will F. Shaw is planning a series of special Wednesday evening services this winter for the benefit of the work at Sheffield avenue. These Wednesday evening meetings are to be held monthly and are to be addressed by some outside city worker. At these "get together" feasts, every church auxiliary is to be represented, its work to be outlined and discussed by the whole group. The first of these meetings was held Wednesday evening, September 20. Austin Hunter was the chief speaker.

At the Wisconsin State Convention, held in Milwaukee, September 14-17, Austin Hunter and Vaughan Dabney delivered addresses.

The Men and Religion Forward Movement in Chicago, through its chairman, Francis W. Parker, is urging the observance by our city churches of September 24 as a Rally Day for the enlistment of the men of the parishes in a personal work campaign. The objective of this movement in its local and national campaigns will be further developed at a meeting of the Chicago Federated Churches on September 25. There will be a men's banquet at the Auditorium Hotel on Tuesday evening, October 3. Rev. W. J. Williamson, D. D., of St. Louis, will speak, and the various committees at the organization will tell how to make the work effective in the local church and in the community. Those interested are invited to visit the Chicago headquarters at 1005, 10 South LaSalle street. Vaughan Dabney.

The Presidential Address

The address of President John R. Golden, of West Side Church, Springfield, at the state convention in Danville, was a strong message. He chose "The Larger Life" as his subject, preferring to speak a distinctly religious message rather than to exploit the problems of state organization. He said in part:

"A man does not discard a machine because occasionally it casts a flaw in the piece it may be making. If some brother either in his thinking or his acting makes a fault shall we count him an enemy, and refuse to see the good that may be in him or to help him to correct his fault? We never will be able to look on the service of our brethren as we should, until we have a deeper love, the kind of love that approaches the love of the Master. I believe that this is really fundamental, and the great need of the present time. I am grieved when any man loses one element of the Gospel; but I am not only grieved but alarmed when I see the unforgiving, unbrotherly spirit among the brethren. The former may hurt a few, but the latter is contagious and starts the un-Christlike spirit in which pure Christianity cannot long live. Outside of two commandments the Master did not give us the relative importance of any other, so the only safe way is to treat all those of equal importance. But he named of first importance our love to God, and a second is like unto it, in the command to love our fellow man.

"We have found that the purest and greatest joy in the world is in the exercise of this, but there is something more than just finding joy in it. As Dr. Hugh Black has said, "It is an education in the highest art of living. Only love understands after all. It gives insight. We cannot truly know anything without sympathy, without getting out of self and entering into others. We can never know children unless we love them. Many of the chambers of the house of life are forever locked to us, until love gives us the key. To learn to love all kinds of nobleness gives insight into the true significance of things, and gives a standard to settle their relative importance. An uninterested spectator sees nothing, or, what is worse, sees wrongly. Most of our mean estimates of human nature in modern literature, and our false realisms in art, and our stupid pessimisms in philosophy, are due to an unintelligent reading of surface facts." It is because men have not loved their fellow man. If we look without love we can only see the outside, the mere form and expression of the subject studied.

"Only with tender compassion and loving sympathy can we see the true motive and the circumstance that leads to the deed. Our seeing is conditioned on love, so that when we see truly, there will be but little, if any, criticism, but there will be a deep Christian desire to help. Much, if not all, of the unfortunate divisions, criticisms, discussions and quarrels, among our brethren would have ended when they began if the principals thereto had been living the second commandment and without which, obedience to the first is not possible. I am certain that every division within a congregation or trouble between preacher and people, would never have occured had every statement and investigation been made in true Christian, brotherly love."

C. R. Oakley and J. E. Sturgis are conducting a series of meetings at New Washington, Ohio.

Edward Clutter of Lincoln, Neb., is in a meeting with H. C. Gresham, pastor at Princeton, Mo.

Second Christian Church has been formally organized at Quincy, Ill., and J. F. McMahan called as pastor.

J. M. Vawter, pastor at Sullivan, Ind., has tendered his resignation to become effective in ninety days.

R. W. Abberley and LeRoy St. John are in a meeting at Central Church, Springfield, Mo. There have been a number of accessions.

Evangelists services will begin at Galena, Mo. on September 21. The pastor, F. E. Meaders, will be assisted by Oscar Ingold.

W. J. Lockhart, of Des Moines, Iowa, is in a meeting at Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City, Mo., with the pastor, Thomas W. Grafton.

O. E. Tomes, pastor of Park Street Church, Kalamazoo, Mich., has resigned his pastorate in order to accept work for Hiram College.

F. P. Arthur, now in charge of city missionary work at Detroit, Mich., has organized a new church there. Services were begun on September 10.

The church at Webster City, Iowa, which has been without a pastor since the resignation of A. D. McCracken, has extended a call to Loren Howe of Cherokee, Iowa.

O. L. Lyon has resigned at Oklahoma Christian University at Enid, to accept a position at Texas Christian University, Fort Worth, Texas.

F. F. Walters recently held a good meeting with B. E. Stover at Grand View Church, Kansas City, Kans., with thirty additions. Mr. Walters is now in a meeting at Weston, Mo.

P. J. Rice, pastor of First Church, El Paso, Tex., held a tent meeting recently in East El Paso. A chapel will be erected there this fall.

An interesting looking program for the second anniversary service, of the pastorate of Levi G. Batman, was rendered by First Church, Youngstown, Ohio.

J. E. Davis of Beatrice, Neb., has received a call to the pastorate of First Church, North Yakima, Wash. This pulpit was formerly occupied by Morton L. Rose.

After extensive improvements the church at Jefferson, Ia. has been reopened for services and it is expected that the congregation will call a regular pastor in the near future.

Central Church, Toledo, Ohio, Grant W. Speer, minister, is rejoicing in the recent raising of more than enough cash and pledges to pay off the last dollar of indebtedness on their building.

O. E. Hamilton and Charles Stewart are in a meeting at Maplewood Church, St. Louis, Mo., with the pastor, Thomas A. Minyard. The meetings which are held in a tent with a large seating capacity, will continue for three weeks.

The ministerial alliance of Carthage, Mo., has completed its plans for a union evangelistic meeting to begin on October 22 and continue for a month. D. W. Moore, pastor of First Church there, is taking an active part in the campaign.

Resolutions of affection and godspeed were passed by the Southern California Convention on the occasion of A. C. Smither's departure from Los Angeles to the work of the Christian Board of Publication, St. Louis.

The annual home-coming day services of Mt. Auburn (Ind.) church, were held recently. Cloyd Goodnight, pastor of First Church, Shelbyville, Ind., preached the leading sermon. Fred Jacobs is pastor of this congregation.

A new church has recently been completed at Golden Point, Iowa, and dedicatory services were held on September 10. R. W. Lilley, pastor of First Church, Keokuk, Iowa, had charge of the service, assisted by N. E. Corey.

Louis H. Stine has resumed his pastorate at First Church, Aberdeen, Miss., after a month's vacation spent on Cape Ann, Mass. During his stay there, Mr. Stine spoke in two Congregational churches, in one of which Dr. F. N. Peloubet began his ministry.

L. P. Kapp has resigned at Fort Dodge, Ia., and will at once begin his new pastorate at Waterloo, Ia. Mr. Kapp's pastorate of four years has been very successful, a new building having been started. S. R. Reynolds of Fort Morgan, Colo., has been called to the pastorate at Fort Dodge.

The daily press of Missoula, Mont., devotes a page in a recent issue to a sermon preached by Harold H. Griffis, pastor of Calvary Church, on the "Religious Value of the Trades Union." This sermon was delivered at a special labor day service at which the members of the carpenter's union were the special guests of the church.

A statement was recently made in The Christian Century that Roland A. Nichols had taken the newly absorbed Peoples' Church of Brooklyn, N. Y. By reference to "New York City Mission Notes" elsewhere it will be found that the new pastor of this interesting work is Fred S. Nichols, lately of Table Grove, Ill.

W. H. Erskine, missionary to Japan, spent a Sunday recently in Findlay, Ohio, where he spoke on the international relations of Japan and the United States. He strongly contended that war between these two countries was extremely unlikely and set forth six good reasons for his view. Mr. and Mrs. Erskine will spend as much of their furlough as possible in university study.

The new church at Angola, Ind., has been completed and dedicatory services will be held on September 24. Z. T. Sweeney of Columbus, Ind., will deliver the chief dedicatory address. This occasion will mark the close of the successful pastorate of Vernon Stauffer who will take up courses at Columbia and Union Seminary, New York after which he will begin his new work as Dean of men and Professor of New Testament literature at Hiram College.

On a recent Sunday evening the pastor of the M. E. church at Ladoga, Ind., dismissed his regular evening service and brought his entire flock over to the revival meeting being conducted by J. M. Rudy at the Christian church. Mr. Rudy desires to hold union meetings wherever possible. He will be assisted hereafter by a consecrated man who is a Methodist and a man of much power. W. H. Newlin, the esteemed pastor at Ladoga, speaks in highest praise of Mr. Rudy's meeting.

The End Draweth Nigh

This is to help you to think right, for we do not want you to mistake the National Convention for the close of the year. Our missionary year closes with September 30, and the new year begins October 1. If you have not sent your offering this year to the support of "The Old Guard," we want to help you to remember that fact and urge you to do this before September 30.

Let September furnish an offering that will register a splendid closing of the year. Let every preacher knowing his church to be in arrears, stir it to duty now. Remember that the December offering comes too late for the winter's greatest needs. Remember the Master said, "especially them that are of the household of faith." Remember the dignity of your ministry and the integrity of your church are both seriously involved in this support. Take the offering at once, make you exchange payable to the Board of Ministerial Relief, and send immediately to 120 E. Market street, Indianapolis, Ind. You will receive receipt by return mail.

Indiana Preachers' Conference

A conference of the preachers of Indiana will be held at the Third Christian Church in Indianapolis on Monday, October 9, beginning at 10 a. m. and closing at 4 p. m.

Some questions of vital interest to all our churches and to our organized coöperative work have recently been raised. These will receive careful consideration with a view to reaching an agreement that will result in a closer fellowship among the churches and that will make our organized work more effective.

This call originated with the executive committee of the State Board. A committee was appointed to confer with the Indianapolis Ministerial Association and arrange a program. The Indianapolis ministers agreed to give up one of their regular Monday morning meetings and join in the call for such a conference. The secretary of the state association was instructed to make the announcement.

Every preacher in the state is invited to attend. Those living at a distance who cannot return to their homes the same day will be entertained by the churches of Indianapolis.

L. E. MURRAY, Cor. Sec.
Indianapolis.

National Benevolent Association Activities

There is no connection whatever between the National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church, and the Christian Woman's National Benevolent Association. The latter is local in organization and in its work. The National Benevolent Association is an organization of the churches, for the churches, by the churches. Its officers are elected in the National Convention. It recognizes its obligation to the churches by making full reports to them. Its work is national in scope. It is as much a part of the work of our great brotherhood as any other one of our national societies. It is devoted to the advancement of our plea for the restoration of primitive Christianity, and seeks this end by the restoration of the spirit and practice of apostolic benevolence.

The association has just closed the best year in its history. Its income was the largest and it efforts were more fruitful. Its annuity record was especially gratifying. It amounted to $25,151. This indicates a growing disposition on the part of the Lord's people to acknowledge His share in their possessions. It also is an evidence of confidence in the business ability and integrity of the association.

The General Secretary, Jas. H. Mohorter, is on an extended trip among the Eastern conventions and churches. He is booked to preach in Boston, Everett, Worcester and Springfield, Mass.; in Philadelphia, Hagerstown, Washington, and to attend the New England, Eastern Pennsylvania, Del., Md., and D. C., and Tennessee conventions.

J. F. Green and wife, who have faithfully served the Home at Baldwin, Ga., as superintendent and matron, have resigned. Their son, J. L. Green, with his newly acquired wife, will succeed them. Brother J. L. Green adds this work to his work as minister of the "Franklin Field." JAS. H. MOHORTER.

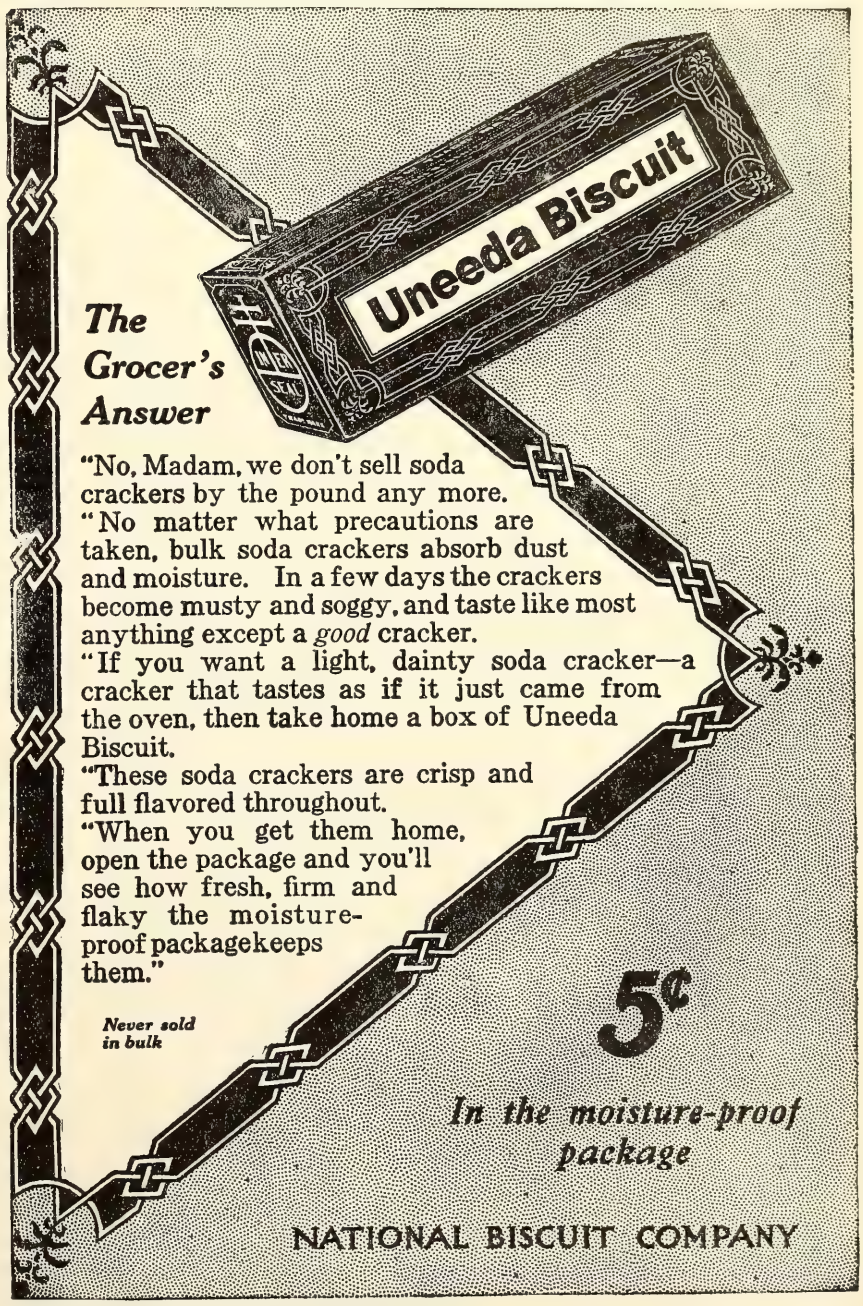
Getting Close to His Community

Harry D. Smith, pastor at Hopkinsville, Ky., believes in getting close to his own community's actual conditions and problems. As a means of testing and drawing out the sentiments of the citizenship of his town he has addressed a questionaire of twelve inquiries to a considerable number of intelligent citizens asking for a frank and confidential response. No doubt he will receive much instructive wisdom in these responses and certainly he will have in hand a body of material invaluable for preaching purposes. His inquiries are as follows:

1. Is our town growing more or less moral? In either case what is a chief cause, in your opinion?

2. Are our churches here in Hopkinsville becoming more or less effective as supports of morality, private and public? In either case what, in your opinion, is a chief cause?

3. What are some of the chief defects of the sermons preached nowadays? If you would mention at least three ways in which you believe they could be improved I should be especially grateful.



Uneeda Biscuit
The Grocer's Answer
"No, Madam, we don't sell soda crackers by the pound any more.
"No matter what precautions are taken, bulk soda crackers absorb dust and moisture. In a few days the crackers become musty and soggy, and taste like most anything except a good cracker.
"If you want a light, dainty soda cracker—a cracker that tastes as if it just came from the oven, then take home a box of Uneeda Biscuit.
"These soda crackers are crisp and full flavored throughout.
"When you get them home, open the package and you'll see how fresh, firm and flaky the moisture-proof packagekeeps them."

4. Is our pulpit neglecting matters which it should treat, and treating matters which it should omit? If so, indicate such omissions and interpolations. Or does the pulpit emphasize trifles sometimes while it gives scant notice to other things? If you think so please illustrate.

5. What could be done to make preaching more effective with men?

6. Has our ministry a pulpit tone and a clerical manner which hinder its messages and leadership, especially with men? If so, what would you suggest as means of making our ministry more simple, direct and manly?

7. Please indicate several topics which you believe it would be especially profitable to have discussed in our pulpits here at this time.

8. What, in your opinion, ought our churches here to do further. (a) in Union services, (b) in Social Meetings, (c) for Boys, (d) for Men, (e) for Girls and Women, (f) in Charities, (g) in Missions, (h) in Educational Work?

9. Are our churches effective in reaching the unsaved of the town?

11. Is or is not the town moral rather than religious?

12. What, in your opinion, is the chief difficulty in becoming a Christian, and in living the Christian life.

Foreign Mission Notes

India has received much less grain than usual. This is causing great anxiety to the missionaries. The anxiety is interfering with their health and energy. Dr. Miller has been suffering from fever.

A. W. Place reports this the best year that our mission in Japan has had. This summer a form of coöperation with the Japanese brethren has been inaugurated. This leaves the final authority what it has been in the past yet it enlists the heartiest interest of the Japanese in the school. "I have been able to take on more work this year so that P. A. Davey can devote all of his time to evangelistic work."

George W. Brown writes from Jubbulpore: "We have just closed the best summer school we have ever had. Our forty mission helpers were in attendance. The school lasted two weeks. The men were interested to the last day, and I think much good was accomplished. This year we had several of them prepare reviews of the chief books that came out in Hindu during the year. This was an excellent feature and I think a profitable one."

Leslie Wolfe reports ten baptisms in the Tagalog Provinces in the month and one hundred and seventy-eight during the missionary year. He reports five others baptized and states that he has conducted two Bible Institutes of five to six days each. There are about fifty in all in attendance. They made a creditable showing in the examinations, and in recognition of their good work were given certificates.

Miss Kate Johnson of Tokyo, Japan, writes: "The work grows in interest every day and we rejoice."

The churches in Linn and Benton counties, Iowa, have just reached the Living-link column, and will in the future support Miss Stella Lewis of Japan. F. E. Smith and Walter M. White of Cedar Rapids, led in the campaign and have brought these churches to a larger interest. The Foreign Society congratulates them upon their splendid service.

Last week a sister in Ohio gave $800, a direct gift for Foreign Missions. She has given over $4,000 direct gifts, during this missionary year. There ought to be hundreds of such friends.

Last week Mrs. Miner J. Allen of Akron, Ohio, Sent $300 to apply on the salary of Miss Rose Armbruster, Akita, Japan.

The India Mission writes that there has been a great lack of rain, and several of the missionaries have been sick in consequence. Dr. Miller has been down with fever. G. W. Brown has been suffering from nervous breakdown.

C. E. Robinson and family, who have been living at Sendai, Japan, moved to Fukushima. This is an important city. We have a growing church. This is the home of our "John the Baptist" in Japan. The Tabernacle Church, Columbus, Indiana, W. H. Book, pastor, supports C. E. Robinson.

Dr. Macklin pleads for another medical man to be associated with him in his work in Nankin, China.

Miss Muriel Molland goes to Chuchow, China, to assist in the work. She is a graduate of Wm. Woods College, Fulton, Mo., Professor J. B. Jones, president.

A great report comes from our work in the Philippine Islands for the month of June. Sermons 688; hearers 13,376; baptisms 40; houses visited 264; tracts distributed 2,726; Sunday-school attendance 1,458; marriages 1; funerals 6. Dr. W. N. Lemmon feels greatly encouraged.

F. E. Meigs and family returned to China. They sail on the Steamship "China," October 11 from San Francisco. Miss Nina Palmer, a new missionary goes out from Des Moines with them. She will teach in the school with Miss Emma Lyon.

Miss Lavinia Oldham, for eighteen years missionary in Tokyo, Japan, is now visiting relatives in Kentucky. She has been one of the most faithful and efficient workers we have had in that empire. The long service renders her labors invaluable to the missionary cause in Tokyo.

The last reports indicate that the floods in the Yangtse Valley, China, are exceedingly serious. The crops are destroyed for hundreds of miles. A great many lives have been lost. Famine and pestilence are threatening great districts. Our own mission fields will be sadly affected by this great calamity.

The Volunteer Band of Hiram College give $500 and will support the medical work at Batang, Tibetan border. H. A. Baker and wife, Hiram graduates, will start for Batang in the middle winter.

News has come of a terrible eruption of the volcano near Karuizawa, Japan. This is the resting place where the missionaries go for vacation during the month of August. Several Japanese were killed, and John Hale, a Presbyterian missionary was killed, and several others injured. These fatal accidents happened to a party of people who were on the mountain to see the sunrise.

Unmet Need

A great year in Home Missions will close September 30. In the length and breadth of the Church of Christ there is not a member to whom American Missions does not appeal. No patriotic citizen can afford to be indifferent to a work so vital and a trust so important as that which attempts to bring the Gospel with its saving power to all the people in the homeland. Doctor Steiner says: "The issues of the Kingdom of God in this generation are with America." At the National Convention in Portland the books of the A. C. M. S. did not close. They will be open for remittances from all departments of the church until September 30. In the vacation period the home board has been

The Gospel of the Kingdom

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the two years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature,

Beginning Next October

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that have ever been offered to Sunday Schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to see the work start off in the autumn with zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these classes in the study of Social Reform.

compelled, in order to pay missionaries and maintain outposts, to borrow thousands of dollars. This was done on faith that the churches will make their regular, annual contributions before the close of the year. The home society needs larger contributions. Its work has never been more fruitful. Our evangelists have brought more than 8,000 souls into the church. Eleven new churches have been organized this year in Montana, alone. They with all others must be fostered. Let churches, Sunday-schools, Christian Endeavors, Aid Societies and individuals make their offerings that the home board, which looks to them for support in their faith and as servants of the brotherhood, may meet the needs of this year. Whatever else may be postponed, whatever else may be neglected, whatever else may be supported, we must contribute to American missions lest we come short of the obligations we owe the Master and our country. I. N. McCash, Secretary.

A Temperance Contrast

The attitude toward temperance furnishes a sharp contrast between Protestantism and Catholicism in Mexico, says S. G. Inman, missionary at C. Porfirio Diaz. In a recent communication he describes two church social gatherings as follows:

"Last Tuesday the Christian Endeavor Society of the Christian Church of Los Esperanzas, had a Temperance Fiesta in the church. The building was beautifully decorated with flowers and flags, and on the walls hung a dozen temperance mottoes and exhortations. A local orchestra had volunteered its services. Temperance songs, temperance recitations, and a temperance address by the pastor left a profound impression on the large crowd present, who wore proudly the next day the little bows of white ribbon that were given as souvenirs.

"The Saturday following this temperance meeting which left such a deep impression, the Catholic church, headed by its local priest organized what we might call a church fair in the public plaza. The fair was, of course, to make money for the church. Various kinds of booths were opened, but the most popular one was where beer was sold. The crowd was soon turned into a lot of drunken revelers, the priest himself being so drunk that he had to be taken home. A platform had been erected on which the poor people could dance, and the "better" classes were admitted by fee to the theater, just across the street, where they had their revelries.

"Do you wonder then, that the people, with such contrasts as this before them, and challenged afresh by the recent political awakening to think on such things, are demanding of Protestant missionaries, as never before, that they will tell them of our religion?"

New York City Notes

A few years ago a "People's Church" was organized in the Borough Park section of Brooklyn, and June 30, 1907 they dedicated a beautiful church home, costing about $27,000. After a faithful work to establish an evangelical church to meet the need of the community, it was found the work was seriously hindered for lack of fellowship with some church body. The leaders in this work began a careful investigation of the various church bodies to ascertain which they could unite with that would enable them to most effectively fulfil their mission to the community and their obligation to their Lord. Early in July an invitation was received from these brethren to meet with them to consider the teaching and practice of the churches of Christ. After a conference lasting several hours, in which the distinctive position of the Disciples of Christ was fully discussed, this decision was reached,—That it was evidently their duty to seek fellowship and indentify themselves with those disciples who were willing to be Christians only. A joint meeting of the committee from the "People's Church" and the Mission Committee of the Disciples Missionary Union of New York City was arranged to meet at the Borough Park Church, Sunday, July 23. As a result of this meeting the following petition was received, signed by the committee of the Peoples' Church: "The First People's Church of Borough Park, Brooklyn, send greetings to the Disciples Missionary Union of New York City.

"After careful consideration for several months, we have definitely decided we can best serve the interest of the church, the cause of Christ and the community in which our church exists, by becoming identified with some religious body. After a long conference with your Superintendent of City Missions, July 9, and a conference with your Mission Committee, July 23, 1911, we believe it to be our duty to seek fellowship and coöperation with you in the work of establishing the church in this section of Brooklyn.

"We, therefore, in the name of our Master, Jesus Christ, and for his honor and glory, petition you for fellowship and recognition in the work of the church. We pledge ourselves to labor in word and example to establish the church according to the New Testament teaching and coöperate with you, to the extent of our ability, in the support of the ministers of the church."

At the following meeting of the Disciples Missionary Union the petition was accepted and steps taken to organize the Borough Park Christian Church. While this work will need for a year or two the help and direction of our churches, the outlook is bright for a strong, vigorous church in this splendid residental section of Brooklyn.

The services of Fred. S. Nichols, Table Grove, Ill., have been secured to lead this work. Mr. Nichols is already on the field preparing for an aggressive work. We believe he will prove the right man to establish, in this important section, a strong Christian Church, that will be true to Christ and the teaching of his word.

We are fortunate in securing Vernon Stauffer of Angola, Ind. to lead our mission church at Edgewater. Mr. Stauffer will spend this year in taking special work in the university, and also help to build up the cause in this city.

Fred Gordon entered upon his work with the Flatbush Mission Church, Sept. 3, preaching his first sermon, as pastor, at a union service held in the Congregational Church. Mr. Gordon has the complete confidence of the church, at the very start.

Pastor Wittchen resigned from his work at Ridgewood Heights, Aug. 1. He has been an untiring worker. J. W. Brown has been supplying this pulpit since Aug. 1. We had hoped to secure him for this field, but the lure of the west has taken him. Sept. 10 he enters upon his work in Alberta, Can.

The Russian Mission, under Mr. Johnson, continues. The work during the summer has retained a splendid interest. We have been privileged to present Christ to the multitudes in the open-air services. It has been a real pleasure to be a witness for Christ to the seething masses in the crowded section of this city.

Joseph Keevil,
Supt. of City Missions.

SEPTEMBER IS THE ONE MONTH

Specially Devoted to Offerings for

CHURCH EXTENSION WORK

WHY TAKE THE OFFERING?

1st—To help house homeless brethren; 2nd—Our brotherhood declared in the National Convention of 1888 that a Church Extension Fund was absolutely necessary since the Mission Church can borrow nowhere else and in most instances must borrow to build; 3rd—We should support a work that is our own; 4th—Up-to-date church buildings furnish the basis for all church work and missionary enterprise; 5th—209 appeals for aid to build necessary buildings for missions have come during the past ten months and the Board has answered but 59.

LET NOTHING SET IT ASIDE

The Board begs that the churches will devote themselves during September to offerings for Church Extension. This is only fair since it is the last month of the missionary year and the only month for this offering.

Keep the Offering Going Until Every Church Responds with the Best Collection It can Send, whether Great or Small!

Send all remittances to G. W. MUCKLEY, Cor. Sec'y., 603 New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

OUR ANNUITY FUND

Has built 162 church buildings. Annuity money given to Church Extension erects churches while it earns you an income of 6 per cent. semi-annually and you have no taxes to pay. Write G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec'y., Kansas City, Mo., for information.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The Graded Lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' and Primary Departments are fully completed. Three of the four Junior grades are complete. Fourth year Junior pupils may use either third year Junior lessons or first year Intermediate. Two of the four Intermediate grades are complete, and these materials may be used for the entire Intermediate Department. For Senior and Adult Departments, Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus" is provided. Other Adult classes may use Dr. Strong's "The Gospel of the Kingdom."]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

EVERY LESSON WRITER IS A RECOGNIZED AUTHORITY IN THE INTERDENOMINATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL WORLD!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that co-operation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

THE NEW YEAR BEGINS OCTOBER 1

The Sunday-school calendar is made to conform to the public school calendar. While the graded lessons may be begun at any time, there are obvious advantages in starting at the beginning of the new cycle. Study the following diagram:

Good Summer Work by an Inter-Church Federation

BY REV. HUGH B. MACCAULEY, D. D., SECRETARY OF THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA.

The Inter-Church Federation of Trenton, N. J. has just won a temperance victory that will be an encouragement to the friends of temperance and good government everywhere. For more than two months the attention of the city has been centered on the fate of some seven saloon applications for new places and transfers, pending before the city Board of Excise Commissioners. The Federation has been waging a steady battle for several years to reduce the number of saloons, and accordingly the whole force of the Federation was massed on this fight. The Federation's Temperance and Excise Committee, being members of various church bodies, divided the seven applications amongst their own members, and with the aid of various laymen appointed, secured remonstrances in the localities concerned. A most herculean task was performed by one of the pastors, whose remonstrance embraced five miles of frontage, a milion dollars of property value, and 770 signatures! The largest crowd that ever attended an excise hearing in Trenton was present. So marked was the unity of this Church Federation movement, and so formidable was the influence of these remonstrances, that all seven applications were turned down.

Besides temperance the Federation is carrying on its summer evangelistic work. This is done by means of the tent and the automobile. Every Saturday night at eight o'clock an automobile provided by the Y. M. C. A. and other friends of the movement, being in charge of the Executive Secretary of the Federation, and carrying two pastors and a cornetist, starts out for various populous points of the city. The cornetist first draws the crowd by playing a few familiar hymns, beginning with "My Country 'tis of Thee." Then the secretary announces the purpose of the meeting and introduces the speaker, who preaches a short sermon of ten minutes, closing with prayer and benediction. All the pastors take their turn on the auto. The crowd shows great respect for the speakers and there is no disorder. The Federation has planned to have this street preaching every night in the week except Sunday for the last two weeks of the season.

Besides the street preaching, the Federation has used a tent, going to four different parts of the city and staying two weeks in each, holding services every night in the week. Each series is backed up by the churches of each section, the pastors and laymen with the choirs providing for all parts of the movement, assisted by the executive secretary.

This secretary preaches every Sunday morning at the almshouse, and every Sunday afternoon at the county jail, and visits the inmates of both institutions. He also assists the pastors of all denominations in looking after the poor of the city, which services, in addition to his other duties, he renders in his capacity of city missionary.

Many other good works are being carried on by this federation. It is sufficient now to say that it fully financed last year a budget of $3,200, maintains a first-class office in the center of the city, supports the executive secretary and a stenographer, includes all the departments of modern church work, and unites in one federation the Protestant churches of the city. It has never been in debt, never missed its regular quarterly meeting, and is in its sixth year of continuous forceful life.

The Flood of the Yangtse in Anhui Province, China

I suppose some word of the floods of this year has reached home, but I have been trying to collect accurate information as to conditions and it has been necessary to wait till late that we might know something of the chances of a fall crop before making any reports home. I have asked Mr. Li Chen to collect information for me, and have asked Mr. C. C. Li, the son of Li Hung Chang and the most influential man in Wuhu, to give me an estimate, which he has kindly done. Mr. Li Chen's translation of this letter is as follows:

"The flood in Anhui Province this year is remarkably high and has wrought much damage. The River Yangtse overflowed on the 16th of the 5th moon. The dykes were destroyed and the fields flooded. Of all the districts the Wu Wei Chow district is the one that has been damaged the most. Ho Chow and Han Shan and some other places adjoining are also flooded. (Note: Wu Wei is a walled city of fifty thousand people.) There are about 1,400,000 mo. of rice already totally destroyed with no hope of fall crop. It is a great pity that 500,000 citizens are now homeless and nearly starved. They are climbing up the slopes to higher places and are living in hay and straw huts waiting for some relief. The officers and gentry of Anhui are now collecting money, rice and wheat and buying food for these people, but as yet have not a sufficient supply. All grain that was stored in the official granaries was sent to the famine people in North Anhui last year. All the provisions in local markets are sufficient for barely one month's need! For our unfortunate people of Anhui have pity!"

There are many reasons why the above estimate is conservative. You may be sure the matter is not at all exaggerated. Our chapel in Wu Wei is flooded. Our evangelist had to move out over a month ago. Mr. Burch says his chapel in Chao Hsien is flooded and the people cannot go out the gate because of the swift current of the water through it, but go over the wall into little boats. Mr. Li Chen tells of a case reported where a dyke forty miles long gave way and drowned two men before they could get out of the flood. This happened just last week. In Wuhu the water is three feet deep on the main horse road. The sanitary conditions there will be hard to imagine when the water goes down.

This is the first time, of late years at least, when our mission stations have been at the center of a famine district. The city of Wu Wei has been worked by us for a great many years. We are the only Protestant mission there, and there are no other out-stations within thirty miles. Wuhu is sixty miles by water to the south and Chao Hsien is the same distance to the north. You see we are right in and surrounding the flood territory. We are responsible as never before. The territory is so scantily supplied with foreigners that the burden will be unusually heavy upon us. It has been raining almost constantly for the last three days and the conditions in the district are not growing any better. The British Consul is now making a careful investigation of the field and will be able to give me full report in a few days. In the meantime, I hope the churches will note the conditions that face us and will lay the matter before their congregations that these poor people may have the sympathy and prayers of our people and be prepared to bear their part in relieving the distress.

Chaohsien, Anhui Province, China.

The Wide-awake Superintendent Says

Bethany Graded Lessons are

Absolutely the Greatest Achievement in the History of Sunday-school Literature.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have coöperated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

The Changing World

A few days since there occurred in this city an incident which illustrates the rapidity and completeness with which the world changes front. A moving picture company obtained permission to borrow the Columbus caravals from their resting place in the lagoons at Jackson Park, in order to reproduce in the pageantry of a photographic play the historical even of America's discovery.

In the solemn majesty of make-believe the three little boats, the exact replicas of the Pinta, the Nina and the Santa Maria, were taken down to the Calumet region, the drama was enacted and reduced to the record of the films, and now the young American may witness in mimic form the first scenes in the story of the Republic.

It seems a far call from our age of moving pictures, wireless telegraph and aeroplanes to the days of the Genoese navigator, the consolidation of the Spanish monarchy and the search for the Northwest Passage. Yet almost as remote from the life of this age seem most of the events and interests of even two generations ago.

What woman of our time would consent to appear anywhere save on the stage in the hoop skirts, puffed sleeves and miniature bonnets of the war time? Who could think himself back into the atmosphere of the mid-century with its labored transportation, its slow methods of public information, its subjection to diseases and disasters that have almost ceased to exist, and its insularity of concern with local activities and relations?

Then the dower of mine, forest and deep had hardly awakened attention; now our own continent and all the others are hunted out in vigorous and determined search for their hidden treasures. Then the conquest of the air was only dreamed of by poets and half-mad adventurers; now it is an achieved fact. Then the northern pole was believed to be beyond the frontiers of possible human approach; now the age-long quest has reached its goal, and already has ceased to excite public remark.

Social attitudes once familiar and obligatory are today losing sanction. The acquaintance and mutual dependence of neighbors, formerly so habitual and delightful in small communities, has given way to the sense of isolation to which life in cities inevitably leads.

The closeness of kinship that grew out of the older family solidarity has yielded to a unitary domestic habit which deprives any but the most intimate family relationships of any value.

Moral estimates have submitted to new assessments. It was once the habit of the church to denounce amusements as frivolous and sinful. That was in a period when the church had little serious work to do in the community, and was looking for a task that should seem authoritative and convincing. Today the church is facing responsibilities so impressive that it has no time for trivial denunciations, and is summoning amusement itself, athletic, dramatic, social, to the big work of the kingdom of God.

It has learned the folly and the sin of mere negation, and is turning to positive and urgent activities. Similar changes of sentiment regarding the proper use of the Lord's Day, the relation between individual and corporate morality, and the center and limits of ethical responsibility in a complex social order are apparent.

But it is in the domain of religious life that the change of view has been most rapid and most significant. It is commonly affirmed that theological convictions yield more slowly than any other sort to the pressure of advancing experience. This is partly true, because they represent the most valuable possessions of life.

Yet in a changing world even these are modified much more effectively than their partisans would concede. And it is because the alert and questioning spirit of the age is satisfied only when reality is attained. Contentment with bodies, shapes, appearances is impossible.

The religious discussions of the last century are meaningless today. Who of the younger generation in Presbyterian or Methodist churches could state intelligently the historic issues between Calvinism and Arminianism. In simple truth they no longer have significance.

Which of the younger men even in the ministry of the Disciples and Baptists could define with accuracy the direction and carrying power of the arguments, once so freely hurled, concerning the relation of baptism to the remission of sins, the work of the Spirit of God in conversion, the content and priority of faith and repentance, or the function of the Word in the creation of the new life. Few would even know on which side of the dividing line they ought to stand.

The discussions regarding miracle and the supernatural have ceased to interest our generation, confronted as it is with deeper-going questions; former theories of inspiration and infallibility as applied to the Bible seem remote from the values which our age finds in the sacred records; the classical speculations regarding the person of our Lord have the appearance of mediaeval subtilties in the presence of the big, stressful questions with which the modern man is confronted; the millenarian dreams of the theologies of despair seem futile and childish in the presence of the larger faith which our day is finding; and church rites, rituals, ordinances and orders are given a truer value as incidentals, not essentials of the religious life.

The deepening interests of our age relate to the extension of democracy, the realization of the present values of life, the winning of character, and participation in social service. There is much else that our age reveals that is more sordid, selfish and unlovely. But these four interests are dominant in a true sense, and at the center they are religious.

Democracy is essentially the brotherhood of man, and it only remains for the church to make clear the impossibility of a human brotherhood without a divine Father.

The realization of the present values of life implies such a revolt from other-worldliness as shall realize the ideals of the kingdom of God here and now.

The winning of character means the promotion to first-rank position of the effort to bring to supremacy the ideals of Jesus in personal and community life, which involves the moralization of religion, and its emancipation from bondage to any dogma, formula, cultus or rite, and the elevation of character, the only thing that has value in a moral universe, to its rightful place in the program of the church.

And participation in social service implies the serious application of personal and coöperative strength to the enthusiastic promotion of the tasks to which Jesus gives the tremendous momentum of his example.

What is the duty of the church in a changing world? Manifestly to accept the law of change as fundamental and inevitable; to adapt itself to the changes with high sensitiveness to the fact that therein lies its only opportunity to fashion the moving mass into some resemblance to the ideal world of its hopes; and above all, to select for its supreme and persistent emphasis the things that abide.

The cardinal mistake of the historic church is its perpetual and petty concern with matters of ephemeral value. It would almost seem as if the great facts of religion were consciously permitted to take a secondary place, lest they should divert attention from cherished holding of doctrine, liturgy, or organization. But the great things remain, and the little things fade out.

And the great things are evermore God and character and service. God, the Father-life of the world, the embodiment of Being, the Soul of the universe, the Creator and Lover of mankind, revealed and brought near to humanity in Jesus; character, the only ultimate value, the consummation of life, the superb and convincing factor in the life of Jesus, who thus becomes the divine exemplar of the race; and service, the application of being and character to the realization of the divine program for the world. In a changing world these supreme values must be the joy and the reward of the sons of God.

Minister Calhoun and the Chinese Crisis

In an interview recenty given to the Chicago Daily News, Mr. William J. Calhoun, United States minister to China, threw light on the present crisis in western China. Mr. Calhoun thinks the present crisis is due to "important changes and reforms which have been planned and are being worked out by the imperial Chinese government, which, when completed, will awaken the dormant forces and resources of the great Chinese country." The Chinese Empire is not a unit. Western China is a great plateau cut off by high mountains and connected with eastern and southern China only by rivers, the principal of which is the Yangtse Kiang. But even this great river is not navigable in the accepted sense of that word. Many impassable rapids, cataracts, and falls necessitate continual detours into the mountains, and make transportation almost impossible. Consequently the western province, with its 70,000,000 people, is very backward, and the imperial government decided to build a railroad which would open up the country and develop its great mineral resources. It was hampered in this project by the opposition of the provincials who demanded that they be allowed to build their own road. To this demand the government acceded. Leaders in the province raised large sums of money for the project by taxation, but speculated in rubber instead of building the road and lost it all. Then the imperial government took the matter into its own hands again and negotiated a loan of $30,000,000 for the purpose with financiers in the United States, England, Germany, and France. Another step taken by the government is a reform of the currency system. This is a highly important step, for it would be hard to find a more chaotic currency than is found in China. Both of these projects are being carried out with the best advice obtainable in Europe and America. But they have inevitably created uneasiness among the ignorant and superstitious people and the disturbances are not unexpected. Instinctively, it seems, the ignorant people realize these changes are brought about by the foreigners who have come among them and their first wrath is aimed at these pioneers of civilization. It is not thought the lives of foreigners are seriously endangered, though several warships have been hurried to Chinese ports to put down any serious uprising, should it be necessary.

Completion of Postal Bank Extension

What has amounted almost to a rebuke of the ultra-conservative policy in establishing progressive features in federal public service is noticeable in the manner in which the public has welcomed the new postal savings banks. The most optimistic predictions have been surpassed. The government was wise in using caution in establishing only a few offices, and wise when it rapidly extended the service after seeing how they were received. By Sept. 1, less than six months after the first offices were established, practically all the second-class offices in the country, 2,000 in all, had been designated as postal banks and a total of about $2,000,000 had been deposited. Immediately thereafter the designation of offices of the first class was begun and it is anticipated the work will be completed by Oct. 1. In the meantime, designation of third-class offices was begun the middle of September and was continued at the rate of 100 per day. It is the aim of the trustees of the federal savings department to install a savings department in every money-order post-office in the country by Jan. 1. The next step will be extension of the service to branch post-offices in large cities. At present people of cities like Chicago, New York and Boston may avail themselves of the service only by going to the main office. This, in many instances, requires a journey of several miles and necessitates a loss of time and an expense quite beyond the reach of the poorer classes whom the banks are intended primarily to serve. This extension accomplished, postal banks will draw from secret hiding places millions of dollars that have lain idle for years.

Uncertainty in Maine Election

The result of the Maine vote on the question whether the state shall continue prohibition or shall become "wet" will not be definitely decided until an official recount has been completed. So close was the vote on the question that for three days the matter hung in the balance. The first returns showed a probable majority for the "wets" of about 900 votes out of a total of approximately 120,000. In subsequent estimates based upon later returns the majority changed from one side to the other. The latest figures obtainable appear slightly to favor the "wets," but errors have been discovered which will necessitate a complete recount and, it is hoped, may turn the tide in favor of the enemies of liquor traffic. A disappointing fact brought out by the election is the apparent indifference of the people toward a question which has distracted the state for years. Twenty thousand fewer votes were cast in this election than in the last gubernatorial election. Prohibition seems to have fewer supporters in Maine today than it had twenty-five years ago. At that time the state-wide prohibition amendment was adopted by a vote of 70,000 for to 23,000 against. Whatever the result is now, however, it is certain to be only temporary. As soon as a legislature can be elected which will permit the question to be again put before the people that will be done. Neither side will rest a minute until one or the other has won a decisive victory. Following the early reports that prohibition was defeated, Congressman Hobson made the following comment, which advocates a different policy from that he proclaimed in his Chicago address, reported in this paper: "The city population has grown so largely since 1884 that the drift toward 'wet' conditions has been strong. I believe that this fight should demonstrate to students of prohibition that the next movement should not be confined to any state or states, but should be a nation-wide campaign to put prohibition into the national constitution. I venture the prediction that this phase of the conflict will gain tremendous force from the Maine defeat."

The Vindication of Doctor Wiley

President Taft on Sept. 15 gave out a decision exonerating Dr. H. W. Wiley, chief of the bureau of chemistry, of the charges of irregularity preferred against him by his assistant, Doctor Kobler and by Solicitor McCabe. Secretary Wilson, of the department of agriculture, Doctor Wiley's superior, had recommended to President Taft that Doctor Wiley be given an opportunity to resign, together with the further recommendation that Dr. H. H. Rusby, an expert chemist whom Doctor Wiley was accused of employing at a greater salary than the law provided for, be dismissed. This recommendation was concurred in by Attorney General Wickersham, as chief of the department of justice. The President finds that, "If this were a knowing, wilful, deliberate effort to evade the statute, accompanied by a scheme to conceal the evasion and violation, I should think the punishment recommended by the personnel board, and concurred in by the attorney general, was none too great; but an examination satisfies me that a different construction ought to be put upon what was done; that the evidence shows Doctor Wiley's action was in accord with precedents which justified him in doing what he did." Friends feel that this is a personal slap at both Secretary Wilson and Attorney General Wickersham, and say no course is open to them other than to resign. Mr. Taft evidently suspected such a construction might be placed upon his action, for he is quoted: "The broader issues raised by the investigation, which have a much weightier relation than this one to the general efficiency of the department, may require much more radical action than the question I have considered and decided." Doctor Wiley is the inveterate foe of all food adulterators and patent medicine fakirs, and made many a powerful enemy by his persistent prosecution of them. But he has won the confidence of the American people, and his vindication is the occasion of the widest rejoicing.

—Seventy-six million to 77,000,000 bushels of fall and spring wheat will be harvested in the states of Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana this season if the present favorable conditions continue, according to reports from farmers and bankers received by the statistical department of the Spokane chamber of commerce. The crop in the inland empire is estimated at from 64,000,000 to 65,000,000 bushels. It is also reported that the yields of hay, oats, barley, rye and corn will be larger than last year. The potato crop is estimated at from 19,000,000 to 20,000,000 bushels. The wheat yield in the four states amounted to 65,180,000 bushels in 1910.

—Across New Jersey for sixty miles between Camden and Atlantic City is a steel rod that kills whatever touches it. It is the exposed third rail of the Pennsylvania railroad. Within the past four weeks, seven persons have been killed by this rail, nearly all of them children. At the last session of the New Jersey state legislation an effort was made to secure a law requiring the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. to cover and protect the rail, but the bill was killed by the railroad lobby. The railroad claims that the right of way is private property and that hence it is not responsible for the death of these people. It is time that the state brought this big railroad to time.

Ignorance of the Bible.

The editor of the Journal and Messenger is not in sympathy with much that is being said about ignorance of the Bible. He owns up to being a heretic on the question of teaching the Bible in the public schools. As a Baptist he stands for the separation of church and state. No religious teaching should be supported by taxation of all the people. There are serious doubts whether there ever was a time when the Bible was anything more than [illegible]ally read, in small sections, in the public schools of the country. This editor admits that there is lack of Bible knowledge among the young people, but he does not attribute it to the non-reading of the Bible in the schools. If the people of a former generation had more knowledge of the Bible than the present generation, one reason is that sermons used to be more scriptural than they are now. The Bible was read more in the home. We give the closing paragraphs of the article:

The cases of ignorance of the Bible given by the college professor, to which reference has been made, were found in a state institution to which the students had come from all parts of the state, many of them from irreligious families, probably few of the delinquents having been in a Sabbath-school for any considerable length of time. There were a few among more than a thousand students. Our impression is that the Bible may be read in the schools of that state; but whether or not, the ignorance was not because of lack in the public schools. At most, in any case, the reading is a psalm or two, or a passage from Job or Proverbs, the shortest possible; a few verses here and there, rarely a historical passage; and if historical it was detached so that no definite impression was made.

Finally, it may be said the Bible is a large book and a long life time is not too much for its mastery. Boys and girls, from eighteen to twenty-two, who have prepared for college, have rarely mastered any book in all their preparation, and some of them are barely able to squeeze in under "conditions." They could hardly bear examination in a text-book, if called upon suddenly. They all dread examination, as do even old teachers when it is required for a certificate. It is hardly fair to judge our young people by the few of the many in a great state institution.

Congregational

Dr. Gladden Has Not Resigned.

It has been announced through the public press that Dr. Washington Gladden has resigned his pastorate at Columbus, Ohio, and that he has given as his reason the growing indifference of his people to the work and worship of the church. What Dr. Gladden actually did was to write a pastoral letter to the members of his church. He calls it his last personal pastoral letter because henceforth he is to have an assistant. He has no intention of quitting and his congregations are not growing smaller. Here is a part of a letter in which he explains what he has done:

As this was my last personal pastoral letter, I wanted to speak a few earnest words to those who have been inclined to drop out of church life (of whom, I dare say, there are some in most large churches). These words, specifically addressed "to those who seem to have lost their interest in the teaching and the work of the church," the newspapers have insisted on applying to the whole membership; one report in a New York paper says that "I am at a loss to account for the thinning of the congregation's number at Sunday services."

The fact is that our congregations have never averaged so large as in the last six months, and the support of my people was never so cordial and affectionate as it is today. They were never doing better work than they are doing this year. So I am getting a good many letters of condolence which I do not deserve; and, I doubt not, plenty of people wil be pointing a moral which the circumstances have not made room for.

I hope to preach at least once every week and to take a large part in the work of the church. But I am very happy in having at my side a strong man who is able and willing to take the leadership of the activities of the church.

A Message from the Moderator.

The Moderator of the Congregational National Council, Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, has written for the Congregationalist and Christian World an article on "Congregationalism Today, Its Tendencies, Task and Spirit." The topics discussed are of interest to all Christians. In the following quotations he expresses what thoughtful people everywhere think about evangelism:

The evangelism whose carefully laid plans reach through the years is seen by a growing company to be far preferable to that which commands only days and weeks. A prevailing temper in Christian living, it is thought, is a more stable realization than a gusty tempest of pious emotionalism. Permeating the life of the community with the spirit of Christ, by conserving the dignity of religion, by cultivating reverence, by accentuating the principle of inwardness which is Christ's own, and by retiring the principle of outwardness with its pompous assurance, its popular compromises and its sensuous attractions, is deemed by a constantly growing company of our most devoted and thoughtful fellow-disciples, a worthy quest in the interest of Christ.

The dissatisfaction both with the method and the result of very much that is falsely called evangelism today is due to the cheapness of it. The flamboyant advertising, the newspaper stories, the executive offices, the catering for crowds, the meaningless songs and highly spiced sermons, the startling announcements of wonderful results, together with the peculiar interest in and emphatic insistence upon the financial recompense by some evangelists, the laxness of the religious interest, which not unusually is the anti-climax, the meagerness of the positive result in the interest of the building kingdom—these are some of the things which today are causing earnest people to question the real value of many of the so-called evangelistic endeavors and to ask for something instead which shall more worthily represent the religious spirit of the time.

The passion for souls must not wane; the preaching to men must be direct, fearless and impressive; the gospel, the whole gospel, must be faithfully declared; but there are many who cherish the positive conviction that quiet, persistent, long-continued effort in this direction through the channels of opportunity afforded by the church promise the larger results and the more lasting realizations.

Doctor Boynton is not afraid of the colleges and theological seminaries. These have been the glory of Congregationalism. The scholars who work in them ought to have a fair field. On the work of the scholar he says:

The recognition of the scholar's contribution to the present world is one of the immediate obligations of modern Congregationalism. Because the truth lives it advances, and these men, diligent, devoted, who see clearly and dare tell the world what they see, are kingdom builders. In spite of vigorous protestations on the part of the ignorant, and of acrid criticism on the part of the prejudiced, these men declare and defend the truth as it is revealed to them and are towers of strength in the modern situation. The questions which are the outer garments of truth today are scholars' questions. The answers are not to be found in the easy and inexpensive clamor of a multitude, nor in the undertow of a great wave of popular opinion, nor in the solemn and authoritative pronunciamento of ecclesiastical assemblies. The scholar must find the key; others may use it afterward.

Social questions cannot be answered by sympathy alone. How to reunite Christendom cannot be found out solely by cultivating a sense of the horror of schism, or accentuating the spirit of Christian reciprocity. Finding the truth about the Bible is something other than reading a chapter every day and complacently affirming one's faith in every word from cover to cover. The truth requires patient, balanced, intelligent treatment. It is never determined by a count of noses. The fathers believed this so thoroughly that they endowed foundations and greatly esteemed and honored those who occupied the chairs and dwelt in the halls of learning. The children, perhaps, give in more directions than the fathers, but it is certain that for the spread of religious truth the endowments of our schools and seminaries are pitiably meager, while in the obsequious deference to promoters and plutocrats one sometimes wonders if the children really honor and respect the prophet or whether he is being forgotten, like the poor wise man of old, who by his wisdom delivered the city, yet, alas! of whom it was true, "No man remembered that same poor wise man."

Lutheran

The 2,000,000 Lutherans in the United States are getting ready to celebrate the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of Martin Luther. The three hundredth anniversary, in 1817, gave the start in America to Lutheran unity and the forming a little later, of such general bodies as the Synod and Council. The four hundredth, occurring in 1817, will be, if possible, a time for further unity, especially of Synod, Council, and most of the new independent synods that have made English and not German their service language.

A first step toward the celebration in 1917 is taken by the Council, the second largest body, in an effort to raise an endowment fund of $2,000,000, the income to be employed for missions and other advance work at home and abroad. The recommendation is made by a Council committee, but will, it is said, be adopted by the Council as a whole. Other Lutheran bodies are considering money plans as part of the celebration of the anniversary, and from now on will come several announcements of them.

Lutherans of the United States give to missions about $2,000,000, and this sum will be maintained, doubtless increased, while the anniversary endowments are being raised. The council, just announcing its 1817 plan, has nearly 400,000 communicants. The Synod, the oldest of the general organizations, has 250,000, and there are nearly 600,000 in independent synods, largely foreign speaking. The largest single body is the Synodical Conference with 625, 000, still strongly German in its life and language.

An Explanation and a Hope

This issue of The Christian Century will be received by many who have not themselves subscribed for the paper. To them we make this word of explanation: Your paper has been paid for for ten weeks by some friend who is interested in making you acquainted with it and with its ideals. Do not hesitate to accept it. It costs you nothing for these ten weeks and will be continued beyond that period only by definite order. We wish you to read each issue carefully and ask yourself if you would not like to receive this paper on your own account as a regular visitor to your home. At any time during this "acquaintance period" you may send in $1.50 and your name will be put upon the regular list and you will receive the paper until December 31, 1912, a period of thirteen months—the month of next December being free. If you are a minister $1 will be accepted. Our hope, in which the editors also join, is that you may become a permanent member of The Christian Century family. The Publishers.

Prayers for Laborers for the Harvest Field

The call for laborers comes from God and from the church. This is implied in the command of the Lord to pray for the sending forth of laborers. Barnabas and Saul, having been appointed by the Spirit to carry the message into new regions, were sent forth by the church at Antioch.

Before we begin to pray for workers, we ought to examine ourselves. What are we doing? It is foolish and irreverent for the idle to ask God to raise up leaders and preachers. Are we awake? And let us not mistake whining complaints for alertness. A prayer meeting given over to complaints is to be shunned by all healthy minded disciples. To bewail the degeneracy of the present time and to praise the former days will get nothing done. The prayer-meeting offers an opportunity to discuss what we are trying to do and how we are trying to do it. We should pray for the blessing of God upon our efforts to improve morals and religion, not upon our desire to prove that the world is going to the dogs. If in the spirit of Jesus we are planning to build up his kingdom, we have a right to pray for leaders and helpers.

The honor paid to faithful servants by the church is an invitation to others to enter the service of the church. To honor is not to flatter. It may be right and necessary to tell the preacher that he has spoken well and has comforted the mourner and strengthened the weak. But it is more important to honor a leader by acting upon his wise suggestions. The young men needed for the ministry of the gospel believe in doing things. They are impressed by what the church does, not by what it says. Do those who attend the services of the church demand relief from the cares of life by being compelled to think clearly or by being entertained? The entertainer can use his talents to better advantage on the stage. Churches usually have the kind of ministers they demand. If they demand men who speak to the conscience, they can have them.

The provision which the church makes for the education of its workers is an invitation to its young people to become teachers and preachers. Faith in Christ is the possession of intelligent beings. The gospel is not magic. The less the magician knows of science and history, the easier it is for him to believe in his art. The preacher of the gospel must know the ways of God in the human heart and in history. Christian character has its laws of growth. The joy of thinking is one of the chief joys of life. The church must provide for the training of thinkers. The leader of religious forces has something to do besides attending committee meetings and political caucuses and picnics. These he does not despise. But he can attend them all and be very efficient in a way and yet fail to lead men to God. The deep things of God are not discovered without agony of spirit. They are the reward for hard mental labor. Young men who begin their preparation for the ministry with a request to be excused from duties that are difficult ought to be told that they have no business in the ministry. The individuality of every one should be respected; mental laziness deserves chastisement.

"Spite of all perversions this truth remains unshakable, that no man is fit for the ministry who has not received to that ministry the sovereign call of heaven. For who are we that without credentials shall stand as ambassadors of the King? Who are we that without the divine mandate shall carry the message of the cross? Who are we that without a call shall stand in that sacred place above which rainbows flame and the heavenly hosts are chorusing—a Christian pulpit? Who are we, aye, who are we, that would snatch with our own fingers the living coals from the altars of God? Back of all, first of all, there must be the imperial sanction of Heaven. From out of the heart of the unseen, clear, clamant, compelling, must come the voice that bids me preach; the consciousness that the soul is chosen of heaven to declare the Gospel of the grace of God." So speaks one of our most eloquent preachers.

We may be sure that God's call does not come to men who are looking for an easy way of getting a living. Nor does it come to those who never know what the gospel is until they have learned the opinion of the multudes. Fluency in speech is not sufficient evidence of the divine call. Ideas are also needed. Love of learning is not the sole test. Love of truth, of God, of man is fundamental. One must first be a Christian. Then the special service to which God calls him is determined by his gifts and opportunities. [Midweek Service, Oct. 4. Matt. 9:35-10:7.] S. J.

A Missionary Human Document*

No records are so interesting as the human documents that portray the lives and characters of the men and women who are making history in our generation. Among the men whom the Disciples of Christ have come to regard as one of their greatest gifts to this age is Dr. W. E. Macklin, the medical missionary of Nankin, China. He has become a familiar figure in the conventions of this body of people, and no missionary is ever heard with greater interest. Yet of his life, and especially of his family, his talented and beautiful wife, his children, now coming rapidly to the realization of the hopes so long cherished regarding them, of the joys and sorrows that have filled the long chapter of their missionary service, little is known, even by those who have for years held them in affectionate and admiring regard.

It is therefore a matter of satisfaction that Mrs. Laura De Laney Garst, the sister of Mrs. Macklin, the widow of one of our most faithful and efficient missionaries, and a woman of rare gifts and rich experience, has prepared a sketch of Dr. Macklin and his family so intimate, so faithful and so stirring, that one cannot read it without deep emotion, nor ever after hold lightly the service of the men and women who go out to the distant lands to interpret there the spirit of the Christ.

Some years ago Mrs. Garst wrote a little account of Mrs. Macklin's work in the Orient under the title, "My Little Sister in Faraway China." To this she has now added two others, "Dr. Macklin of Nankin" and "My Little Sister at Home." The whole gives a vivid picture of the joys and sorrows, the leave-takings and returnings of a missionary family. The whole is gathered around the character and work of a man who is today one of the heroes of China's awakening, and will in the future claim a still higher place in the regard of his people and of the world. It is a book to read with emotion and resolution, and to scatter by the thousands.

The Meaning of Baptism

I. The Meaning of the Word.

Alexander Campbell was probably the ablest as he was also the most noted champion of the Baptist side of the baptism controversy in modern times. One of his most striking contributions to the immersionist argument was his redaction of the New Testament in which the word "immerse" appears in every place where "baptize" occurs in the King James version. The sources from which he compiled this work were an original translation of the Gospel made by George Campbell, of Aberdeen, and similar translations of the Acts and Epistles by Doddridge and Macknight respectively. These translations he brought together in 1826 and published them under the name of "The Living Oracles."

Mr. Campbell reserved to himself the right of placing in the text the renderings of other authorities in preference to Messrs. Campbell, Doddridge and Macknight wherever he saw fit, retaining the rejected rendering in the margin or appendix. But few alterations of this sort were made, however, and these were mainly in the line of his announced purpose to cast into plain English those terms which the common version had only transliterated from the Greek. He was determined that this work should be, as he says, a pure English New Testament, not mingled with Greek words, either adopted or anglicised."

The conscientiousness and fidelity with which Mr. Campbell performed this service were matched only by his independence and courage. In his day it was a hazardous thing to call in question the infallibility of the King James version. The reverent freedom which he exercised in the execution of his task, gives us a single illustration of the comparatively modern attitude toward the Scriptures which this pioneer critic disclosed in many ways.

With respect to the translation of the Scriptures, while conceding the great beauty and dignity of the King James version, he felt that it was ill-suited to give to the mind of his day an adequate understanding of the word of God. Many of its words and phrases had become conventionalized, smooth-worn. The people were not getting at the meaning of the Bible, and the effect of many of its great statements was limited to a certain unctious sound which the words had taken on by much reading in public worship.

He believed, moreover, that a free rendering of the Scripture into contemporaneous speech would greatly stimulate the reading of the Bible and set the mind free from "slavish attachments to particular words and phrases which were supposed to favor party tenets." The reason there are so many parties in the Church of Christ, so many sects, he declared, is that we do not have a clear, plain translation of God's word. Sects are built in large part on a misconception of the Scripture meaning and this misconception is more often than not due to a mistranslation, or an unclear translation, of the original text. The Bible was meant to be understood, he constantly affirmed, and if it is read naturally, without sectarian prejudice, just as other books are read, and in a correct translation, it is bound to be understood alike by all, at least in its essential teachings.

A more significant principle of interpretation, in insistence upon which Mr. Campbell stood quite alone in his day, was that of the necessity of taking into account the historical setting out of which a given book of Scripture arose. We cannot understand a book of the Bible, said Mr. Campbell, without knowing something of its date, its author, its author's circumstances and his purpose in writing. The conscious consistency with which Mr. Campbell applied the historical method in his treatment of the Scriptures—in the introductions which he wrote for each of the main divisions of "The Living Oracles," and more especially in his treatment of the Old Testament—links him intimately with modern critical scholarship. A certain class of objections to Mr. Campbell urged by the orthodox of his day were much the same as those urged by some today against the so-called higher critics.

"The Living Oracles," however, proved a disappointment in certain respects. It had a wide sale for a time among Mr. Campbell's own followers and was used by him and them even in public worship in many cases. But it was not favorably received either by the Baptist denomination, to which Mr. Campbell and his followers then belonged, or by the various bodies of pedobaptists. And today it is found only in collections of old books preserved for historical purposes. In this indifferent reception the volume fell below its just deserts. In most respects it was an admirable and scholarly translation. It broke up the smooth-rubbed phrases and made the Bible a new book to many. That its reception was limited to those who were Mr. Campbell's doctrinal followers is not, however, difficult to explain.

The substitution of "immerse" and its cognates for "baptize" and its cognates was part of Mr. Campbell's plan to give an actual translation of those words which, in the version before him and in the King James version, had been merely transliterated from the Greek. The word "baptize" was one of these. Its Greek original was baptizo. The King James translators had simply taken it over bodily into the English text instead of rendering its meaning into an English term. Messrs. George Campbell, Doddridge and Macknight followed the same procedure in their versions. In "The Living Oracles," however, "baptize" was regularly displaced by "immerse."

It was a bold stroke on Mr. Campbell's part to defy tradition and prejudice, and translate the word baptizo throughout according to his convictions. He affirmed that previous translators had not dealt with this word according to their convictions, that the transliteration of the word was a compromise with established custom and prejudice. He claimed that the whole world of scholarship was agreed on his translation. Many authorities were cited, among them Professor George Campbell himself, whose translation of the Gospels was a constituent part of "The Living Oracles." Professor Campbell was quoted as saying that the noun ought never to be rendered "baptism" or the verb "to baptize," though attention was not directed to the remainder of Professor Campbell's statement—"except when employed in relation to a religious ceremony." In this exception there is direct contradiction of Mr. Campbell's translation.

It had been assumed by Mr. Campbell that the Presbyterian and Congregational affiliations of the three translators whose version formed the basis of "The Living Oracles" would give the volume a prestige among the pedo-baptist bodies which a version of Baptist origin could not be expected to command. But this "one improvement," as Mr. Campbell called his translation of baptizo, was a fly in the ointment to pedo-baptist readers, and rendered the whole volume unacceptable. On the other hand, much more to its editor's surprise, this same emendation proved to be an affront to Baptists also. While it sanctioned their view and practice of baptism by immersion only, it took away from the Scripture page the cherished name by which their denomination was known. In this version John was no longer "the Baptist" but simply "the immerser." Logically, Mr. Campbell's translation of baptizo would compel the Baptists to change their name to the "Immersers," a procedure which was, of course, intolerable.

Apart from its treatment of the baptism passages "The Living Oracles" was a most admirable book. Its scholarship was unexceptionable. In dignity, in perspicuity, in fidelity to the original text, this translation was superior to some of the versions that have since had wide vogue. Its general circulation would have had a salutary and profound influence upon Christian thought. To cite one instance only: the term "kingdom of God" is rendered in this version "reign of God." This is every way an improvement over the common rendering, tending, as it does, to shake the conception loose from much of its legalism, emphasizing the inward fact of divine control and leaving imagination and experience to work out specific forms.

It would be difficult to maintain that the inhospitable reception accorded "The Living Oracles" was due to sheer sectarian prejudice. The very real need of a contemporary translation of the Scripture was too apparent, and the phenomenal popularity of a number of similar translations subsequent to the appearance of Mr. Campbell's volume indicate that there was widespread demand for just such a work as he purposed this to be. Moreover its intrinsic merit in every other particular was such as would finally have overcome mere provincial antagonism to his treatment of the baptism passages had his treatment of these passages been indeed in harmony with scholarship and truth.

We do not hesitate to say that this work of Mr. Campbell would have become monumental had it not been for this single unscholarly flaw, namely, the repeated translation of a Greek word connoting a religious, a psychical, a social act by a word connoting only a physical act.

There is significance in the fact that the Disciples themselves have been so little inpressed with this opus magnum of their great leader. How little they have been impressed is partly indicated by the fact that although their characteristic thinking has dealt much with the idea of the "kingdom" they have never adopted the rendering of the word given by "The Living Oracles." In their actual attitude toward unimmersed Christians the Disciples show that they have not taken seriously Mr. Campbell's contention with respect to baptizo. Practically, they concede that the number of the baptized is not limited to those who have been immersed. Nor, indeed, did Mr. Campbell himself carry out in his practice the logical implications of his position. To him and to the Disciples baptism has always, in practice, connoted more than immersion.

After the controversy in connection with its first appearance had passed, the volume had but little sale. The fact is that the Disciples, less consciously, perhaps, than Baptists and pædo-baptists, recoiled at the appearance on the very face of the Scripture of the word "immerse" in the place of "baptize." They, with their Baptist brethren, could make use of this construction of baptizo in debate or in a denominational apologetic, but when they saw their favorite argument wrought into the very texture of the Scripture itself, they could not overcome the feeling, ill-defined though it was, that some vital portion of the meaning of the sacred writing had been sacrificed.

When immersion instead of baptism was made the burden of the great Forerunner's preaching; when Peter was made to say to the Pentecostal converts, "Repent and be immersed for the remission of your sins;" and when Paul's mystical insight into the meaning of baptism was rendered: "So many of you as were immersed [in water] were immersed into Christ's death"—the incongruity of the new reading was instinctively felt. But when it was put upon the lips of Christ to say, "He that believeth and is immersed shall be saved," this feeling of incongruity passed into a silent protest.

Such a rendering could not find abiding place in the Christian consciousness, no more among Disciples and Baptists than among pedo-baptists. It must be incorrect. Immersion, a physical act, is incommensurable with faith with which it is here coupled. It is likewise incommensurable with salvation of which it is here given as a condition. The Christ of the Gospels would not make an arbitrary physical act a condition of salvation. He could not in his last commission contradict the teaching of his entire ministry.

Do Disciples Help or Hinder Unity?

The question whether the Disciples of Christ are to be a help in the solution of the problem of Christian unity or a further complication of the problem takes on fresh pertinency in view of the late development in India, of which Dr. George Wm. Brown writes on another page.

As readers of The Christian Century know, the missionaries and churches of India were in a fair way to realize a degree of federation as near to actual union as the existence of occidental denominational mission boards would allow. The union contemplated by the provisional constitution of the first Jubbulpore conference provided for the most intimate fellowship among all the churches including especially the recognition of each others' membership in the Church of Christ.

This point was excepted to by the Disciples and Baptists who were unwilling to consede that unimmersed Presbyterians and Methodists were members of the Church of Christ. A very tenuous bond of federation is, therefore, likely to be adopted. The Christian Century believes that this refusal to recognize Presbyterians and Methodists as members of the Church of Christ does not represent the sentiment of the Disciple missionaries themselves, but reflects their perplexed understanding as to the attitude of the home church on this point.

There is no duty more urgent upon the Disciples in the home land than that they speak out in clear, representative and ringing voice their joyous acknowledgement of these unimmersed Christians as members of the Church of Christ.

Our representatives in foreign lands, in the great northwest of our own country, in the south land, in the needy places of great cities, can act in union movements only with timidity and caution, and with what seems to others sectarian bigotry, so long as there is ground for doubt as to the attitude of the brotherhood toward those Christians who happen not to have been immersed at their baptism.

It is a sad chapter in our history to have to write that a high degree of Christian union was almost consummated in India, but failed because Disciples could not acknowledge their brethren as members of the Church of Christ!

Editorial Table Talk

Old Andover Indicating New Ways

The change in ecclesiastical ideas, obtaining now for five years at least, is silently testified to by the form of the chancel in the new Chapel of Andover Theological Seminary at Cambridge, to be opened with the rest of the beautiful building, on October 25 next. Andover Seminary, ended at Andover and rebuilt in Divinity Avenue under the walls of Harvard University, traditionally stands for the old Puritan ideals. Yet the chancel is distinctly Anglican in its arrangements, with eagle lectern on one side, pulpit on the other, seats facing on Epistle and Gospel sides, and an open view of what approaches a reredos with an altar before it.

The new structure is of stone, in the English Gothic of Oxford and Cambridge, and contains library, dormitory, classrooms, and all in the richest luxury of the Anglican, rather than the severe simplicity of the Puritan. Andover Seminary, for one hundred years in the Bay State town from whence it took its name, represents Congregationalism of the orthodox type, and has a record of producing, or at least of developing great men second to almost no other seminary in the world. Yet its student body dwindled while its endowment grew. There was opposition to its removal to more liberal Harvard, but that opposition was overcome, and now it is to try a second century in city instead of country. Larger enrollment, larger life, and new prospects, are said to be already indicated.

Christian Conditions in South Africa

Rev. David Russell of Johannesburg, South Africa, now in America for six months as member of one of the Men and Religion Movement teams, reports that Methodists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians and Baptists of South Africa tried to effect organic union in vain. Both Methodists and Presbyterians bolted, and so while here the evangelist, famous throughout South Africa as a missioner, will study the Federal Council of Churches, to see if it may be the federated plan South African bodies stand in need of.

Observance of Sunday as a day of rest becomes less and less in his country, he says, while Sunday-school work is less developed than in almost any English speaking country. There are under construction in several South African cities, notably Johannesburg, handsome buildings after the pattern of Y. M. C. A. buildings here. These were made possible by American Association men going to South Africa and teaching the Y. M. C. A. there how to raise money, whirlwind fashion.

Mr. Russell states that even in English possessions in South Africa the Dutch Reformed Church is greatest in numbers and influence, and that Church of England and Methodist come next. The influence of the United States in South African affairs, social and religious, is beyond that of any other foreign country, and greater, Mr. Russell is convinced, than Americans are aware of.

New and Big Home Mission Survey

Home mission societies have long worked to stop overlapping, an abuse described as six to ten churches receiving mission aid in towns where two or three at most are really needed. Now these societies declare that there is much overlooking—hundreds of towns where there are neither Protestant nor Catholic churches.

To learn real conditions one secretary from each of the twenty-six societies represented in the Home Mission committee of the Federal Council, will undertake a study of the two contiguous tiers of states between the Mississippi River and the Pacific. One month is to be devoted to the survey and conferences with local ministers, secretaries and other leaders are to take place.

This series of conferences, the first ever held, will begin in Minneapolis on November 15, and go westward to Washington along the northern tier. Conferences are set for Fargo, Sheridan, Butte, Boise, Spokane, Seattle and Portland, the last named city being reached on December 1.

The second half of the month will be given to conferences in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Salt Lake City, Colorado Springs, Topeka, Omaha and Huron, South Dakota. In all conferences studies are to be made of rural districts, foreigners, lumber and mining camps, Indians, possible overlapping in cities, and on the Coast conditions among Orientals. The societies making the survey state that there is really a worse situation in the overlooked field than ever obtained in the overlapped ones.

Religious bodies taking part, through their home agencies, in this comprehensive survey include the Presbyterian, Methodist, Disciples of Christ, Episcopal, Reformed, both Dutch and German bodies, Congregational in both of their home organizations, United Brethren, Lutheran and Baptist. Southern societies are in it with northern. The Federal Council and the American Bible Society also have part. In all of the states named Christian leaders are now making studies of conditions in order to be ready to report upon them to these survey conferences. Better direction of the $40,000,000 given by Christians in America for missions at home is the object.

Training Christian Workers

Christian Endeavor has just announced details of its efficiency campaign that begins now and is to continue until 1913. During the past two years Endeavor societies increased 10,000 in number, and Endeavor membership grew by 1,000,000. Now the task is to be entered upon of training these recruits and starting them upon worth while work.

The campaign makes no fewer than twenty-eight suggestions for work by young people, women and men, in the churches, and sets forth an elaborate plan of percentages. It asks every Endeavor society immediately to take stock. That is, it prescribes methods by which societies may get their present rating of efficiency. If the total of all lines of work, conservatively calculated, be 50 per cent perfect, then for that society the efficiency campaign means the raising of the standards to 100 per cent.

Of the twenty-eight lines missions, prayer-meetings, good literature, the searching out and training of leaders, church attendance, evangelism, and socials are given special prominence in the campaign instructions.

Brighter Outlook for Mission Income

The American Board, representing Congregationalists in their foreign work, closed its fiscal year on September 1 with an income of $1,029,999 for its current work. In its 101st year the famous board, the oldest missionary society in America, passes the $1,000,000 mark in receipts. Exclusive of this sum it received last year $1,000,000 for endowment of its educational work on mission fields.

In common with other societies, the board's income has been increasing steadily for a decade or more, its everage for ten years being $33,000. Last year its increase was $34,000, but from living givers it received $65,000 more. It attributes its success to the apportionment plan, recently introduced, to a growing appreciation by the public of the value of foreign missions, and to the Laymen's Missionary Movement. Especially does it appreciate, says its formal statement, the greater help through right publicity of the daily newspapers. The board has twenty-five foreign mission fields, with 568 churches and 73,000 members on them. Its native members on the field contribute $300,000 a year toward their own work. Especially important is the board's educational work in Turkey, India and Japan. A characteristic of the board is, and long has been, its ventures into new and difficult fields, often opening the way for others. The board is just now considering, it states, the vast importance of help for Spanish speaking people both in Spain and in Spanish America.

Our Series on Baptism

About two years ago The Christian Century published three or four editorials on the baptism question. Since that time we have confined our treatment of this subject to a few brief answers to inquiries and an occasional comment on the articles appearing on Our Readers' Opinions page.

The subject of the practice of Christian union has meantime been taking much space in our pages. Some of our readers have not been able to distinguish the Christian union question from the baptism question. One jubilant reader responded to our announcement of a series of articles on the meaning of baptism by declaring his satisfaction that our "recent articles were to be republished!" This humbled us. Had we written so much about Christian unity and had our readers all the time taken our words as a discussion on baptism?

No, the series beginning in this issue will not repeat our recent articles but will take up a subject which this paper has not yet discussed.

There are two questions very much alive to the Disciples of Christ today. One is the big, urgent, practical question of Christian unity. Can the divided church stand together? Are our differences so great and so inexorable that complete inter-communion between congregations of the various denominations, leading to the ultimate abandonment of the denominational order of things, is out of the question? The Christian Century stands with the Disciples in declaring that our differences are on non-essentials; that on the vital, structural essentials evangelical protestantism, at least, is already one; that the business of the Disciples is to practice this unity, and thus prove to the doubting sectarian world the possibility throughout Christendom of what we illustrate in our own churches. This is an enormous undertaking, but it is no less a task than this that the fathers have passed on to us.

The other question is a more or less academic one. What is Christian baptism? How should it be administered? It is a question about which men of equal loyalty to Christ differ. It is a question of human opinion. It is like all questions of human opinion, if it cannot be solved it can be transcended by the spirit of unity. Unity need not wait, must not wait, until we see eye to eye on baptism. It is the business of the Disciples to urge unity as the most immediate duty of the church, and to see to it that they themselves practice unity by embracing all Christians in their own fellowship.

The Christian Century has its opinion on the meaning of baptism. We are taking occasion in the next few weeks to state that opinion as clearly as we can, and earnestly. But this opinion of ours on baptism, be it right or wrong, affects not at all, vitally, the duty of all followers of Christ to live in complete unity with all other followers of Christ. Our opinion on baptism stands or falls by itself—it neither supports the cause of Christian unity nor, in case it is an erroneous opinion, does it obviate the possibility and duty of Christian unity. Unity rests upon the undisputed will of Christ. The administration of baptism is a question that will be settled not in a divided church as a means to unity but in a united church as a result of unity.

Meantime our readers have shown such a hearty interest in the proposed discussion of the baptism question that we undertake with not a little satisfaction to give our opinion.

Protestant and Catholic Missionary Policies

From the Independent we take this note on the mission policies of Catholics and Protestants:

Father Kenelly, a Catholic missioner in China, calls attention to one point of difference between Catholic and Protestant missionaries in that empire. With the exception of the China Inland Mission, no Protestant missionaries adopt the Chinese dress, but that is not the way with Catholics: "As to his dress, the missioner is clothed as a Chinaman—flowing garments, baggy pants and satin headgear, and in the heart of the country he generally wears the pigtail. The pigtail is being partially discarded at present. Some of the old missioners regret exceedingly the change from the time-honored custom of the past, but the young generation is progressive and deems reform necessary." Which is the better way is not clear; the bishops go so far as to dress in all the state of mandarins. Father Kenelly says that in the missions about Shanghai there are more converts than the Protestants have in all China. But the Catholic missions are some centuries older than the Protestant, which is much to their credit, so the habit of dress may not be important. Father Kenelly mentions another disadvantage which Protestants ought to be ashamed of: "A notable point about the Protestants is the number of their divisions. There are no less than ninety-two different denominations of Protestants carrying on work in China, and some of them have only two or three members."

—A correspondent calls our attention to an infelicity of expression in last week's issue. In speaking of Mr. Nichols and his sale of the "Christian Union" to the owner of the "Christian Standard" we made the observation that Mr. Nichols "was delivering the goods to the man that bought him." Our editorial head must have been nodding, that the possible invidiousness of that remark did not occur to it. It was not intended to imply that Mr. Nichols had sold himself with his paper. We differ radically from him in some things. We believe he is lending himself to an unholy cause in attacking the Foreign Missionary Society. But we do not question for a moment his sterling nonesty and Christian character.

Monday Moods

Religious Controversy

Religious controversy of the dogmatic, motive-impugning, cruelly critical type is to me precisely what war was to General Sherman. And when our religious press takes on the controversial color, in company with many of my brethren, I am deeply pained. What is worse, I feel myself becoming controversial too. It is ever so. "Our natures are subdued to what they work in like the dyers hand." A controversial press makes a controversial constituency.

The following story now making the rounds of numerous funny pages is only too true in principle. A man saw his cook going out of the house one evening with a large carving knife in her hand. "Where are you going, Mary?" he asked. "I's gwine t' church." "Well, what are you going to do with that knife?" "They's a religious dispute goin' on down there," said Mary, "an' I wanter see my side gits de best of it."

The effect of controversy in religious journals upon certain fine types of mind is calamitous. One of the saintliest men that I know, an elder in one of our strongest churches, does not subscribe for a single religious paper. I asked him why. He replied that he discontinued both of our leading journals because, as he put it, "they were continually fighting each other." Moreover he stated that he was compelled to discontinue the papers in order to safeguard his own faith and that of his wife, so seriously did they take to heart the "belligerency" of the papers in question. This man has none of our religious journals in his home today. And he and his wife are choice spirits—the very salt of this earth.

This man's position is perhaps extreme. His is a very sensitive soul but his feelings and those of his gentle-spirited wife illustrate a tendency much larger and deeper in our brotherhood than many of us have imagined. The average subscriber to a church paper is not interested in caustic controversial articles. He often fails to get the subtle issue at stake but he seldom misses the animus, the unbrotherly allusions and the sarcastic sting.

Hugh Black puts his finger on the sore spot of such controversies in an able sermon from the text, "Speaking the truth in love." Says he, "Most of our disputations are beyond our point. So much of it is a matter of wrong emphasis. We put the accent on the wrong syllable, like a foreigner speaking English. To speak a foreign tongue with anything like accuracy we must live among the people till the language saturates the ear. If we lived in the atmosphere of Christ's love, and not merely paid a hasty visit to it now and then, if Christ's love were the climate of our souls, truth-speaking would be our mother tongue and we would not make so many mistakes of emphasis. Truth would be bathed in love, till the two became as one. We would see that truth is love and that without love there is no truth."

I am making no plea for a colorless, inane and spiritless journalism or ministry. I agree with that distinguished Presbyterian scholar, whose name has slipped my memory, that there is "a species of amiability that approaches imbecility." There must be controversy but let it be with the great common enemy—with Greed, Wickedness, Sin in the body social and political, rather than tragic fratricidal warfare that hinders frightfully the onmarch of the kingdom under the Prince of Peace.

But was not Jesus a controversialist? He has been called such. I am under the impression that Stalker devotes a chapter to Jesus as such in his "Imago Christi" and N. S. Haynes has recently written a book entitled "Jesus as a Controversialist." And what a superb and gentle controversialist Jesus was! Would that our editors, ministers and church members generally went to His school to learn His method and spirit of controversy. If we did I am sure of one thing—there would be less controversy in our journals, in our pulpits and in our pens and more, vastly more love. I do not pretend to know how to conduct a religious paper. It is not easy work. I am sure of that. To be an editor of a religious journal demands more spirituality, more intellect and more patience than I possess. But this I will say: If all of our religious journals were to take on the controversial color, deeply and permanently, I think it would be a gain in behalf of Christian culture if we discontinued them and substituted "Life," "Puck," and "Judge," for to my way of thinking, there is more real religion in a clean cartoon than in an editorial leadership that bristles with belligerency and is soaked in sarcasm.

Interpretations

Conservation of the Spiritual

"Conservation" is one of the popular and earnest words of our day. It speaks the heart-beat of humanity, and registers the progress of our race towards the realized democracy. It carries smiting of conscience to them who are graspingly prodigal of nature's resources and glad promises to hosts of patient plodders. Born in our new social awakening it seeks to save the timber, the water power, the mines, for God's many instead of allowing them to be exploited for the enrichment of the few. Man has suddenly come to regard himself as a foolish waster. He has burned, slain, scattered and pillaged with thoughtless prodigality. In our generation he has resolved to be a wise economizer and to husband his resources. He is now passionately seeking to save that which he formerly lost. This is a day of by-products. Science is picking up the fragments that nothing may be lost.

Surely out of our thought of material conservation, Jesus, if he were here to speak as he once did, would draw many lessons concerning the conservation of the spiritual. He loved to talk of the seed, the sower, and the ground. We cannot imagine what profound analogies he would read from our day, for we do not have his imagination; but certainly we know that he would be greatly pleased with all efforts "to seek and to save that which is lost."

Agriculture today affords us many terms capable of illustrating the spiritual. "That is a good stand" is an expression used to refer to a field of corn where there has been practically universal generation and growth of the seed. There are no waste gaps of missing hills. "Conservation of fertility" and "conservation of moisture" are other terms the significance of which are well understood. Plant life like all life must be fed. Earth offers ten elements of food. These are silicon sodium, sulphur, calcium, chlorin, phosphorus, potassium, magnesium, iron, and nitrogen. All plants do not require the same proportion of these chemical elements, hence "rotation of crops" is required. Nitrogen is found in great abundance in the air and is readily appropriated by the legumes and transferred to the soil ready for other varieties of plant life to use. The legumes in their world are the spiritual prophets. Carbon oxygen and hydrogen, other elements of plant food are secured from air and water.

Now all this is illustrative of the kingdom of the Spirit. "Consider the lily," is a divine injunction. In the realm of the soul we need the redemption of conservation. We need to make the elder brother good and liberal-hearted even while he stays at home—and the younger too. Our good Samaritan is, like Christ himself, ever clearing the road of the robbers that beat and plunder. Is not conservation exactly the thing we need in our churches? "The stand" is not exceptionally good. There are too many gaps made so by the infertility of our irresponsible Christians. A few pray, a few give to missions, a few read religious books, a few know their Master. There are too many that may be likened to "exhausted soil." Fertility is not maintained. All of us live by extracting but a few of the elements of God's grace. All the chemical elements of the soil must be preserved to produce splendid harvests. Have you ever observed that it takes an immense amount of God's grace to produce a full-formed soul?

The spiritual world has its chemistry as well as the physical. There are many elements that go to make a soul. Some try to live on work alone. They should conserve the worship instincts of their souls. Others live lean lives by doctrine alone. They should engage in doing and devotion. The soul has vast capacities for search after food, and God encourages every one to partake of his plenitude.

We must conserve the dews of God's grace. Every one sooner or later will come to a drouth period in his life. Instead of advancing to place and power he will be receding. Instead of his circle of friends enlarging it will be diminishing. In place of health will come halting and pain. It will be well for us in those days if we can draw upon an exhaustless fountain of mercies. The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. "Fulness" consisteth not in phosphorus and potassium, in calcium and chlorin, in silicon or sodium, but it consisteth of man worshiping, believing, repenting, serving, trusting and growing into the likeness of God.

What the Ministry Has Meant to Me

After Fifty Years of Service

BY B. B. TYLER

EDITORS' NOTE.—The celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of Dr. Tyler's ordination to the ministry is an event in which those who were privileged to attend the exercises in South Broadway church were joined by many thousands of Disciples, the continent over. And not Disciples only, but leaders in all denominations who have come into contact with this intrepid preacher, are giving expression to their esteem for him and his great ministry. Dr. Tyler has been one of the most catholic-minded preachers the Disciples have produced in the last half-century. He has been an honor to the ministry and the Church of God. To such a man the ministry must have rich and ripe meanings. We have asked Dr. Tyler to tell the readers of The Christian Century what the ministry has meant to him, and he has expressed his heart in the following article.

The ministry has not meant to me an abundance of this world's goods. I was poor when I began to preach a half century ago, and I have held my own! I have, at this moment, a dollar and ninety cents to my credit in a Denver bank, and two dollars and twenty-four cents in cash! Mrs. Tyler has a title deed to a cozy little home that cost three thousand dollars. A dear mother in Israel, in New York, remembered me in her will and a small sum came to me from my father's estate.

Happier Than Men of Wealth.

In this way I was in a financial condition to pay for our little home. I do not own an acre of land, nor have I a single investment in stocks or bonds. I have not saved a dollar out of what has come to me an account of ministerial service. I am able, therefore, to repeat with emphasis that the ministry has not meant, to me, wealth with the things which the word usually implies. I am like Paul in this one thing: Having food and raiment I am, and have been, content. I would rather spend my life in the ministry, die in an alms house, and be buried in a pauper's grave than to engage in any other calling, vocation or service, and become, thereby, a millionaire. I certainly have had a happier experience than that which comes to the average man of wealth.

Uniform Kindness of His Brethren.

My brethren and the people whom I have served have been more than good to me, they have uniformly, and in every place, given to me, with apparently glad hearts, and certainly with ever open hands, the necessities, and now and again some of the luxuries of life. What a blessed experience I have had all along the way! Surely goodness and mercy have followed me. And now that my shadow is growing in length, the horizon is radiant and the future is glorious.

A Member of the Holy Catholic Church.

The ministry has meant to me the companionship of some of the best men and women on earth. I am not, in this sentence, speaking exclusively of those who are known as Disciples of Christ. I am a member of the church universal, the Holy Catholic Church, the church that Jesus loved and for the redemption of which he gave his life. During the half century of service, recently completed, I have associated freely with my spiritual kinspeople in all the denominations. I have been, and now am, in perfect accord with Alexander Campbell when he said, "It is the image of Christ the Christian looks for and loves; and this does not consist in being exact in a few items, but in general devotion to the whole truth as far as known."

To me this wide and constant fellowship has been at once pleasant and profitable—profitable intellectually, socially, morally, spiritually.

A Burden Bearing Ministry.

The ministry has also meant to me burden bearing, weariness, anxiety, perplexity. But I have learned, by an unutterably blessed experience, that the yoke of my Master is easy, that his burden is light. This weariness, this anxiety, and these perplexities, have been unnecessary. This I now understand. "I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me." There is no valid reason for anxiety, for worry, when in the service of our loving Lord. One of his ambassadors said, "In nothing be anxious." Our Christ cares for his own. All power belongs to Him and He is Himself incarnate love. Trust Him. Be of good cheer. He orders all things to work together for the good of those who love Him. He can solve our problems, and he will, if we will permit him to do so. He knows the end from the beginning, and all the steps of the way. And why suffer from weariness. "Come unto me," says the Master, "and I will give you rest."

The ministry has meant to me a knowledge of these things as a result of personal experience.

The Privilege and Honor of Service.

The ministry has meant to me, likewise, the privilege and honor of service. He loved me and gave Himself for me. It is but reasonable that I should love Him and manifest this love in a joyous, enthusiastic and constant service. It is a privilege to serve one whom we love. To serve the Christ in the ministry of the word, in the preaching of his gospel, is a privilege that I am unable to set forth adequately in words which belong to my vocabulary. My ministry has been one of privilege rather than of duty. The word duty is a word that I seldom use.

Ministry More Than Preaching.

And when I consider the nature, the work, the official dignity and supreme authority of Him whom I have sought to serve, the honor is too great for adequate verbal expression. The ministry, to me, means not merely the composition and delivery of sermons—it means doing good unto all men, especially to those who are of the household of the faith. Can there be a greater honor than to be associated with the Son of God in serving those who bear the image and likeness of God?

"Preach the gospel," said Jesus to his personal friends. "Make disciples," was his parting injunction to his associates, companions, pupils, with the encouraging assurance of his unfailing presence and help, even to the end. When Paul was ready for the axe of the executioner he said to his spiritual son, "Preach the word." To this great work Paul had given himself with a quenchless enthusiasm. To herald the good news, to preach the gospel, is to recite with a deep appreciation God's love message to the sons and daughters of earth. Preaching the gospel is not the same as to give an exposition of a system of theology. To engage in this work is not to engage in argumentation or disputation. To proclaim the message of God's love for human kind, embodied in the life and work of the Man of Nazareth, is to enjoy an experience of rapture surpassing any and all other experiences vouchsafed to man. It is to experience a veritable spiritual intoxication. I wish that I could utter with the voice, or place on paper, an adequate, and satisfactory, statement of what I think and how deeply I feel on this matter. I am not, however, competent to the task. Learn what it is by experience, as I have, during this half century of glorious and uninterrupted opportunity.

REV. B. B. TYLER, Denver:—The Colorado Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with glad acclaim and unanimous standing vote, congratulate you and the whole church on your long and fruitful service in the cause of God and man. May the good God with long life satisfy you.—HENRY W. WARREN.

FROM THE CATHOLIC REGISTER, OF DENVER.

There is an old gentleman—no fitter name than gentleman can we find for him—who is the minister of the South Broadway Christian Church. He is Doctor Tyler and he celebrated this week his fiftieth year as minister.. We wish him many more years of life, for we believe that whatever years God may give him will be spent in honest, earnest, kindly and self-satisfying work. Instead of being outside we would he was of us.

A FELLOW PASTOR'S APPRECIATION

With An Account of the Denver Celebration.

BY GEORGE B. VAN ARSDALL.

Sunday, September 3, was a memorable day in the religious annals of Denver, Colo. Nothing that has occurred in this city for years, that is of a religious nature, has attracted more wide-spread interest. The dedication of the largest church building in the city would not attract more people or receive more newspaper publicity or be the theme of conversation among more people than was the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of Dr. B. B. Tyler in the ministry of the Gospel of the Christ. Fifty years of uninterrupted ministry of the Word is a fact briefly stated but the story of those years and what they mean to the kingdom—well men and women did show that they had some appreciation of such a remarkable life record. Seldom in the history of a city like Denver, where only the unusual attracts, yes, seldom even here does a more significant thing happen than that of which I shall attempt to give you some brief account.

Dr. Tyler's Ordination.

Fifty years ago on the fourth of September, Benjamin Bushrod Tyler was ordained to be an evangelist of the Christian church by the elders of the church at Eureka, Ill. His ordination papers he still carries with him lest some one may question his right to preach. He had no thought, did this young man, of ever becoming a city pastor. His highest ambition was to follow in the ways of his father, who was a sort of general all around helper of men and women and little children. He cared for the poor, settled estates and looked after the widows and orphans as a kind of pastime. The young evangelist thought to walk in the footsteps of his father, who said after hearing him preach his first sermon that he would rather have his son to be a preacher than to sit in the United States Senate. It should be recalled that it was an honor to be a senator in those days. But God had a service marked out for this young preacher of which he little dreamed. His first convert was a murderer—a man by the name of Brewer, who had killed a man and escaped conviction at the hands of the jury. But Dr. Tyler convicted him of sin and he sought the Saviour. From that day to this no man or woman has ever been too low for the hand of this good man to be extended to him in love and friendship. In my native town was an old lawyer who was invariably on the defense in every case that he tried. I never knew him to prosecute any man. One day I asked him why he was always defending men. He said the first case he ever tried he prosecuted a man and he was hanged. He always defended men after that. This first convert may have had an influence on the life of this preacher for half a century, who knows.

First Pastorate.

His first pastorate was at Charleston, Ill. The other churches he has served are Terre Haute, Indiana; Frankfort, Ky; The First Church, Louisville, Ky., New York City, Colorado Springs and South Broadway, Denver. The story of his life ministry is the same in every place. He has never sought a position, he has always gone to churches that were in some hard lines, generally financial, and wanted him to pull them out of the hole. He has paid off church debts, settled quarrels and put indifferent congregations to work. But he never did any of these things by the direct method. He preached Christ and his love; the people became religious and attended to these chores of their own accord. Every congregation that he served became stronger by his ministry. What a tribute to the wisdom of his work.

Ministry to Individuals.

But while the seven churches that he served, like the seven churches of Asia, found Christ walking among them in the person of his servant, they were not the only recipients of his ministry. While he has built churches as such, his greatest ministry has been to individuals. He is an ideal pastor—a friend to the souls of men. He thinks more of men than he does of methods. He is not an organizer, he would rather visit the sick than to organize the largest men's club in the brotherhood. Men like to hear him preach and they are borne to the gates of light by his prayers, but above all they want to come in touch with his great warm heart and feel the thrill of a new life within. They somehow expect that young men will be hopeful—they have not faced the world yet. But here is a man who has tasted it all, who has been surprised at the goodness of men and disappointed by their perversity and yet in whom the faith of experience is larger than the faith of theory in others. I do not know that his advice to men in hard places is wiser than that of thousands of other men, but advice doesn't count for much anyway. It is the touch of his life that gives them new heart. Men go to the South Broadway Christian Church just to look upon the face of the preacher. They know he has been with God. Does any age need anything more than just this kind of preachers?

His Unsectarian Spirit.

I think that this explains Dr. Tyler's popularity with men of all religious faiths. Few men are more loyal to the Book than he, none preach their convictions more clearly than he or treat denominational hindrances with more candor. He does not sugar coat a sermon on the duty of the Disciples any more than one on the derelictions of the Methodists. But after eleven years in Denver he is one of the most popular preachers among all denominations in the city. Yet everybody knows where he stands and what he pleads for. This is not an easy distinction to achieve. Whether men agree with him or not they feel that here is a man who gets his conviction and his life from God.

I am not so sure but in this Dr. Tyler is one of the world's greatest prophets of Christian Union. Note that I say he is a prophet of union. It is what the man is that tells for union.

A Unique Meeting.

Fifty years ago such a meeting as that of last Sunday evening would hardly have been possible. To be sure it is a rare thing for a man to preach for half a century, and Dr. Tyler has done nothing but preach; he has not been an educator or a journalist or a life insurance agent, he has been a preacher. But not every man would call out such a demonstration as he did. Of course all the Christian churches of the city and vicinity adjourned their services. That was to be expected. But every church of the denominations in that portion of the city adjourned and practically every minister in Denver sent a letter of congratulation. The South Broadway Church was packed to the galleries long before the hour of meeting. Hundreds were turned away. Such a meeting as that has been the portion of but few to experience. I say 'has been' for I do not believe such meetings will be uncommon in the future I mean meetings expressive of the bonds of union in Christ. Dr. Tyler enjoys the distinction of being a kind of John the Baptist of Christian union. Nobody can monopolize him and yet everybody claims him. The leading denominations of Denver were represented by their pastors, each one of them speaking as if he was their peculiar possession. The Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Colorado, then in session, sent a telegram of congratulation bearing the signature of Bishop Warren. The first letter read was from New York City, the second from Spokane, Wash. Time would fail me to mention the letters from church elders and deacons, from young preachers and old preachers, from musicians and washer-women.

Work Not Done.

The occasion was solemn with the spirit of gratitude for the life and labors of this good man and his devoted wife, who has shared the meaning of his every experience and next to his Master has made him. It was fragrant with sweet incense from his alabaster box of cheer. Dr. Tyler is still a young man though past three score years and ten. The report has gone abroad that he would quit with his semi-centennial. It is not true. He will stop preaching only when his Master says "come up higher." Long may he live—an ideal pastor and faithful friend to the souls of men. I do not anticipate that there will be any failing powers in his day, but the inevitable evening will be sunlit with the radiance of the Eternal Morning.

Home and Heaven

Home is the best interpreter of heaven. Home is not a place or a state, but a fellowship. It is not the walls of a house that make a home, for many who are housed well enough are yet homeless, having none of the joys of mutual kindness and help which bind men and women in the life of the home. Nor is home an internal condition of feeling, but a fellowship which takes us out of ourselves and our feelings, and makes us feel with and for others. So heaven is the perfect fellowship of those who have learned to forget self in the joys of others. And as home finds its center in the one who most perfectly exemplifies the love which is its life—generally in the home-making mother—so heaven finds its center in Him whose life was the perfect exemplification of the spirit of sacrifice.—The Canadian Christian.

A Bible in every human habitation is something well worth trying to achieve. But I can tell you of something better still. It is Christ himself, in any one of the humblest of his disciples, casting his shadow on the wall. Breathing men, not breathless books, must carry salvation round the world. —Roswell D. Hitchcock.

The psalmist compares the law of God to a lantern, good example bears it. It is safe following him that carries the light. If he walk without the light, he shall walk without me.—Joseph Hall.

The Men and Religion Movement

Breadth, Intensity and Reasonableness of the Great Enterprise Just Launched

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

The first gun in the campaign of the Men and Religion Movement in Chicago has been fired. The team of workers from the different departments met with 200 Chicago leaders in a dinner at the Auditorium, September 22, and the movement is definitely on here.

The Men and Religion Movement is conceived in a most statesmanlike way. There is nothing narrow or conventional about it. It will not depend upon mass meetings and emotional froth but upon a campaign of education such as the church has never seen before. The plan is that the "team" shall visit cities all over the United States and hold institutes at which men, both clergy and laity shall be instructed in the various possible methods to reach men and boys. The movement will not do the work but only show the churches how it is to be done.

Religion's Appeal to Men.

It has been found in experience that certain things in religion appeal more specifically to men. These natural lines of approach will be followed. Men have shown considerable interest in Bible study, therefore the Sunday-school leaders have been invited to furnish certain definite policies to induce men in larger numbers to enter the Bible classes for men throughout the country.

The social interest of men is a marked feature of our modern times. The social question is so far almost exclusively a masculine hobby. It will be shown to men everywhere that this human movement arose out of the spirit of the Christian religion and that there is no true social remedy that does not include the religion of Jesus Christ.

Men and Missions.

The missionary interest of men is a marked fact of modern experience. The Laymen's movement we have just witnessed has shown that men can be profoundly interested in such a broad and comprehensive policy as is involved in the plans for taking the world for Christ in this generation. Hence missions will have a large place in the Men and Religion movement.

It has been shown that men can be interested in being "big brothers" to the boys of the community. Hence there is to be a boys' movement which shall be carried on not only to save boys but to save the men who save the boys. The arousement of paternal feelings in all the men of the community toward our future citizens will be a task of profound significance.

Labor Problem and the Church.

Those interested in the labor question will be met with the labor program of the church. This is the most sensitive spot of the present time. Rauschenbusch, in speaking of this, warns the Movement in the following language, "The people think they know pretty well what the church has to say on missions and Bible study. But what will they dare to say on the terrible tangle of the labor question? This will be the storm center of the movement. Pray for the grace of God on those who have to deal with it. If they fail in prudence, they may run the movement on the rocks. If they fail in courage, they will certainly beach it on the mud-flats of indifference and contempt." The Movement will definitely face the issue of winning the factory populations to the cause of religion.

Old Fashioned Evangelism Not Taboo.

Nor is old-fashioned evangelism taboo. It is interesting to see evangelists like Biederwolf and David Russell of South Africa, hobnobbing in the best of good feeling with Charles Stelzle and Raymond Robins. It is worth while to see these two great departments of religious effort coöperating for the common good. There will be old-time religion of the better sort and a definite effort to win men to give their hearts to Jesus Christ and join the church. This, however, will be not so much a direct result of the Movement as an impetus that will come to the churches through the Movement. Each church will be asked to work on the evangelistic problem in its own way.

Let us now keep in mind that all these different interests are to be taught in institutes by the "team" which is composed of eminent specialists in every field. A follow-up man will remain with the churches in each city to help them to work all this teaching into practice.

Y. M. C. A. the Source.

The Movement had its inception in the circles of the Y. M. C. A., which doubtless is in the background as the supporting agency. The men's Brotherhoods of the different churches are all officially represented in the Movement. The aim is to correlate every distinctly masculine movement in the church with the Men and Religion Movement.

We cannot better illustrate the spirit of the movement than by quoting from some of the five minute addresses made by the different leaders in the dinner at the Auditorium of which we have made mention.

The first of the five minute speeches was made by our own Mr. Pierce of the Adult Bible class department of the International Sunday-school Association. He insisted that Bible study had already proven itself as an agency for men. We thought while he spoke of the statistics showing that of all the meetings of the church, there is the largest masculine element in the Sunday-school, next largest at preaching, and the smallest at the prayer-meetings. Mr. Pierce insisted that the best way to make men religious was to give them the Bible.

Mr. Alexander and the Boy Problem.

Mr. Alexander spoke on the Boy Problem. He insisted that there was no boy problem but only a man problem. When men teach in the Sunday-school the boys attend. He deplored the custom of furnishing women teachers to boys at the most critical stage of their lives when only a man can understand. He insisted that the way to solve the boy problem is to get the men to work at it. He presented the development of the boy Jesus as the ideal development. "He grew in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man." This is the physical, mental, social and religious. A distortion of the physical makes a "sport." Hypertrophy of the mental, makes a "high-brow." Too much of the social means a "dude." Excess of a certain kind of religion means a fanatic.

An Evangelist from the Transvaal.

David Russell, the evangelist, is from the Transvaal. Several million pounds sterling were taken from the gold mines at his home at Johannesburg in July. He can tell thrilling lion and bear stories but insists upon talking the great things of the gospel with a thoughtfulness that carries conviction. He believes that the church all over the world has faced in the last five years large losses from its working force of men. He believes it is due to our age spirit of democracy which mistakenly identifies the church with the forces of oppression. He openly advocates an alliance of what he calls the "social enthusiast" and the evangelist. In their team work he hopes to find the remedy for the alienation of the men from the churches.

Presbyterian Expert on Labor Problem.

Charles Stelzle, the labor expert of the Presbyterian church, is a member of the team. He called attention to the phenomenal growth of the city and to the certainty that the city would soon dominate the nation. He also called attention to the fact that where people were thickest in the city, there the church was thinnest. It was as though the church was saying, we leave you to solve your own social problem. He mentioned the social surveys that are being made in different cities which have been published in the "Social Survey" and said that upon the scientific foundation of these labors we would work out a new program for the church in each community.

Fred B. Smith, the Leader.

Fred B. Smith, of the Y. M. C. A. movement, is everywhere known in the cities as an evangelist for men. He is the captain of the forces. If any doubt the wisdom of this choice, they have to hear him to be entirely converted. He boldly asserts a big, broad policy for the Movement which will command the interest of men everywhere. He insists that he believes in old-time religion but not in all brands of it. He is evangelical to the core but not a fogey. Men need to know that this combination can exist. He has for a motto, "Shoot low." By this he means, keep this movement practical. He invites the pastors everywhere to criticise the programs offered, on the practical side. He insists that above all else, the Movement must be workable even in the little churches. He said if he had his way, he would omit all the mass meetings and make the Movement educational. This statement from an evangelist was a most thrilling and significant one. He said that the movement would employ no crank evangelists. Many had applied and been rejected. It was the purpose that only men who lived harmoniously in their own churches should have a place in the Movement. It was his expressed purpose that the music was to be the highest grade of ecclesiastical music. Ditties that have been selling the "nth" thousand of the latest evangelistic song book are to be barred. As a significant token of the reality of the purpose, the meeting adjourned by singing the doxology in the most reverent way.

Books of the Movement.

It is time for all our churches to get ready to reap the fullest harvest from this movement. The pastor should buy without fail the text-books of the movement, Cope's "The Efficient Laymen," published by Griffith & Rowland, and also a book published by the Y. M. C. A. press in New York, with a staff of eminent editors, called "Men and Religion." A third book that fits well would be Forbush's "Church Work Among Boys," published by the Pilgrim Press.

The local Brotherhood or Men's Club should sit up and take notice of this movement. They cannot afford to be ignorant of these mighty spiritual forces that are at work for the kingdom these days.

Every church should have a "Men and Re-

The Moral Leaders of Israel

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XL. Nehemiah and the Rebuilding of the Walls

October 8. Text for Special Study. Neh. 6.

1. THE RECORDS OF NEHEMIAH AND EZRA.

The prophetic histories of the Hebrew people are contained in the books of Judges, Samuel and Kings. But the priests also had their narratives of the national experience, in which the ceremonies of religion were particularly emphasized. These histories are contained in the two Books of Chronicles, and in the two short supplementary books of Ezra and Nehemiah. That the latter were originally a part of the material of Chronicles is evident from a comparison of the first verses of Ezra with the close of II Chronicles, which breaks off suddenly in the middle of a sentence.

The sources from which the Books of Nehemiah and Ezra are compiled by the author of Chronicles were the personal journals of the two leaders, as is shown by the use of the first person in portions of the narratives (Neh. 1:1-7:73a; Ezra 7:27-9:15). But the framework in which these personal memoirs are set is clearly the work of the Chronicler, as is shown by many peculiarities of style.

Moreover, since the events of the age of these two leaders were more or less remote at the time when the Chronicler wrote somewhere in the latter portion of the fourth century B. C., there is more or less confusion in the order of incidents and of literary materials included in the two books. Any one who takes the trouble to read consecutively through the books of Ezra-Nehemiah will discover the difficulty of tracing the events in any satisfactory order.

The chief question arising from this irregularity in the records relates to the sequence in which the labors of Ezra and Nehemiah stand to each other respectively. It was manifestly the understanding of the Chronicler that Ezra visited Jerusalem first and established the legal reforms in harmony with the new code of law which he brought from Babylon. But this is so difficult to harmonize with the total array of facts presented by the two records, that many modern biblical scholars have been convinced that the work of Nehemiah was first, and that his physical reconstruction of the city prepared the way for the later work of Ezra.

Of course if the writers of the documents had been at any trouble to specify the dates, there would have been no confusion. For example, in Ezra 7:17, Ezra's journey is placed "in the seventh year of Artaxerxes King of Persia." But which Artaxerxes? If the first (464-426 B. C.), then the date of the journey was 458 B. C. But if the second king of that name is meant (404-358 B. C.), then the date was 397 B. C. Again in Neh. 1:1, 2:1, the journey of Nehemiah to Jerusalem is dated in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes. Here the same problem arises. Is the date 445 or 384 B. C.? The facts to be considered are too numerous to be outlined here, but they strongly favor the conclusion that the patron of Nehemiah was the first Artaxerxes, and that Ezra's work lay in the reign of the second. Perhaps the strong priestly bias of the Chronicler, together with the general indistinctness of the times with which he was dealing, led him to favor the priestly rather than the administrative reformer as the one who began the actual revival of Jerusalem's fortunes.

2. THE MESSAGE TO NEHEMIAH.

The Jewish people whose fathers were the exiles of the Babylonian age were scattered widely through the Persian empire in the period of Xerxes and his successors. Some indication is given of this large element of the empire in the Book of Esther. There were occasions on which some of these Jews rose to eminence as favorites of the rulers. It has always been the boast of that race that if it could not rule directly, it could at least furnish now and then a Joseph to Pharoah, a Daniel to Nebuchadrezzar, a Nehemiah to Artaxerxes, or a Beaconsfield to Victoria.

In 445 B. C. one of the favored courtiers of Artaxerxes I. was Nehemiah, a Jew of the dispersion. He had never been in Jerusalem, but a brother of his, Hanam by name (Neh. 1:2, 7:12) was living there. So low were the fortunes of the city that Hanam and certain other Jews determined to make a journey to the east and beg the assistance of some of their richer brthren in behalf of Judah. It is possible, of course, that this deputation went from Persia to Judah to inspect the conditions there, and bring report to the Jewish people in the east. When they arrived at Susa (Shushan) the capital of the empire, they at once sought Nehemiah as the most powerful of their race, and the man most likely to help them. Nehemiah's record of the news brought by the deputation leaves no doubt that the chief factor in the population of Judah at this time was the "remnant" left by Nebuchadrezzar at the time of the seige, and that the number of returned exiles was as yet inconsiderable. So pitiful was the story they told that the sympathetic chamberlain was filled with profound grief, and spent some days in prayer and fasting.

When he appeared again before the king he was so changed in appearance and behavior that he excited the interest of his royal friend, who asked him the cause of his trouble, saying, "Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick? This is nothing else but sorrow of heart." The answer of Nehemiah is classic: "Why shou'd not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my father's sepulchres lieth waste, and the gates thereof are consumed with fire?" (Neh. 2:2.) The king then asked what it was Nehemiah wished to do, and at his request leave was granted him to visit Jerusalem and assume charge of affairs in the province of Judah for a set term of years. Hitherto, at least since the days when Zerubbabel was governor, the men in charge of the province had been Persian deputies, who had little concern save to keep down revolt and collect the royal revenues. Now, after many days, Judah was to have a member of its own race, a wise, wealthy, and sympathetic governor.

3. NEHEMIAH'S JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM.

With the authority of a royal passport and his commission as chief of the province, Nehemiah started on his long journey to Jerusalem. He took with him a small bodyguard, and was empowered to make requisition of the head forester for such timber as might be needed in the repairs he had in mind.

Arriving at last in Jerusalem, Nehemiah took an early occasion to look over the situation. Without consulting any of the authorities, he started out at night to inspect the ruins from every side. But so great was the overthrow and so extensive the heaps of debris that he could not compute the circuit of the fallen walls on the beast he rode, but was compelled to turn aside here and there into the ravines that bordered the city on the south and east. On the following day he summoned the leaders and made known to them his plan to rebuild the walls, which had lain prostrate since the fatal siege of the city by Nebuchadrezzar a hundred and forty years before. The people responded readily to his appeal, heartened by the sympathetic leadership of so great a man, and the work was at once begun.

But a work so important as this could not fail to stir up opposition. The foes of Judah on every side, the tribes like Ammon, Edom, the Philistines, the Samaritans and the like, were little pleased to see their old enemy, whose rebuilding had been so long delayed as to seem impossible, now likely to secure the very thing needed to give it protection and power—an inclosing wall. Furthermore, the elements within the province of Judah were by no means harmonious. Were the native-born Jews jealous of those returned exiles who had come from the east? Were the people of the country districts evil-affected toward those who were laboring for the revival of the city? Were the descendants of the royal line of Judah at the head of a combination of nobles and wealthy men who oppressed the peasant class? Or was there cleavage between the earnest followers of the Jehovah worship and the lax and indifferent groups in the province? And if one of more of these causes of distrust and partisanship prevailed, how were they affected by the coming of Nehemiah, and his vigorous measures in behalf of the city's revival?

Our sources are too meagre to supply the answer to these questions. But it is apparent that the men who proved the strongest adversaries of the new governor were a combination of Jews and foreigners. Sanballat, a leader from Beth-horan, Tobiah, an Ammonite, and Geshem or Gashum, an Arab shiekh, were the head of his confederacy of opposition. This clique had strong support in the city, through common interest and domestic alliances (Neh. 6:17-19). But in spite of all opposition the work of Nehemiah, powerfully aided by the patriotism of the people, went on to success.

4. THE BUILDING OF THE WALLS.

The Book of Nehemiah is our most picturesque and detailed source for the topography of Jerusalem. In chapter 2 there is given an interesting account of the night journey of the pasha around the city, with notice of the different sections of the walls, and in chapter 3 there is a complete list of the gates and the intervening battlements on which the work of reconstruction went forward. The careful comparison of these chapters with any reliable map of Jerusalem in that period will prove of value.

The building of the walls was the most important feature of the revival of Jerusalem. It did not seem possible that the city could ever regain its rightful place as the capital of the nation as long as it was unprotected from attack. Zechariah had tried to encourage the peop'e by the assurance that Jehovah was their protection, and that no walls could be sufficiently large to enclose the multitude of her people (Zech. 2:1-5). But this was only a palliative for the disheartened citizens of the place. Now, however, the enterprise was really under way. Nehemiah put different groups at work on the various sections of the wall. These included family bands of builders, local companies like the men of Jericho, Tekoa, Gibeon and Mizpah, or trade and professional groups, like the priests, the Levites, the goldsmiths, the apothecaries, and the other merchants.

The opposition was constant. The combination of Jews, Samaritans and heathen who had set themselves to defeat the work, left no effort untried to accomplish their purpose. They ridiculed the enterprise, they tried to alarm or divert the governor from his plans, they even planned attacks, less perhaps to seriously menace the builders than to dishearten them. But Nehemiah was equal to every emergency. He armed the workers against asault, he ordered his Persia bodyguard into the trenches to assist, he encouraged the faint-hearted, aided the poor, and threatened the indifferent, till at last the work was actually finished. In the incredibly short space of fifty-two days the walls were completed, to the delight of the loyal citizens and the discomfiture of their foes.

Chapter 6, the special section of Scripture chosen for this study, is significant as revealing nearly all the factors of Nehemiah's remarkable labors in behalf of Jerusalem. It gives some idea of the false and vile means taken by the foes of the movement to impede the work, and it gives the record of the triumphant completion of the work on which Nehemiah had set his heart. In many regards he was the most remarkable leader who appeared in Israel's later history, with the single exception of Judah Maccabæus. To him Jerusalem owed practically all the credit for her restoration to real comptence as a city.

THE MAN NEHEMIAH.

It is fortunate that our sources preserve a section of Nehemiah's private journal. It presents to us a most attractive picture of a thoroughly consecrated man of great wealth and high position, giving up every thing that might have tempted him to a life of leisure and honor at court to take up the thankless task of reconstructing the ancient city of his fathers. That it was written as a journal intime, and not for the eye of any other than himself, is clearly shown by such naive passages as 4:4, 5; 5:9; and 6:14. Every advantage lay on the side of refusal to consider the gospel. The work involved long absence from his home, the undertaking of an almost impossible task, the expenditure of large sums of money from his own private fortune, and the constant opposition of a band of unscrupulous plotters who sought to thwart every effort he made.

And what was his reward? Not the sense of official obligation fulfilled, for no one laid on him the burden. Nor was it the love of power, for the post of a pasha in Palestine was insignificant beside that of royal chamberlain at Susa. Nor was it any material gain, for he refused the salary of governor during the whole of his administration, and supported his large official household entirely at his own expense (Neh. 5:14-19). It was simply the call of patriotism, and the consciousness that he was the one man of his age to accomplish the restroation of Jerusalem.

His reforms were drastic but necessary. The observance of the Sabbath, the relief of the poor from unjust burdens of usury, the prohibition of mixed marriages, were all measures that advanced the material and moral welfare of Judah, and prepared for the more definitely religious activities of Ezra later on. How long a time Nehemiah spent in the Provinces altogether we do not know. But he left it on the high road to prosperity, and made for himself in the thought of the discerning student and historian, an imperishable place in the list of moral leaders of Israel.

OUR READERS' OPINIONS

A Growing Non-sectarian Church Membership

Editors The Christian Century:—The hope of Christian union does not rest primarily on commissions, committees and conventions. These are useful as means of agitation and acquaintance, but unfortunately they keep denominational differences to the front. They, in themselves, can never unite Christendom.

The hope of Christian union is in local unions of congregations of different denominations until the number of such unions shall be large enough to influence the machinery of each denomination represented in the local unions. It is perfectly natural that local congregations of similar doctrines and ideals should first unite. Thus, as in the church of which the writer is pastor, the Baptist and Disciples united. It came about primarily through economic necessity, but it was made possible by certain doctrinal agreements. The union has lasted six years.

A union church, like any other church, has subtractions and additions. In a few years, at most, the majority of its membership (and of its official board) will be composed of people who were never members of either church constituting the united church. That is, the predominating influence in the congregational life of the union church will be free from the denominational traditions of those who first formed the union.

To those experienced in practical Christian union two things are apparent. First, the uniting of two congregations wonderfully broadens the individuals of those congregations. The narrow minded and bigoted refuse to enter such a union, and this helps the broadening process. Doctrinal differences are never discussed. Hence the people are not "indoctrinated." And second, those who join the church after the union have little of no patience with division dogmas. In fact many of them join because it is a union church.

In our discussions of Christian union we have not taken that fact into sufficient consideration. This non-sectarian element will ultimately prevail in the bringing about of union. Their religion is not dogmatical but ethical; not creedal but practical. They can see no reason for division over doctrinal definitions. Their creed is John 7:17. They will forgive a pastor any mere doctrinal heresy. They demand the practical, social, spiritual gospel of Jesus. Their plea to Christendom is: Let us forget metaphysics and unite to save a suffering world! Believe what you must individually, but, for Christ's sake and for the sake of men, let us practice Christian union!

But would not such a union be sacrificing the historic plea for the restoration of the apostolic church? Would it not be peace with dishonor and union with compromise? To such as view our religion as an organization, under set, fixed and infallible rules, such an ideal of union cannot appeal. But to such as view our religion as an organism, that, by virtue of its inherent divinity, adapts itself so as to meet the needs of a changing yet ascending world, such a unity appeals because it is the only possible union. To those who believe that "where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty," that Christ is large enough and divine enough to appeal to every age through its own peculiar needs and problems, such a union is not only possible but is "the vision splendid" to the achievement of which no sacrifice is too great.

Layman Likes Jowett's Sermon

Editors Christian Century: It is enterprising on the part of The Christian Century, to have printed in a recent issue, the full text (as is evident) of J. H. Jowett's sermon on "The Severity of Christ." It is no small satisfaction in reading a great discourse, to realize that you are following it precisely as delivered—with no word omitted. Those who take the time to read it carefully will agree as to it being a notable sermon by a notable preacher, and that we are yet dwelling in an age of "eloquence and oratory." If you make as wise selection, and are able to repeat the treat as occasion offers, by giving us—in full—another and another of the Jowett sermons, surely 'twould be to the pleasure and profit of many readers.

ligion" committee. The writer has one in his church that will first seek to double the attendance of men at the services. Then the committee will seek to bring a portion of this new audience to the feet of Christ.

Primitive Religion Exclusively Masculine.

Once religion was exclusively a masculine function. The primitive religions did not permit women present at the sacred mysteries. The later religions admitted women but retained the leadership in the hands of the men. Christianity admitted women into some forms of religious leadership but through the ages men have been the great leaders. The saints were mostly men. The reformers were men. The theologians were men. Christianity became so masculine that it lost feminine sympathy so that it was possible for Calvin to sanction the burning of Servetus. Then set in with the emotional revivals of a hundred years ago the dominance of the feminine. We have so feminized the very language of religion that we have at last driven the great body of the men from the church. In the light of this history, may we not hope that we are on the eve of a great revival of masculine piety? Are we not to have a religion more intellectual, more alert on social questions, more aggressive, full of the deep and wonderful spirit of the great religious men of the ages? Let men everywhere pray that it may be so.

The Rise and Fall of the White Necktie

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

Amid the various changes in style of masculine headgear and other apparel, one item maintains a comparative stability. It is the white bow which encircles the collar of the minister of the gospel. Other styles come and go, but this goes on forever, and sometimes stays on too long. That is why this article is written.

I am not the first writer to attack (if the word attack can properly be used of this mild criticism) the white necktie. Spurgeon attacked it because it was the distinctive badge of a profession, denouncing it as "the last rag of popery." But Spurgeon was more or less erratic about such matters, and inasmuch as he never accepted even ordination to the gospel ministry, it may not have been his privilege to say what an ordained minister might or might not wear with propriety. My own criticism is not based on questions of class distinction, but upon the observation that the white necktie is not always white.

A Parting Souvenir.

A few weeks ago I had occasion to call upon a minister of another denomination in his own little city. He was holding a conference with certain other ministers from out of town, and they were dining together in the hotel. From there he left them to meet me by appointment in his own home. I noticed two things at the outset. One was that he still had in his mouth the toothpick which the hotel had contributed to him as a parting souvenir. He had kept it in his mouth as he left the hotel, and walked through the streets to his own home picking his teeth as he walked. The task was still uncompleted when he reached home, and he finished it in my presence, using what was left of the toothpick with apparent satisfaction. Incidentally the toothpick advertised the fact that he had been dining at the hotel instead of at home. But I saw the end of it. Before I left, the toothpick had done its full and final duty, and was thrown into the waste basket.

Not so the white necktie the minister was wearing. I fear that lived to fight another day. And already it had much service to its credit.

Beware.

Brethren, the white necktie is not always white. Wherefore beware of it. You rise before the dawn and go at your tasks while it still is gray morning, and do not realize how that yesterday's necktie will look to others in the glare of the noonday.

Listen to the story of the white necktie.

Once upon a time, and upon a Sabbath morning, the parson spake to his wife, saying: "Beloved, I have risen, and am partly clothed and wholly in my right mind. I have found my clean white shirt, and have removed from it nearly all the pins wherewith the laundry had fastened it together, I have pried open its buttonholes with a screwdriver, and have rescued my collar button from the place underneath the northeast corner of the dresser where Satan caused it to roll. I have encircled my neck with a clean white collar. Now, my beloved, light of my eyes and treasure of my heart, where is my white necktie?"

An Art.

She found it for him, and possibly helped him to tie it; for the tying of white neckties is an art. It involves a careful measuring of the two ends to see that they are even; then a judicious lengthening of the right hand end; then the putting of that end under and over; then the folding under of the left hand end and the drawing through of the right hand end. Here the unskillful stop and count it complete; but he who is skilled pulls the loop entirely through, folds it to cover the selvage, and pulls the end back again. And then, if he has had good success, and the ends are even, and do not tilt, he may count himself to have been guarded by the good angel or his wife, which amounts to the same thing.

Even so wrought our hero, who by this time has his tie in place. And thereupon he kissed his wife, saying, "Farewell, my beloved, thou daughter of the Sun and Moon; thou lovely and fair one whom ever I have adored; I go to my study to put the finishing touches upon the eloquent sermon which shortly I am to deliver."

Wrought Well.

And that day he wrought well, preaching two sermons, teaching a Bible class, and attending certain committee meetings as he had need. And in all this labor, which was not small, the white necktie did its share. In his controversial moments it tilted up toward his ear with a belligerent slant. In moments of self-restraint its two white wings were like those of a dove of peace. And always it was radiant with its own starch and the purity of the motive and doctrine of its wearer. And at night it showed little trace of what it had been through.

On Monday morning the parson's wife gathered up the soiled linen of the household, and bore it away to be washed; for after the Sabbath comes wash-day, and cleanliness is next to godliness. And thus she spake to her husband:

"My dear and honored spouse, best of great men, and greatest of good men, whom ever I honor and suffer no woman to scold save myself, and that less seldom than would be good for thee; give me now the necktie which yesterday adorned thy goodly neck which is like a tower of Lebanon, and upholdeth aloft the organ of thy great mind; give me, I say, the necktie, my lord, and I will cause it to be washed, and I myself will iron it with a hot iron, and on a Sabbath yet to come thou shalt be arrayed again in white linen, spotless as that of yesterday."

Well had it been for him had he heeded his wife's advice. But thus he spake to her:

"Oh thou sister of the seven stars, in whose light of wisdom I walk by day and rest by night, fain would I do as thou proposest! but behold the necktie which I wore yesterday. It is as good as new, and the creases but make it easier to tie. I will wear it today to the minister's meeting. It will be quite as good as the average, and better than some that are there."

So he wore it on Monday, and at night it was visibly soiled.

Over the eastern horizon broke soberly the dawn of Tuesday, and the minister said within his heart:

"This day I spend in my study, preparing my sermon; and this tie still is good."

So he wore it on Tuesday; and on Wednesday he turned it and wore it with the fresh side out to prayer-meeting.

And on Thursay his wife thus spake:

"My dear and honored husband, is it not time for a fresh necktie?"

But he said, "One side of this tie hath lasted half this week; and the other side is quite adequate for the other half."

In this he sinned with his lips.

And by Saturday night his righteousness was a filthy rag so far as that tie was concerned.

Well might some poet weep over the rise, the descent, and the sad fall of the alleged white necktie!

Perhaps After This Fashion.

How dear to my heart is the parson's white necktie, when too close inspection presents it to view; the creases, the spots, and the deep scars of battle, which mark its declension the weary week through. He wore it on Sunday and Monday and Tuesday, and over it daily wise utterances fell; he wore it, alas, until Saturday evening; the parson's white necktie it hung on so well. The last Sunday's necktie, the almost white necktie; the moss-covered necktie, that hung on so well.

Brethren, I have told you my tale, and my song is sung. I have only to add the prophetic foot-note, that on the next Sunday morning after the reading of this history, the parson thus addressed his wife:

"My beloved, whose face is to me as fair as the moon on her fourteenth night, is not this article in the pastor's department a libel? Tell me honestly, do I wear my white neckties too long?"

"Let not my good and honored husband be displeased, she replied "and I will speak to him in truth. Any white necktie is worn too long if worn twice."

Then they went to the piano and sang together:

"Mary had a little lamb
Its fleece was white as snow,

Airships Should be Regulated.

Wilbur Wright's condemnation of spectacular aviation is timely. Is it not more than time for the police to take charge of affairs of this kind? When Count de Lambert circled the Eiffel Tower, in Paris, he was arrested and fined, not only because of the danger to the man in the street, but as an assertion of the right of the municipality of Paris to sovereignty in the air above. Although the enforcement of penalties has at times been greatly relaxed, the Prefect of Police has lately served notice on the powerful Aero Club of France that he will adopt drastic measures to remedy the evil. Today, when an aviator journeys from one German city to another he must procure in advance a permit from the chief of police at his intended destination to make a landing in some selected safe reservation. Just before King George's coronation, Parliament enacted a law to prevent heavier-than-air machines from menacing the attending crowds.—New York Nation.

From 250 to 300 students from Christian church homes will come to Indiana University in the next few days. During the next twelve months there will be from 400 to 500 students from Christian church homes come to the University. The Bloomington Bible Chair at the university is trying to meet the problem of properly caring for these students during their residence at school. Prof. W. S. Rounds is in charge of the Bible Chair as a university pastor. If the preachers of Indiana would write Mr. Rounds concerning the boys and girls that come from their churches it would greatly help him in quickly getting in touch with them. He will welcome correspondence from parents and pastors concerning the Bible Chair work. It is important that the pastors of the state coöperate with him.

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

A revival meeting is being held at Secor by C. R. Piety of Eureka.

E. A. Gilliland, pastor at Lincoln, is assisting in a tent meeting at Waynetown, Indiana.

The union meeting at Dalton City, conducted by Lew D. Hill, resulted in forty-one additions.

George W. Schroeder's congregation at Bridgeport received four additions on a recent Sunday.

Howard A. Kauffman preached at Waynesville, September 24, in the absence of F. L. Davis, who is holding revival services at Hurst.

P. C. Cauble of Vincennes, Indiana, is holding a meeting at Shiloh, near West Salem. At last report there had been four conversions.

O. M. Eaton is holding a revival meeting at Mt. Erie, where there is no church of the Disciples. The evangelist hopes to succeed in effecting an organization.

J. F. Secord was ordained to the ministry at Colmar by District Worker J. D. Williams. Mr. Secord has entered Eureka College to further equip himself for the ministry.

Carlock Church profited by a meeting conducted by James Bicknell of Kentucky, in which there were eleven additions. The pastor here is Mrytle B. Parke, who is infusing life into all departments of the church.

A revival meeting is being held at Arrowsmith by Joseph Gaylor of Springfield, Missouri, with three additions at last report. The pastor, J. C. Reynolds is in charge of the music.

Palestine Church will join the other congregations of the community in a union revival meeing to be held in a large tabernacle, and conducted by Doctor Hamilton. D. W. Connor is minister here.

A short meeting at Ash Grove, lasting for about a week and conducted by H. B. Easterling, the pastor, resulted in twenty additions, nearly all being on confession of faith and a very large percentage being heads of families.

Flanagan Church held a special service on Sunday evening, September 10, in behalf of Eureka College for the sake of assisting in the education of a young man in the ministry. E. E. Hartley has been pastor of this church for only a few months.

Stanford Church is having a meeting conducted by F. M. E. Myrick of Ohio, which began last Sunday. The pastor, Norman H. Robertson, is receiving the cordial support of his congregation in his evangelistic work, as well as in other efforts.

The three weeks' revival meeting at the Shirley Centennial Christian Church, conducted by the pastor, F. Lewis Starbuck of Eureka, closed Sunday evening, September 17th. There were in all thirty-two additions to the church, the greater part by confession.

A series of revival meetings will be held in First Church, Quincy, by Lowell C. McPherson. The pastor, Clyde Darsie, is making extensive preparations for a meeting of real spiritual power. The second Sunday in September the remodeled church building was opened with appropriate exercises. J. M. Rudy of Indiana, a former pastor, delivered the addresses.

The congregation at Arcola had an all-day meeting the second Sunday in September, at which Clarence DePew delivered two addresses on Sunday-school work. More than two hundred people ate dinner together at the church; about three hundred were present at the Sunday-school, and an offering of more than thirty dollars was received. W. T. McConnell is the pastor of this live church.

Gibson City pastor, L. O. Lehman, conducted union services in the Presbyterian Church for a month during the summer while the pastor of the congregation was absent on his vacation. This church, besides its obligation in erecting a substantial addition to its edifice, is one of the few congregations in the state supporting a living-link in the State Society. They are helping the Mt. Vernon Church, of which J. H. Stambaugh is pastor.

Chicago

The next quarterly rally of the C. W. B. M. Union will be held Thursday, Oct. 5, at the Sheffield Ave. Church. The Irving Park church auxiliary furnishes the program. In the morning session Mrs. Faulkenstein, settlement worker, will speak. O. F. Jordan and C. C. Buckner will deliver addresses in the afternoon.

Dr. Willett has begun a series of Sunday evening sermons at Memorial church on "Types of Religious Life." Such themes are dealt with as the Prophet, the Priest, the Mystic, the Doubter, the Martyr, the Reformer, the Theologian, the Missionary, etc. The Woman's Society of this church held its first fall meeting Thursday, Sept. 21. "The Extension Work of the Y. W. C. A. among the Factory Girls," the "Old Peoples' Homes of the Baptists and Disciples," and "World Wide Missionary News," were some of the topics for discussion.

A group of about twenty expert leaders of the "Eight-day Campaigns" in the seventy-six cities organized for the "Men and Religious Forward Movement," passed through the city Friday, Sept. 22. Among the number were Rev. W. R. Lane of London, D. W. Russell of South Africa, Fred Smith, Charles Stelzle, John Alexander, of New York, and Dr. I. J. Lansing of Philadelphia. In honor of these visitors a luncheon was held at the Auditorium.

The fourth annual meeting of the Chicago Christia Endeavor Union was held Friday and Saturday afternoon and evening, Sept. 22 and 23, in the Northwestern University building, Lake and Dearborn streets. C. G. Kindred and Austin Hunter represented the Disciples on the program.

It is reported that Asa McDaniel, formerly of New Philadelphia, Ohio, takes charge of the church at Harvey Oct. 1. Mr. McDaniels is a graduate of Hiram College, and has taken special work at the University of Chicago.

The next Quarterly Assembly of the Chicago Disciples will be held Sunday afternoon, Oct. 8, at 3:00 p. m., in the First Methodist Church, corner Washington and Clark. Churches are urged to coöperate in making this a fruitful meeting.

It is with keen regret that our Chicago group learns that on Sunday, the 24th, Meade E. Dutt preached his farewell sermon for the West End Church. Mr. Dutt is leaving at once to accept a call extended, not only once, but three times, by the strong church at East St. Louis. For two years Mr. Dutt has labored faithfully in this city. Not only was he concerned about the local work, but interested in every movement for the betterment of Chicago. During his pastorate he has strengthened the congregation numerically and spiritually, and has materially reduced the loan secured from the Church Extension Society. The church at East St. Louis is to be congratulated on securing the sane and constructive leadership of Mr. Dutt.

The raising of $3,250.00 for city and home missions is the aim of the city churches, it being understood that the May offering for the home society is to be returned to Chicago and counted on the apportionment. At the present writing, there is great need of concerted effort on the part of our churches to send in their proportionate part. Unless more liberality is promptly manifest, curtailment in our mission work is threatened. The list of churches together with their apportionment can be found in the July and September Messenger.

I. R. Lines and his people at Monroe St. Church are planning for a fall Rally Day of church, Sunday-school and Endeavor forces to be held the second Sunday in October. The city brethren are cordially invited.

VAUGHAN DABNEY.

Eureka College

For the first in its more than half a century of splendid history, the future of Eureka College is assured. Time and again has the question been raised at commencement, "Will the college be able to open again in the fall?" The raising of the first hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, giving the college something near one hundred and fifty thousand dollars of permanent endowment and freeing it from all debt, answers this question once for all. It is certain that the campaign for endowment will be pushed until at least a quarter of a million is reached. The present needs of Eureka demand at least this much. We have put the boy into "long pants," and now we must give him things becoming a man.

A gymnasium is imperative. At present a class room is being used as a gymnasium. In addition to being wholly inadequate, the building in which the room is located is needed for a science building and must be remodeled for that purpose. The new gymnasium and the necessary changes in this old building will probably cost about twenty-five thousand dollars. A library building is also deeply needed. At present all of our books and laboratories are crowded into Burgess Hall making it impossible to do as efficient work as could be done under right conditions.

But the good thing about the whole situation is, that the people are getting into a mind to help. From all directions come words of encouragement. The endowment is being paid in quicker than any one expected. Mr. Peters' campaign is only commencing to bear fruit. At no time in the history of Eureka College have the churches of Illinois been so interested in their own college. The Illinois Educational Association under the leadership of Mrs. Ella S. Stewart is growing in efficiency and power. Miss Luceba E. Miner, the field secretary, is doing fine work in recruiting members and collecting money. It is the purpose of all to run the membership of this organization to at least ten thousand and thus increase its power to help.

Great expectations are aroused by our new President, Prof. Chas. E. Underwood, of the College of the Bible, Columbia, Missouri. He will assume his duties the first of February. He is a graduate of Butler College and will have a doctor's degree from Yale.

Eureka College is rich in her faculty. No more loyal, self-sacrificing body of men ever taught. They create in a large measure, the "missionary spirit" which has sent so many of our young men and women forth from college halls to bless the earth. The example of Mr. Peters' heroic effort in raising the endowment has been a benediction to the college. Prof. R. E. Hieronymus richly endowed the college by his long years of service and sacrifice. It is such heritages as these, with the unrivaled beauty of the campus, with its venerable forest trees, and Eureka that is like a park, and the Eureka Church with its splendid men and women, that have made Eureka College a mighty force in developing strong men and women. Here communion with God and meditation over his word is undisturbed by the clang and roar of the money-getting world. It is an ideal place for men to grow; for the developing of leaders and prophets.

Eureka, Illinois. DAVID H. SHIELDS,
Minister Christian Church.

Seventh District Notes

The entire seventh district board attended the state convention, and while there, had time to strike for large and even larger things.

The field is big—stretching from the Wabash to the Mississippi, and comprising twenty-two counties.

It is strategic—two whole counties and several county seat towns, without a congregation devoted to the union of all Christians on the basis of the Word and in the Christ.

It is fertile—spiritually speaking. Its people are receptive and responsive. Nowhere in the state will a dollar, consecrated to Christ, minister more effectively to the glory of God and the needs of men.

It has abundant resources. Our people are rich and growing richer. The Egypt of Illinois is rapidly rivaling the far famed Egypt of Africa. Its great trinity of rivers—the Mississippi, Ohio, and Wabash, are not to be despised by the lonely Nile, while its oil, coal, grain, fruit, and stock, aggregate a wealth that is almost beyond the dreams of avarice.

We are so rich that, should we all practice tithing, we could evangelize our whole beloved state—Chicago and all, with the overflowing of our seventh district treasury.

I write this, not boasting, but in humiliation of soul; for our offerings are so meager that we can employ a field secretary only on condition that he earn two-thirds or more of his salary by regular preaching.

This ought not to be. Our field secretary, D. R. Bebout, ought to be kept busy in the field all the time—visiting the weak churches, studying the situation and advising the board of the same—grouping country and village churches, locating preachers, etc. He is the man for the work and we will gladly keep him busy if the preachers and churches will give us the golden privilege of so doing. The privilege, however, need not neccessarily, be of a golden hue. Silver, greenbacks, checks, and bankable notes, are germane to the situation and have a way about them that is irresistible in the seventh district.

Not only should Brother Bebout be kept busy all the time, but we ought, also, to have a capable evangelist in the field to hold meetings for those churches, which cannot secure, unaided, the kind of men they needs for such work.

We have indeed been led into green pastures and there are many inviting fields in sight, but we are tethered close to the stake of inactivity by lack of funds. Lengthen our financial rope, brethren, and we will all go up together into the promised land of glorious achievement for Christ and His church in the old seventh district.

It is our purpose to get at theis mater by counties. Lawrence County means to give one hundred dollars to the state and district work this year, and there are several counties that ought to do as well or even better.

Let each county seat preacher get in touch with Field Secretary and co-operate with him in pushing state and district missions to the front where the work belongs.

Would be glad if the preacherless churches and the churchless preachers, throughout the district, would communicate with the field secretary or myself and we will see what can be done. Possibly by putting together we can start the load and keep it going. We will splice the broken wires—recharge the dead batteries, oil up the machinery, turn on the current and make things move.

Now brethren, let us get in earnest about our state and district work. It is of supreme importance. Let each preacher in the twenty-two counties go into his pulpit and thunder and lightning on this subject till something happens. And may he keep it up until the storm is so heavy and the downpour so great that by the first Lord's Day, in November, his people will be glad to come in out of the vain.

If you desire material, out of which to manufacture thunder and lightning for the occasion, the resources of state and district offices are at your command.

Let us settle down for a long pull, a strong pull and a pull all together for state and district missions. J. E. MOYER,
Secretary 7th District.

Church Life

H. W. Milner has resigned his pastorate at Delphi, Ind.

C. H. McCord, of Oskaloosa, Iowa, has accepted a call to Angola, Ind.

E. L. Cunningham has resigned his pastorate at Leavenworth, Kan.

Oliver McCulley has resigned his pastorate at Manzanola, Colo., and removed to Paonia, Colo.

L. H. Copp has assumed his new pastorate at Waterloo, Ia., where he succeeds W. S. Johnson.

Fred M. Lindenmeyer, pastor at Pickering, Mo., is assisting W. H. Rust in a meeting at Arkoe, Mo.

W. T. Brooks of Ladoga, Ind., will assist M. Lee Dorey in a meeting at the latter's church, at Dodge City, Kan., during October.

S. Boyd White, pastor at Lexington, Mo., will begin a meeting October 1 at South Side Church, Hannibal, Mo., where C. E. Wagner ministers.

J .W. Marshall is in a meeting at Denison, Tex., with the congregation of First Church. Large crowds are attending and there have been a number of additions.

The annual convention of Tennessee churches was held September 18-21 at Johnson City, Tenn. There were about four hundred visitors in attendance.

Charles Reign Scoville continues his meeting at Terre Haute, Ind. An audience of a thousand attended the service on Sunday, September 10, with 103 additions.

There were 273 additions during the first twelve days of W. J. Minges' meeting at Herington, Kan. This more than doubles the membership.

A union meeting of the brotherhoods of the various churches of Carthage was held recently at First Church, where D. W. Moore ministers.

The New England Christian Missionary Society held its annual meeting Sept. 16-18, with First Church, Worcester, Mass. E. J. Teagarden of Danbury, Conn., presided.

F. H. Groom has resigned at Central Church, Tacoma, Wash., after a pastorate of three years. During this time the membership has been doubled and all the church activities increased.

James H. Brooks, of Bowling Green, Ky., who has been out of the active service of the ministry for some time on account of illness, is now ready to take up work again either as pastor or evangelist.

First Church, Omaha, Neb., celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its organization on September 13. Three hundred were in attendance at the banquet given in honor of the occasion.

Harry G. Hill, pastor of Third Church, Indianapolis, Ind., will address mass meetings at Kokomo and Marion, Indiana, at the annual meeting of the Associated Charities of these cities.

W. H. Book, of Columbus, Ind., is soon to publish a volume of sermons by twenty-five of the leading preachers of Indiana. It will be called "The Indiana Pulpit."

E. N. Duty has returned to his work at Minerva, Ohio, after a month's vacation. The ninth district convention will meet at Minerva, October 12-13 and preparation for the meeting is now being made.

G. H. Stead has resigned his pastorate at Tabernacle Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y.

K. F. Nauce began his pastorate at First Church, Lynn, Mass., Sunday, September 17.

An evangelistic meeting is in progress at First Church, Keokuk, Iowa, where R. W. Lilley ministers. He is being assisted by J. M. Elam of Fort Madison, Iowa.

The many friends of Mrs. Richard W. Gentry will regret to learn of her serious illness at Lexington, Mo. Mrs. Gentry is suffering with typhoid fever, but hopes are held out for her recovery.

Preparations have been begun for the dedication services of Oakwood church, Hannibal, Mo., on October 8. D. Y. Donaldson will deliver the dedicatory address. Final work on the new structure is now being rushed to completion.

Philip Y. Pendleton, for three years pastor of Vine Street Church, Nashville, Tenn., has accepted the pastorate of First Church, Newcastle, Pa. Mr. Pendleton will begin a three weeks' meeting at Winchester, Ky., on September 27, at the close of which he will take up his new pastorate.

After a period of inactivity the church at Mena, Ark., has been reorganized. Through the efforts of George W. Alford of Great Bend, Kan., who has conducted a series of meetings here the congregation has again been united stronger than ever with the addition of thirty-three new members.

A two days' conference on City Problems was held recently at Union Avenue Church, St. Louis. This was participated in by all the Disciple ministers of the city, and plans were discussed for the simultaneous evangelistic meetings to be held in all the churches, beginning Oct. 4.

The Christian Century wishes to make a correction in an item appearing in this column recently. It was stated the attendance of the Sunday-school of First Church, Lincoln, Neb., had not fallen below one hundred during the summer. We are glad to state that the enrollment did not go below three hundred.

Charles A. Chasteen recently held a meeting at Palacias, Tex., with the pastor, J. H. Briston. This closes the Chasteen work of more than seven years in Texas, where he has served both as pastor and evangelist. He has taken up the work of corresponding secretary of Arkansas, with headquarters at Little Rock.

The Sunday-school at Stenbenville, Ohio, celebrated rally day on September 24. A unique and attractive program was rendered, one of the features planned for being the coming of Willie Hoffman, a boy preacher of 14, who is filling a number of engagements in the east. This is a great school, having an attendance that rarely falls below the 400 mark.

Claris Yeuell reports good progress in the work at Paulding, Ohio. The church extension offering more than doubles that of last year, and both church and Sunday-school have sent additional collections to the Foreign Society. There have been thirty additions to the church in recent weeks. Charles Darsie, a former pastor, preached for this congregation on a recent Sunday.

Granville Snell, evangelist for the seventh district of Missouri, recently closed a meeting of seventeen days with Robert Adams and the church at Long Branch in Andrew county. The result in numbers was twenty-nine, all of these were by profession of faith except three. While the work was under the direction of the board of the seventh district, the church more than paid all expenses and left a surplus for district work.

"Troth Plighted in Church Wedding" is the heading of an article from the daily press of San Francisco in telling of the recent union of the Baptists and Disciples of Rialto, Calif. This was a notable occasion on account of its being the first instance of union between Baptists and Disciples in California. Negotiations have been under way for a year, beginning shortly after the arrival of Sumner T. Martin there as pastor. Both congregations voted unanimously to unite, and also to retain Mr. Martin as pastor.

The churches of the Northeast District of Iowa held their convention at Eldora Sept. 25 and 26, where W. P. Clark ministers. The preacher's conference was led by Walter M. White, Mrs. Garst speaking to the women in another church at the same time. C. S. Medbury was convention speaker and W. C. Cole, State C. E. Superintendent, also gave an address. C. H. Morris reported the Silver Bay Men and Religion conference. A Teacher Training graduation added to the interest of the program.

Evangelist R. W. Abberley, of Cincinnati, and Leroy M. St. John held a short meeting the latter part of August at Hickman Mills, Mo., a country church a few miles out of Kansas City. The results were twenty-nine additions, twenty-five by confession and baptism. The converts were immersed in the Blue River by the minister, Philip Stark. Mr. Abberley and Mr. St. John are now in a strong campaign with the Central Church, Springfield, Mo., where Geo. L. Peters ministers. There have been fifty additions the first ten days of the meeting.

A church debt was recently raised in an interesting manner at La Junta, Colo., where the church is without a pastor since the resignation of Raymond H. Farmer. J. P. Findley of Pueblo, while supplying the pulpit one Sunday offered his services free for the month of August if the church debt was cancelled. It was agreed among the members for a number to give a tenth of their incomes during the month, others to earn a dollar in some fashion. The contest culminated in a social at which the necessary funds were forthcoming to pay all indebtedness.

The church at Pickering, Mo., where Fred M. Lindenmeyer ministers, is in a healthy condition as the following annual report shows: All bills and outstanding indebtedness paid and each department with a balance in the treasury. Total amount of money raised, $1,608.40. For missions and benevolences, $220. Sermons, 135. Baptisms, 21. Received by letter and statement, 14. Losses, by death, 1; by letters granted, 12. Net gain, 22. Total resident membership, 200. The Sunday-school has met all the requirements of "Front Rank School."

R. E. McKnight, pastor at Coalinga, Calif., sends the following good report. "During the summer our ministry has been blessed. Twenty were added to the church, the Sunday-school grew in attendance from thirty-seven the first Sunday in June to 118 on Aug. 27, more than trebling its numbers; the Endeavor, three weeks old numbers thirty-six, and we organized a Ladies' Aid yesterday composed of fifty-one members. We are supposed to be a mission church but so far have had to care for ourselves. Part of the time we have been compelled to borrow money to live on. If 'the Lord helps those who help themselves' he will come to our aid."

Mr. Frank Coop, secretary of the church at Southport, England, writes that their pastor, L. C. Hammond, had just left them for America to take up work with our Minnesota state board. This is the third preacher (not pastor) from their church who has come to America in the past twelve months. Mr. Coop says it is time the tide was turned the other way. The pulpit at Southport will be glad to receive an American preacher. This is the church built mainly by the late Timothy Coop and in whose membership his two sons, Messrs. Frank and Joseph Coop, with their families, are members and active leaders. Here W. T. Moore, J. H. Garrison, L. H. Jameson, and others of fame in our brotherhood have served as pastors. Interested ministers may communicate with Mr. Coop, sending particulars and a photograph, if possible.

J. Harry Bullock, pastor at Richland Center, Wis., has received a unanimous call to the pastorate of the church at Green Bay, Wis., and has accepted the call. Mr. Bullock will take charge of the work at Green Bay soon after the close of a meeting which Evangelist Claire L. Waite and wife are just starting. Mr. Waite has spent the summer at Green Bay in preparing the field for this meeting. During this time a house-to-house canvass of the community in which the church is located yields the following facts: Total number of families visited and reported, 800; number of families in Catholic churches, 500; number of families in Protestant churches, 250; number of families having no church connection, 50. The Green Bay church is not yet one year old and is located in a section of the city where there are no English Protestant churches nearer than three-quarters of a mile.

A good letter from James Nimmo, of Edinburgh, Scotland, suggests some explanations of certain points made by Dr. Errett Gates in a series of articles printed in The Christian Century several months since. Mr. Nimmo, whom all Disciple attendants at the Edinburgh Conference will remember for his considerateness and hospitality, does not wish the impression to prevail that our churches in Scotland are divided over doctrinal matters. He points out the frequent interchange of sociability and ministry between these churches as a proof of their good fellowship. The churches in Edinburgh have not "sprung from the influence of the Campbells," says Mr. Nimmo, but "the same influences which operated on the minds of the Campbells operated on the minds of persons in different parts of this country, and led them to positions practically analygons with that of the Campbells, father and son. There are churches in this country (I include England), which have an unbroken history, carrying them back to a date anterior to Thomas Campbell's famous declaration. While saying that, there is no doubt as to the debt we owe to these two men for whom we have the most profound regard and esteem. But the early leaders of the movement here were in the very atmosphere created by the Raldanes and others and which all led in one direction." In this connection Mr. Nimmo tells the Scotch story of two members of separate clans who were discussing as to the antiquity of their families. One boasted that his ancestors were in the ark with Noah. The other, who was a MacLean, replied disdainfully, "The MacLeans had aye a boat o' their ain."

Indiana Notes

On Sunday, August 27th, the churches of Howard county held their annual meeting in the beautiful park at Kokomo. The secretary delivered the two addresses and enjoyed the fellowship of the good people of that county. Six churches were represented. At the afternoon session steps were taken to effect a working organization of the churches of the county. This is in harmony with the policy of the State Association.

The organization of every county where we have two or more churches is one of the aims of the association. Pastors of county seat churches are requested to lead in this enterprise. Daugherty at Vincennes, Goodnight at Shelbyville, Edwards at Kokomo and Hoover at Tipton are leading the churches of their respective counties in this good work. We would be glad to hear of others. In fact we would like to have a list of all organized counties with their officers. Will the secretaries please report.

The work at Rushville, under the leadership of their new pastor, M. C. Yocum, is most prosperous. There have been 55 baptisms since May 1st. The Bible-school has averaged 100 more during the summer months than last year. All missionary interests are heartily supported.

George B. Stewart at Muncie and W. R. Motley at New Castle are the latest accessions to our Indiana forces. We are glad to have them and wish for them long and fruitful pastorates in their new fields.

A large number of our churches will take the offering for Home Missions in this month. This ought to be the best month of the year for Home Missions. Brother preacher, if your church has not yet contributed to this work please see that it does so at once and help make a record for Indiana.

It is greatly to be deplored that some churches hold the money contributed for missions for months before sending it in. Send all money for Home Missions to the American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Building, Cincinnati. Send it promptly. Remember that the state association is directly interested in an unusually large offering for Home Missions this year.

L. E. Murray, Cor. Sec.

Indianapolis, Ind.

Michigan Notes

J. Frank Green has been appointed corresponding secretary of the Michigan Christian Missionary Society. His work began in that capacity Sept. 1st. All offerings for state work should be sent to him. His headquarters will be in Flint, No. 719 E. Fifth street. He will edit the state paper, "The Christian Banner."

Frederick P. Arthur, who served the state so successfully and gave a dignity and standing to our state work which it never had before, has accepted the work of city missionary in Detroit. He has already gathered together a sufficient number of Disciples to start a church. The initial service is to be held next Sunday.

J. Franklin Baxter of New Castle, Pa., has been called to the pastorate of the new Flint church. A telegram announces his acceptance. Flint is a city of 40,000, and this is our only church in the place.

J. M. Ice, who served the Duplain church for three years, has tendered his resignation and has accepted a call from the church at Shepherd.

National Benevolent Association Activities

Fred Kline, the Illinois representative of the association, is in demand for convention work. He will make the address at the Kansas convention to be held in Parsons the first week in October.

The St. Louis Home has opened a hospital for the care of its sick children. Thus, at last, a long felt need has been supplied: a marked improvement in the health of the children has resulted. By this means disease is largely kept out of the family and better care is given to those who are sick.

The Home for the Aged in Dallas is sorely in need of the money necessary to install a first-rate heating plant. The demand for this Home was so urgent that it was built and opened without money enough to completely equip it. We trusted God's people for the money needed for the furnaces. The cold weather will soon be upon us and the house must be kept warm. Brethren, send your offerings for this need to the association at once.

C. K. Marshall, at one time numbered among the great preachers of our Brotherhood, now a resident in our home at Dallas, writes in glowing terms of the home. He does not weary in congratulating our people upon their activity in benevolent work. He says this work is "surely the very heart of the gospel."

The Pettis County, Mo., people have for years sent a carload donation to the Christian Orphans' Home, St. Louis. They will not fail to sustain this splendid record this year.

Federation in India*

Some time ago the allegation was made that the India Mission of the Disciples of Christ, that is, the missionaries of the Disciples of Christ laboring in India and holding appointment from the Foreign Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, had entered into an agreement with a number of other missions in India to receive unimmersed persons into full membership. As was pointed out at the time, the allegation was incorrect. The fact was that representatives of a number of missions had drafted a plan of Federation to be submitted to the missions of India for approval. With the exception of a single clause, there was nothing in the proposed plan to which any mission would object aside from the Episcopalians, Lutherans, close communion Baptists, and such very exclusive folks. The one clause which called for serious debate was clause 3, which read in part, "The federating churches agree to recognize the validity of each other's ordinances, ministry, membership and discipline, without thereby committing themselves to approval of particular methods or practices."

When this particular clause came up for sion in the conventon of our missionaries, it was not accepted. The English Baptist mission had previously considered the matter and found themselves unable to agree to it. They had proposed an amendment to it. This amendment the Disciples resolved to support, though they would have preferred one rather differently worded; however the proposeu amendment covered the point at issue.

This was the state in which the matter rested till the 9th of August. On that date representatives of the following missions, in addition to our own, met in Jubbulpore for a further discussion of the subject; The South India United Church, consisting of Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Reformed; the American, Canadian English, Irish, and Scotch Presbyterians, the United Presbyterians, the Congregationalists, the American Methodists, the English Wesleyans, the English Baptists, and the English Friends. The plan of federation had previously been accepted by the Alliance mission and some others who did not have representatives present. On our part, representatives of both F. C. M. S. and the C. W. B. M. were present.

A genuine Christian spirit was manifested by all. The position of the Baptists and the Disciples was respected by all. The amendment which they had proposed to clause 3 was not carried in its original form, but the following, to be inserted in place of the sentence quoted above, was adopted. "The federating churches agree to recognize each other's discipline, and to welcome members of other federating churches to Christian fellowship and communion, while leaving each church free to adopt such forms regarding ordinances, ministry, and admission to church membership as they may believe to be in accord with the teaching of Scripture and the mind of Christ."

As it now stands, the clause involves nothing new for the Disciples of Christ. We have always welcomed all Christians to fellowship and communion, though we have admitted to full membership only those who had complied with the conditions of New Testament teaching; "forms," as our English Baptist brethren call them. Of course, the plan has not yet been adopted by the mission; it will have to be resubmitted at the next convention. It will probably be adopted by several other missions, not enumerated above, and the result will be common coöperation in matters wherein a single mission is often helpless, and more fellowship between members of different missions. Both these will be blessings to the Kingdom and the cause of Christ.

Bible College of Missouri and Christian Union

Perhaps the many friends of the Bible College of Missouri, have not grasped as clearly as they might the fact that it is not only geographically, but theologically strategic. It is so much easier to have our thoughts engrossed with immediately visible and material things. The economic and geographical location of the Bible College of Missouri, is a magnificent material fact that fairly strikes one in the face. It helps to create a plea that needs but the telling to win warm friends and advocates. It was nothing short of a stroke of business genius that chose the location of a school in such manner as to command a three million plant free of charge. The great University of Missouri stands ready for the use of the Disciples of Christ, through the meditation of the Bible College of Missouri, as much as if it were their own. The practical situation is almost identically the same as if generous and wealthy persons had given the Disciples of Christ three million dollars to found a great seminary or university at Columbia. Nay, this even tells but half the story. For not only is the actual plant of the University of Missouri worth three million dollars, but it has a budget of expenses which represents the income on several millions more. And all this for our use, free of cost, leaving us to specialize in our proper field, religious instruction.

But there is a spiritual fact connected with the location and double aim of the Bible College of Missouri, that ought to cause our people to give it the passion of their souls. The Bible College of Missouri stands for Christian union. This with it is the paramount issue. The noble purpose for which the Disciples of Christ were founded, the union of God's people here on earth, is a part of the very warp and woof of the Bible College of Missouri. This splendid aim is enwrapped in our very formation and existence. We breathe it. We not only offer our Biblical instruction, taught in a non-sectarian way, as true Disciple teaching should be, to young ministers and missionaries of all religious bodies, but the very other half of our teaching is Christian union itself.

We open our doors to the three thousand students of a great university and bid them come within our doors to receive free instruction in the fundamentals of the Christian faith, whether they be Baptist, Congregationalist, Methodist, Presbyterian or Catholic. Within our class-room doors they forget the petty differences that separate them and become merged in the great ethical purposes which are imbedded in the curriculum of the Bible College of Missouri. When they go forth, how can they be other than enthusiastic advocates of Christian union?

Christian union is in the air. All over our great commonwealth you can hear it being talked. Horny handed farmers and workers, who do not have the time to read, have caught it out of the atmosphere, have sensed it in the trend of modern life, and they talk most earnestly and beautifully to the village visitor about it. We are willing, say they, to give up anything we conscientiously can, to see the weak and overburdened village churches united, to see the union of God's people here on earth.

Thus the Bible College catches a renewed inspiration from the field and moves on with its prophetic work of Christian union, feeling that the actual realization of such an aim will multiply its friends abroad. We ask that you make a study of our purpose and our plan, in order that the great possibilities it possesses may sink into your heart. If we can have this careful investigation on your part, it is sure to mean your friendship and aid in future days.

R. W. GENTRY, Field Secretary.

Wanted at Once in Ohio

One hundred of our stronger churches to contribute their ministers for a two weeks' meeting for some weaker, more needy church—preference to be given pastorless churches or churches with infrequent preaching. "Bear ye one another's burdens." "We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak." Write at once to the committee.

One hundred of our weaker churches nneding and deserviing such a meeting and willing to co-operate in it to the best of their ability, to apply to the committtee at once. "First come, first served."

One hundred of our ministers to volunteer to the committee for such service, asking their churches to free them for two weeks for this greatly needed work in our state.

The meeting should be held in November as far as possible. Other months, however, may be used.

The minister preaching is to receive no extra compensation for the extra service. His salary is paid by his own church and his extra expenses are to be met by the church co-operating in the meeting.

Free-will offerings are to be taken during the meetings. After all necessary expenses are met by these, the surplus, if any, shall be turned over to the O. C. M. S. to be used as a special evangelistic fund for needy fields in our state.

May this plan of our state board meet with the approval and co-operation of all. We are workers together. We must have fellowship one with another. This is a golden opportunity.

News from the Foreign Society

George B. Baird of Luchowfu, China, writes: "Work on the new addition of the hospital is progressing well. I have remained here all summer to push the building operations. One part is ready for the roof, and the other up to the second floor. I have also kept the Sunday-school going this summer. There were present this morning one hundred and eight. The Sunday morning meetings have been well attended all summer, and even during the hot days our small room is not large enough. The larger waiting room in the hospital will seat two hundred and thirty without crowding. It will be croweded every Sunday. The money to pay for the addition is not all in, but we hope to raise it all from the Chinese."

Dr. W. M. Hardy of Batang, West China, writes: "All is quite well with us here at Batang. We are delighted that Dr. Shelton has done so much at home, and is to bring with him some reinforcements when he returns. We know if the church could realize the great need of this country, it would give more freely to send an adequate force.

"This week James C. Ogden and I will start on a journey to some of the country to the north of Batang. We will be gone about a month. A Tachienly missionary, who has recently been over the road we will travel, says that the natives ask for medicine at every place. I hope to help some of them. We will take one animal loaded with medicine for their bodies, and another with literature for their souls."

R. S. Wilson has been obliged to return home from Africa before the usual time for furlough. He overtaxed his strength while rebuilding the "Oregon." His system is depleted. It was necessary for him to return at once in order to save his life.

By all accounts the "Oregon" is the most satisfactory boat on the Congo. It takes less fuel and is more easily managed than any other mission steamer.

Bruce L. Kershner writes: "Work in my district is doing fairly well. Like all of its kind, it is foundation work, and contains few features that are romantic. We are developing some fine young men. This year two of my boys are in the high school. One is an advanced classman in the medical school. One is in the commercial school, one a special student in the Ateneo de Manila, and the other in the intermediate or primary departments. I hope that at least three will complete their Bible work this year as I am anxious to see some through before I leave for furlough in April. My primary school work is doing as well as can be expected, but I find myself rather clumsy at it. It is women's work, and I hope we may have a woman some of these days to do it. In the mission house it is a necessary work, and I find it charming. There is something beautiful in the affection of a little child even if it is ragged, dirty and depraved. We, of course, get the worst class of children. Small as they are some have learned to gamble, and the quality of their vulgarity is utterly beyond description, but with all they are child-like, simple and teachable and affectionate, and appeal intensely to the heart of anyone associated with them. One of the missions of the city, which does special work amng children, has the services of a wealthy and cultured American woman, who finds more pleasure in helping these little suffering, needy ones than in the comforts and luxuries of her elegant home. The stormy season this year is very severe. Our outwork is feeling the effect of it. It will revive when better weather prevails."

Mrs. B. L. Kershmer has been in the hospital for some time. She is recovering from the effectes of a severe surgical operation, which she underwent on the 26th of July. She is still weak, but the doctor says she will have complete recovery and good health afterwards.

The reports are that one hundred and fifty thousand have been destroyed by the floods in the Yangtse Valley. The waters have been unusually high and the damage done has been exceedingly great.

The need of workers on the field was never so great. The Macedonian calls were never so numerous and so urgent. The force could be doubled to the great advantage of the work. Not only so, but the demands for funds was never so urgent. Every step in advance makes further steps necessary.

The Life of Jesus

IN FIFTY-TWO LESSONS

By Dr. Loa Ermina Scott

A NEW TEXT BOOK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'S AND ADULT BIBLE CLASSES

This book comes nearer meeting ALL the demands of both teacher and pupil than any biography of Jesus yet published. The style is graphic. The outlines are clean-cut. The book bristles with questions—all pertinent and revealing. It has both flesh and bones—the skeleton and meat in proper proportion. It is the product of experience. Dr. Scott has been developing this book for years. It was not just written; it grew. The author's scholarship is thorough and safe, never pedantic, always practical.

INTRODUCTION BY PROFESSOR E. B. WAKEFIELD OF HIRAM COLLEGE

"In her home congregation Dr. Scott sought in an unpretentious and resolute way to work out her ideal. With such opportunity as has been given her, her work has never been surpassed. For years she has held the largest and most interested class that her community has ever known; and to this very hour the solid interest has grown.

"If her published lessons will only extend her work and help to get more of real Bible teaching into our congregations, they will most surely bless the world."—PROFESSOR E. B. WAKEFIELD, of Hiram College, in the Introduction.

WORDS OF PRAISE.

I know of no book on the subject so admirably adapted to its purpose.—J. H. GOLDNER, Euclid Ave. Church, Cleveland.

I shall take pleasure in introducing the work to my next class in the Life of Christ and in commending it to others.—F. W. BURNHAM, First Church, Springfield, Ill.

It contains just the kind of work we ought to be doing in our Young People's and Adult classes.—O. W. LAWRENCE, Central Church, Decatur, Ill.

Her unusual ability and her practical experience have helped her to meet the new and growing demand for just such a course of study,—HARRIS R. COOLEY, Cleveland.

Its arrangement is excellent. Its choice of material remarkable—as much for what is omitted as for the rich material included. The questions at end of each of the fifty-two lessons reveal the teacher.—JOHN R. EWERS, East End Church, Pittsburg, Pa.

The beauty of the book is that it is an outline and cannot be used apart from the gospels themselves.—A. W. FORTUNE, Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati.

These fifty-two lessons may well serve as a training coures, and as such, the book is superior to any I have seen.—PERRY J. RICE, El Paso, Tex.

These in turn make further outlay imperative.

The society has not found a medical missionary for Africa. Those who are interested in that great work should pray the Lord of the harvest to send a man of the right type for that field. The salary is provided. All that is needed now is the man to go.

Plans are already under way for the World's Missionary Exposition to be held in Cincinnati next March. Mr. Gardner, the manager of the exposition is already on the ground. It is planned to have ten thousand young people act as stewards and helpers during the exposition. These will be trained in mission study classes conducted in the various churches this fall and winter.

The receipts have been increasing both in August and September. A good Kentucky friend of the work sends $5,000 on the annuity plan; another sister from the same state sends $500. Two Ohio friends send $1,000 and $350 each respectively; and an annuity gift of $200 comes from Arkansas. A good friend from Ohio who has given three thousand this year thinks she can send another thousand before the books close in September. A number of churches are sending special additional offerings. An Illinois student volunteer of limited resources, sends in $20. She had given $35 earlier in the year.

The books of the Foreign Society close on September 30. We trust that all offerings will be sent without delay to Box 884.

Cincinnati. F. M. RAINS, Secretary.

Another Secretary

With the growing opportunity for missionary education in summer conferences and winter campaigns, and the increasing demand for missionary speakers in college centers, in conventions, and in all the churches, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions has for sometime considered enlarging the company of secretarial workers. Miss Florence Miller has been called to this service. While her duties will be principally work in the field, She was charming and forceful in drawing-secretary in all the work, both at the headquarters in the Missionary Training School and in the field development.

Miss Miller needs no introduction to our people. She was called to the work first in time of a special need and served as Field Secretary in the Jubilee Rallies of last year. We called her because we saw she possessed the qualification of competent, consecrated and inspirational leadership. At every point she measured up to the high standard required. She spoke to immense audiences and was always heard with the deepest interest. She was charming and forceful in drawing room meetings and led to quick and definite decision for mission service. She was equally strong in conference leadership.

Born and nurtured in a cultured Kentucky Disciple home, her messages were pregnant with a broad yet loyal conception of united Christian service that left no room for doubt as to the wisdom of practical Christian union.

Aside from Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, she was the only speaker in the coast to coast jubilee rallies who attended the entire series of meetings. Her experience and success in this marvelous interdenominational campaign together with her intense interest in the work of the Christian Church and in the special missionary service for the women of the church has prepared her for the task to which the Christian Woman's Board of Missions has called her.

Mission service is the dominant purpose of her life. Back of this is a parentage who was never so occupied with business cares that he could not daily minister to some sick or discouraged or needy one, was never so selfish as to think only of his own, never so limited in life's service that his arm was not outstretched to the world.

We accept this gift of life from this Christian home and place it where it will yield an hundred fold for the kingdom. Katie Gault Miller, another daughter, is a missionary in China.

Miss Florence Miller.

Miss Miller's first work for the new year will be to serve as Field Secretary in the Southern Interdenominational Jubilee Rallies which we designate as the Coast to Gulf series, beginning at Norfolk, Virginia, Oct. 11, ending in southern Texas before Thanksgiving.

Life and love linked to Christian service can uplift the world. MRS. M. E. HARLAN.

Church Extension Items

The Church Extension offering is not coming in as it should. Every church that is interested in the offering should get remittances to the board by September 30 if possible. If it is not convenient and if it is not best for the offering to have been taken in September, the board urges that the churches will take the offering early in October. October receipts will be published with the annual report. Remit to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 603 New England Building, Kansas City, Mo.

The list of applications before the Board now, yet unanswered, is 219. At the September board meeting we were justified in granting only thirteen loans, as follows: Hope, Michigan, $250; Mountain City, Tenn., $1,000; Runnells, Iowa, $500; Wilkes Barre, Pa., First Church, $5,000; Afton, Okla., $500; Miles City, Mont., $500; Wichita, Kan., (Fairview Church), $2,500; Raymond, Wash., $1,000; Harris, Mo., $1,200; the foregoing are four per cent loans. The following were granted from our annity fund at six per cent: Austin, Texas, (Hyde Park Church), $1,200; Evansville, Ind., (Bethany Church), $5,000; Columbia, N. C., $600; Hillsboro, Ore., $1,000.

Associate Secretary, John H. Booth, during the month of September visited the District Conventions of Iowa and the State Convention of Tennessee, Eastern Penn., and Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia. He also addressed the students of Bethany and Hiram College. He also visited many churches in their interest of the annual offering.

The corresponding secretary has been busy in a campaign for the annual offering in

The Gospel of the Kingdom

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the two years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature,

Beginning Next October

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that have ever been offered to Sunday Schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to see the work start off in the autumn with zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these classes in the study of Social Reform.

Send 5c in stamps for a single copy of the magazine. Do it now and begin at once to talk up the new program for the Fall Quarter. Address,

There are some very interesting applications for aid before the board at the present time. It is decidedly interesting to watch our growth as a religious body. The fact that nearly three hundred churches, newly organized, have appealed for aid this year, indicates wonderful vitality and aggressiveness in uor mission fields. The annual offering should be large enough to encourage every worthy church that is anxious to build. Churches that could not take the collection for church extension in September should find encouragement in the above facts to urge them to send a collection in October.

Men and Religion Campaign

Below, we show the dates for visitation of the special teams of men and religion forward movement. This will be the most significant and gigantic religious campaign that has ever been undertaken by any religious group since the days of the Apostles. The hearts of thousands of church men will be touched, and their life purpose quickened, and thousands upon thousands of men and boys will be brought into vital contact with Jesus Christ. This is a momentous opportunity for the Brotherhood of Disciples to take active hold upon the men of our churches and begin to teach them what the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ really is.

By some method, we must lead all the men of our churches to see the importance of attendance at the conferences in those cities where the teams will be. Conventions will be held every Tuesday and Wednesday during the campaign; that is, two days of each campaign will be in the nature of a convention, and that is the place where the team will "hit hard" on the program. If the teams are not to visit your own city, but do hold a campaign in a city within one hundred or two hundred miles of your city, town, village, or community, Your minister and several of your laymen, including your Sunday-school superintendent and chairman of your official board, the brotherhood president, or president of your men's Bible-class of classes, should attend the convention on Tuesday and Wednesday. Brethren, there ought to be no failure in this regard. Every Christian church that is worhty of the name ought to be represented, so that when the convention is over you can return to your home, filled and thrilled with the stirring messages received at the convention, and you will then be prepared to begin active work in your own church and community. Whatever else you do or do not do between now and Christmas, plan to atend a convention of the men and religion forward movement closest to you. Other dates will be announced soon. Send to The Brotherhood office in Kansas City for the literature, and get ready for active personal participation in the affairs of the movement.

Peter Ainslie at Winona Bible Conference

One of the notable meetings at the Winona Lake, Ind., Bible conference this season was the one in the interest of church federation and Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, Md., chairman of the committee on union of the General convention of the Disciples, was one of the speakers whose address stirred the people.

"There is a tremendous longing in our hearts" Doctor Ainslie said, "for unity. I do not care whether you call it unity, union, co-operation of federation, what we want is oneness. It is not by reason that the broken church can be mended.

"I know of two little towns in the west where the law of unity is sadly disregarded. In one town of 500 inhabitants there are nine church buildings. Three of them are now nailed up. It would not be a matter of regret if all of them were nailed up and the town given a fresh start. In another town of 150 inhabitants there are two churches and a third is now in process of being built. The extravagance in money is not so bad as the violence done to the love of Christ. By these divisions he is wounded in the house of his friends.

"There is a law constantly at work which is breaking down the differences in church creeds. The Methodists write Calvinism. The Presbyterians preach Arminianism. The Baptists write Disciple editorials. Ir we lay aside our prejudices and become guardians of each other, our differences will break down as naturally as the tides flow."

Bishop W. F. McDowell of the Methodist Episcopal Church and Rev. John P. Hale, D. D., of Lafayette, Indiana, a Presbyterian minister who is president of the Indiana State Federation, were the other speakers at the meeting.

On another day at the Bible Conference a meeting was held in the interests of the world's peace at which sentiments were uttered respecting the dealings of the nations towards each other that might well apply to the dealings of the churches one with another.

An Achievement in Church Architecture

"If the minister of the Fulton Christian Church, T. E. Winter, were to cease his work tomorrow," writes Richard W. Gentry, "he would have left, at least, one piece of labor as a record of worthy achievement. He is proud of his work; he will lead you from basement to garret in the hottest sun. And he has a right to be proud. For it was due largely to his enterprise and keen observation that our Fulton brethren will soon possess a magnificent building. When the building committee got ready to build they found that the pastor was already a thorough student of modern church architecture and had the situation well in hand. But Mr. Winter cannot claim all of the credit, nor does he desire to do so. He has had the co-operation of an intelligent and active building committee, who have given much of time and thought. In addition there was that absolutely necessary thing, a list of generous persons who would provide the hard cash. The Fulton Church will cost $52,000, and will look as if it cost more. The writer was moved to pen this brief description because he saw in the Fulton Church an almost unique combination of artistic beauty and practical usefulness. The form of the building affects one like beautiful music; while the flexible interior presents a series of advantages that arouse the highest enthusiasm. The Missouri Christian Church has many splendid buildings, but few of them present a state so complete, so near perfection, as the Fulton Church. When most of the churches get ready to build, they send committees out to visit. These lines are written with the hope of inspiring visitations to the Fulton Christian Church."

Bethany Graded Lessons

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The Graded Lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' and Primary Departments are fully completed. Three of the four Junior grades are complete. Fourth year Junior pupils may use either third year Junior lessons or first year Intermediate. Two of the four Intermediate grades are complete, and these materials may be used for the entire Intermediate Department. For Senior and Adult Departments, Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus" is provided. Other Adult classes may use Dr. Strong's "The Gospel of the Kingdom."]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

EVERY LESSON WRITER IS A RECOGNIZED AUTHORITY IN THE INTERDENOMINATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL WORLD!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that co-operation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

THE NEW YEAR BEGINS OCTOBER 1

The Sunday-school calendar is made to conform to the public school calendar. While the graded lessons may be begun at any time, there are obvious advantages in starting at the beginning of the new cycle. Study the following diagram:

Volume XXVIII. October 5, 1911 Number 40

What a Time Like This Demands

A message straight to the consciences of Disciples of Christ

BY TRUMAN E. WINTER

CHICAGO

An Appreciation and an Exhortation

Our recent Ten Weeks for Ten Cents proposition resulted in a little bit the best piece of co-operation between The Christian Century and its friends that we have ever known. Several thousand new readers are receiving the paper during these weeks on account of the splendid team-work by publishers and regular readers.

It is this kind of team-work upon which the success of the Forward Movement of Disciples of Christ depends.

There is a well-known conviction among publishers of religious newspapers that people of provincial interests, narrow outlook and sectarian prejudices are much more likely to "hustle" for their paper than are the people of broader intelligence and non-sectarian sympathies. There is much to justify that opinion.

It is hardly to be wondered at, therefore, if an occasional religious journal deliberately adopts an editorial policy that appeals to the prejudices, ignorance and sectarian feelings of these readers in order to capitalize their zeal in building up the subscription list.

The Christian Century has staked its all on the faith that a sincere and earnest interpretation of the best thought of the best thinking portion of our brotherhood would command precisely the same kind of zealous and enthusiastic backing that is given those newspapers whose policy is determined by the desire to catch and hold those whose prejudices may be capitalized.

And we have not been disappointed!

In the three years of its present management the friends of the paper have grown not only in number but in zeal. Most of our new subscriptions are obtained by present subscribers. Pastors and church workers in all the states put forth earnest effort to introduce the paper into the homes of their churches.

Our readers are our best agents!

There is a rapidly increasing company of big-minded laymen—business men—who see plainly that the future effectiveness of the Disciples as a religious force depends upon the success of the Forward Movement now taking shape among us. Many of these business men are active and practical in their work for The Christian Century.

These men "hustle" for subscriptions!

A great number of them took the time and trouble to make out lists of names for our Ten Weeks for Ten Cents offer and sent their checks for from $5 to $15.

We appreciate this kind of co-operation. It sustains and justifies our faith.

To all our present readers, men and women, ministers and laymen, who feel that The Christian Century stands for those Christian ideals that are essential to progress and efficiency and who have been unselfish and courageous enough to "boost" and "hustle" for the paper we say, "Thank you, and may God bless you!"

And now we wish to call your attention to the special offer for new subscriptions now being made. It will be found on page 20. It gives you an especially strong talking point just now in asking your friends to subscribe. The remaining months of this year free!

We know you will use your personal influence to secure a regular subscription from each of those whose names you paid for for ten weeks. We will reinforce your talk or letters to them by a communication of our own.

Do not let one name on your list be overlooked!

And besides, let every present reader begin right now to enlist his friends on the basis of the offer on page 20. One of the greatest preachers in the brotherhood wrote us bluntly two weeks ago that he didn't care much for our Ten Cent offer, but wanted to get a fine list of outright subscribers for us. All right! Every man to his taste!

A great year is before us. All are agreed that the editors are giving us the best paper ever published among the Disciples. We, the publishers, are determined to push it with renewed vigor.

But whatever degree of success we shall attain depends, finally, upon the co-operation and zeal—in the most practical way—of our present readers.

The Place of Religion in Modern Life

When Charles Darwin made his journey around the world in search of biological facts, he was profoundly interested to find some form of religion among all the tribes he visited. Herbert Spencer's social studies gave formal and scientific demonstration of the practical universality of religion among the races of mankind. And while it is impossible to claim, as some theological writers have done, that there are no national groups without religion, yet these worshipless communities are so rare as to excite comment.

In every land one meets the symbols of the devout life—churches, cathedrals, mosques, temples, synagogues, shrines, altars, totems, fetishes, sacred books, relics and the like. And though not all of these are proofs of an intelligent faith, they make clear the fact that God has not left himself without witness, however crude and imperfect, in any region of the world.

One hardly needs reminder of the outstanding place religion had in antiquity. Among the Babylonians, Assyrians, Egyptians and Hebrews it was the determining element in public and private life. The power of the priesthood was well-nigh supreme. Religion controlled the policies of states and the conduct of rulers.

Yet it must be remembered that the religion of the time had rather a ceremonial than a moral sanction. The gods were not necessarily good because they were supreme. Nor did they demand ethical qualities in their worshipers.

In the Roman empire the conditions were much the same. The emperor was the supreme pontif, the pontifex maximus. The flamens and vestals were the most revered of the people. All functions of the state were regulated in accordance with the omens which purported to come from the gods. Yet the strictures of Rome's own poets and satirists on "that hard pagan world" are the sufficient commentary as to the value of such a religion.

With the coming of Christianity a new motive entered the religions of the world, a motive which has never been lost. But the church had always to confront the danger of the older employment of religion as a sanction for temporal power. If the state was not the church as in the past, it often was compelled to submit to the church which thus lost something of its larger value. The greatest prophets of the Christian faith were suppressed by the church invoking the aid of the secular arm.

Today the outward authority of religion is gone. The old gods are dead. And there are voices that ask in a certain tone of despair, "Is God also dead?" For it is beyond dispute that much that was once regarded as established past all questioning has been quietly committed to the twilight of oblivion where the dead gods wait. Is religion the loser or the gainer by this process ofchange?

A new knowledge has come to humanity which has opened the secrets of nature and history. And the men who know most about the universe, the ages gone and the religious experiences of the race are very humble in the presence of the volumes of facts now unrolled to them. An ignorant age can safely venture to be dogmatic, and some of the past generations of religious teachers have assumed the air of finality. Today men are more hesitant in the face of the great religious forces. The twentieth century is very impatient of the certainty which the fourth century felt on matters pertaining to the great mysteries of being.

What, then, has the modern world to say about religion? There are many voices in response. Which of them is the most convincing?

There are those who frankly affirm that religion is a superstition and an incumbrance. Their attitude is a reaction from the credulity of an earlier generation. And one must confess that they have some warrant for their dissent from the dogmatism in which Christianity encased itself. Voltaire was the logical protestant against the autocracy of the church in France. Robert Ingersoll was the legitimate child of the popular interpretation of the Westminster Confession. The infidel propaganda among the Bohemians in this city is the logical fruitage of the state church in the old world. To such men religion is a relic of a barbarous, selfish, and narrow-minded age. It declines with the growth of light. It will disappear as the world comes to its own.

Is this the fair and practical view to take of the matter? Is this the proper attitude for a man of awareness and insight?

A second group holds religion to be a convenience, and therefore worth while, though not a necessity. They have no ill-will toward it, though they do not deem it important. It is a more or less valuable inheritance, which ought not to be wholly neglected. It is well that children should have some religious ideas. Women, for the most part, find it a comfort. It is desirable to have some religious sanctions on which to fall back in the great crises of experience, such as birth, marriage and death. Thus religion, though not indispensable, is worth while, and should receive a certain meed of attention. It is a convenience, like public parks, holidays, telephones and almanacs.

Is this the true assessment of the religious life? Is it fair to human history to make this affirmation? Does this satisfy the facts of personal life? Yet is it not the attitude which large numbers of our fellow-men hold? And if so, are they prepared to justify it as reasonable or just?

Still another opinion is voiced by many in our age to this effect: Religion is an accomplishment, and therefore to be esteemed as an interesting and artistic flowering-forth of the moral life. It is one of the many beautiful and worthful ways in which the life of man may expand into new values. It is a means of pleasure, just as any art brings enjoyment. The artistic values of religion, both in its formal expressions through music and the arts, and in its subjective satisfactions as the response to an excellent ideal, give it value in experience. Moreover, it is an aid to refinement of manners and a certain social comradeship, like all the arts. It is not a necessity, any more than painting, sculpture, beautiful architecture or music. But, like them, it is a significant factor in the attainment of a more refined and artistic life.

But none of these varieties of opinion represent the deepest and most thorough-going efforts to put the right value on the religious life. To a much larger group religion is the great necessity. They know that to live at all and keep their sanity, they must hold to a universe of order and purpose, and that religion—the Christian religion—gives the only satisfying assurance of such a moral order.

They know that they must believe in God, a God who is real and personal. They are willing to confess that they know but little of personality, even in their own experiences, but less than personal God cannot be to satisfy their need. And they know that in religion—the Christian religion—they have the assurance past all doubting that One man at least has known the Father as personal and intimate. And where Jesus has affirmed, they feel that they may be sure.

But more than this, they find that the moral institutions demand for their satisfaction a worthful and serious purpose in life as the only object that makes existence significant or even tolerable. And such a purpose and ideal they find alone in companionship with God and the realization of his program as made clear in the life and words of the Man of Nazareth.

And once more, such spirits crave belief in an expanding experience of personal and collective being, as the basis and beginning of the experience of eternal life.

Which of these attitudes toward religion comes nearest to the satisfaction of the great needs of the soul? Which throws most light on the problem of existence? Which gives the noblest motive for action? Which yields the greatest joy in the day's work? And which provides the means for permanent satisfaction in the growth of self and of the world?

The answer must be personal and individual. No man can answer for his brother. But it is a satisfaction to believe that the trend of modern thought, in the light of all the new knowledge, and in the face of all the new criticism, is toward the constructive and world-embracing view which the Christian church in its nobler thinkers and confessors is today reaching. And of such a view the life of Jesus is the sanction and the supreme example.

Social Survey

The Passing of Two Noted Europeans

Storms of famine, and revolt, and strikes, and even of war have swept over the continent of Europe continually for several months, breaking forth in one country and then another in furious violence. Such social and political gales are frequent in Russia, but anarchistic lightning has not recently been so fateful as that which startled the world on Sept. 14 in the assassination of Premier Peter Stolypin. The premier was in attendance at a royal opera at Kief, Russia, given in honor of successful government adherents in recent elections in the western zemstvos. Dmitry Bogroff, a spy employed by the police, and secretly a terrorist, approached Stolypin from the rear, and in sight of the entire house fired two shots, one of which fatally wounded the premier who died four days later. The murderer was instantly seized. Peter Stolypin, when a young man, was beloved of the people. Because of democratic views he was looked upon as a champion of the oppressed. Either his earlier attitude was a mask, or fortune turned his head, for he grew conservative, and after his appointment to premiership in 1906 he ruled with an iron hand, crushing liberal and terrorist alike. For this seeming traitorous, bad faith he won cordial hatred of all liberals and reformers, and his assassination came after many unsuccessful attempts.——Sir Robert Hart, director general of customs in China for seven years, and inspector general since 1863, died at his home in England, Sept. 20, at the age of seventy-six. Sir Robert created the Chinese customs service and a comprehensive tariff, and engineered almost every Chinese foreign treaty made prior to 1908, the year of his retirement.

National Congress of Governors

Fewer than two-thirds of the state governors were present at the annual conference recently closed at Spring Lake, N. Y., yet the sessions were of great interest and should prove of lasting benefit. These gatherings are shorn of political significance, being nothing more or less than gatherings of state executives for the discussion of common interests and to "get together" on plans for the solution of national problems. Woman's suffrage, world peace, and taxation are subjects which brought out considerable discussion; but the initiative, referendum, and recall, and recent rate decisions of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals touched off a thrilling series of rhetorical fireworks. The recall proved the liveliest topic. It was declared that the initiative and referendum are not all they are pictured when put to actual test, and Gov. E. L. Norris, of Montana, made the following suggestion for their improvement: "In many states the voters have in large measure lost confidence in the efficiency of legislative assemblies, and the initiative and referendum methods of legislation have been invoked as a means to procure laws that the legislature would not act on and to veto legislation that in the public mind was not wise or beneficial. At best, however, initiating legislation by and referring laws to the people are cumbersome and not easy to use. As a companion to and supplement of these methods, the power of the executive should be strengthened by giving to him the right to present bills for the consideration of the legislative assembly. If the bills were not passed in form substantially as presented he should have the right to submit those bills direct to the voters at the next general election for their approval or rejection." The decision of Judge Sanborn, of the United States Circuit Court, in which he overruled the Minnesota rate law, received an avalanche of disapproval. The point of that decision is "that the state's intrastate rate law was unconstitutional because it could not be enforced without interfering in its operation with the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission." Every governor present, of whatsoever political persuasion, agreed that this decision was highly inimical to the rights of the states. Said Governor Hadley, of Missouri: "The denial of the right of the several states to regulate the rates of transportation in intrastate traffic will, as an inevitable and logical result, result in the denial of the right of the states to regulate or supervise the conduct of business intrastate in its character, if thereby the conduct of that business in interstate commerce is directly affected or burdened." Gov. Hoke Smith, of Georgia—now senator-elect—declared that, "If the decision of Judge Sanborn becomes the law of this country, then the twilight zone will so broaden that we will never see daylight again in the region of passenger and freight rates." By a unanimous decision of the congress a committee of three was appointed to wait upon the United States Supreme Court, to which the question has been appealed, and urge the reversal of Judge Sanborn's ruling. This action is without precedent and its result is anxiously anticipated. All of which discussion must be taken with several grains of salt, as governors are notably politicians. They have been known to oppose—and to approve—national legislation which interfered with, or aided, their own private political ambitions.

Training for Athletic Instruction

Characterized by many noted educators East and West as one of the most progressive universities in the land, the University of Wisconsin has again substantiated this opinion by the introduction of an athletic course with credit toward a degree. This action is the more surprising because of the well-known conservative policy with which this university has been guided for several years in its attitude toward athletics. It was not the purpose of faculty or regents merely to give such an impetus to athletics as to restore to the University of Wisconsin its former prestige in intercollegiate contests, though the action has been construed in that way. The new course is intended to provide men and women "to meet the demand for teachers of physical education, directors of play-grounds and instructors in educational athletics and play of university caliber and training." "This department," declares a university bulletin, "has instituted a comprehensive group of professional courses in the theory and practice of physical education. These, with related and prerequired courses in the departments of medicine and education and the foundation courses in the various other departments of the College of Letters and Science, offer full opportunity for complete preparation for professional service in public elementary, high and normal schools, preparatory schools and colleges, clubs, social welfare institutions, play-grounds, municipal recreation systems, etc." Students in the College of Letters and Science may elect their "major" to the extent of forty credits in the college of physical education, or "minor" with a minimum of ten credits. The required work for the department includes both theory and practical work, participation in various contests, and three years of training in leading of squads and management of athletic contests. This course is the response to what is believed to be a real need. Too many athletic trainers now are men of little mental or moral training, often inferior, in these respects, to the men whom they are to lead and teach in athletics. It must be admitted that many of them are simply men who have mastered a list of acrobatic or athletic feats, and who are otherwise unfit to fill the positions of responsibility they occupy. The adoption of adequate training for this recognized branch of university life is to be warmly commended. How it will succeed in actual practice remains to be proved.

Defeat of Canadian Reciprocity

After urging the United States to agree on a treaty of reciprocity for forty years, Canada repudiated the principle, on Sept. 21, in the general elections by returning a Conservative majority to the parliament. Reciprocity was the main issue. Premier Laurier hoped to cap his career with the passage of this measure which, until recently, appeared to be sincerely desired by Canadians. The landslide for conservatism shows reversal of public sentiment, and Mr. Laurier will retire. Farmers of the Canadian Far West, who had been counted on to support reciprocity, went solidly against it, evidently fearing the effects of competition with American farmers. But the defeat of the measure was really accomplished in Ontario where seventy Conservatives and only thirteen Liberals were returned. The adverse vote of this province is accredited to the fear of annexation. Conservatives made the utmost of Speaker Clark's tactless remark that reciprocity would lead to annexation, and arguments based on this assertion touched the sentiment of these people. Complete results of the election are not at hand, but the Liberal majority of forty in the late parliament has been turned into a minority of about fifty. Canada, we believe, has made a mistake, but as President Taft says: "It takes two to make a bargain and if Canada declines we can still go on doing business at the old stand."

—President Taft is setting a new record in his present tour of the country, both in the extent of territory covered, and in the visitation of smaller cities and towns. The tour is frankly a preparation for the approaching campaign. It is a test of public sentiment, the result of which will determine the President's attitude toward renomination. It is expected that Mr. Taft's genial personality, and his defense of his policies will create a strong sentiment in his favor.

Universalist

The Minister With a New Gospel.

The minister with a "new gospel" to preach receives this notice from the Universalist Leader:

Every little while we hear of some minister suddenly bursting into fame because he has a new Gospel to preach, and usually there are crowds ready to go and hear him, and when he proclaims his new Gospel, they are free with their applause, and quick to say, that is what I have always believed, and the chances are there will be the beginnings of a new sect, and after a short struggle with the dismal facts of financial support, and collapse, and the fame-struck minister is looking for a job, usually in his old fellowship. Over and over this story is written, and yet it seems there are many who never learn the lesson. The fact is the "new" Gospel is simply an opening of a little window in the darkened mind of the minister, and he sees the light outside in which people have been dwelling all the time. This was illustrated recently when a Jewish Rabbi was given the courtesy of preaching in a Christian pulpit, and there he announced with a great show, as if it were the discovery of the centuries given to him to disclose, that "It is not by going to church or praying that a religious man is known, but by his every-day life and doings." And that was his new Gospel, and that is the "new" Gospel of most of those who make this appeal for sudden fame. The great truth taught of old, that not by crying Lord, Lord, but by doing the will of God, men are justified, dawns upon them, and seems new, and is new to them, but there is yet to be discovered a "new"Gospel which has not its roots in the old Gospel which will never be outgrown.

Baptist

The College and Christian Faith.

That many of our colleges were founded for the purpose of training Christian workers is well known. Since the rise of our great universities there has been much discussion of the college question. Do we still need the colleges? What is their proper work? A partial answer to these questions is the quotation that follows. It is from President Hanley of Franklin College. He has definite convictions as to what Franklin should do:

While we recognize that Christian faith is free, and can never be compelled, I make bold to announce unto all whom it may concern that I have left an important position in connection with a church, city and university, for the purpose of placing the truth and personalities of Jesus Christ central in education. The religious crisis through which many a student passes during his college course is largely due to ignorance. He is taught science and is not taught the great principles of Christian faith. He studies in the library and laboratory and his Bible goes by default. It shall be my purpose as president of the institution to place the gospel of Christ side by side with the profoundest teaching of philosophy and to ground the learner upon a faith that will stand the test of all rational inquiry. In this attempt I shall not only feel that we are giving the best training to the boys and girls whose lives are intrusted to our care, but I firmly believe that we shall be working at a great problem, however humble the attempt, which sooner or later must challenge the attention of the whole educational world.

We seek in every possible way to promote that personal contact with the student body which, next to a religious atmosphere, is the chief virtue of the small college. Some time ago a senior in one of our large colleges came to me for advice. I asked him why he did not go and talk freely with the president. To my amazement, he told me that he had never met the president of that university. That man had lost the greatest privilege of a college education, namely, contact with a masterful personality. Such a situation is not at all rare.

In our larger institutions undergraduates are herded together like an army in barracks, and personal attention is for the average student out of the question. All this is a tremendous loss in the making of manhood. With no deprecation of scholarly training—that should ever be of the first order—it nevertheless remains true that the most important element in the education of any young man is an intimate acquaintance with a great and noble personality. Perhaps the larger part of what we learn in the class room will be forgotten but the personal touch of the professor, the stamp given by the president, will remain throughout life.

If Franklin continues to make the progress which she has made during the last fifteen years, I estimate that during the next twenty years she will send out one thousand graduates. And, according to the proportion of those who have already left her halls, she should send one hundred of these future graduates into business, thirty-two into farming, fourteen into journalism, sixty into law, seventy into medicine, 192 into the ministry, fourteen into missionary work and four hundred into teaching. This is the vision which has brought me back to my native state and Alma Mater—that we may ground one thousand young men and young women in knowledge, faith and duty, and that we may send them forth to be a transforming power in human society.

The Free Churches of England

What the Free Churches are doing and what they ought to do to meet the conditions forced upon the attention of the world by the great strike in England is partly indicated by the following interview with F. B. Meyer which is published in the British Weekly:

I may tell you that we have been watching events most closely, and on Saturday a notice appeared in the Press that if the strike lasted over Sunday we should call together the General Committee to draw up an appeal for a settlement by arbitration, or in the dry light of reason. The committee would further have instructed the churches how to afford relief to the many innocent sufferers. There was reason to expect a shortage of milk supplies, and the children of the poor would have been the first to feel the pinch of privation. Fortunately, the sudden cessation of the strike made further steps unnecessary.

It seems to me that we are hampered in our appeal for goodwill and unity among the various classes of the people by the consciousness of the wide breaches existing among ourselves. A divided country is only a reflection of our own divisions. Is not the time come when ten men, representing the various denominations, should be shut in one room and told that they must not come out until they have found some means of common action. It is only a united church that can deal with the class warfare of the present day.

How is it possible for a man to bring up a family on 20 shillings a week? Is it not a scandal that these Bermondsey girls should receive only 5 shillings and 7 shillings a week? We ought to have represented the case of such sufferers to the Christian conscience. We could do this without wild and tearing words, and without taking sides. There are so many companies which are really impersonal, and can only be affected by public opinion. I feel also that we may fairly take home to ourselves much of the blame for the fierce passions displayed. The father of the bad son is to be pitied, but also to be blamed. Must we not take our share of the responsibility for acts of violence which all condemn?

Defending by Extending the Faith.

A man must have influence before he can use it. The best defense of faith is faith. Men and women of heroic faith create faith. "To contend earnestly for the faith," says the Presbyterian Advance, "is made to be synonymous with defending certain doctrines from the attacks of those who would frame their creeds in other phrases. The missionary does not quote this text (Jude 3) as part of his reason for engaging in the warfare against ignorance, superstition, and degraded lives in behalf of truth and light and righteousness; the reformer does not use it as a reason for his attacks upon inconsistency and low moral tone among professing Christians; it is left as a foundation for the man who always resists new views or new ways of stating old views, and so it has come to pass that only he who is called a "defender of the faith" is looked upon as one who obeys the Scripture "to contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints."

But why should this be so? Certainly there are other ways of contending earnestly for the faith than just to defend creeds and dogmas. Indeed, it is clear from the context that what the apostle had in mind had to do with correct lives rather than exact creeds. The condition against which he uttered his protest was due to men of ungodly lives who had turned "the grace of God into lasciviousness," and were "walking after their own lusts." The faith for which he urged his readers to contend was that kind of vital, practical faith in Jesus Christ which resulted in pure and righteous lives. And, after all, when we talk about the "faith once delivered to the saints" we must remember that it was not a body of doctrine at all—in the days of Jude there had not arisen a "systematic theology" of any kind—and the word should not even be limited to the teachings of Jesus and the apostles. The faith once delivered to the saints was not, primarilly, a creed but a life. It was a faith which, without works, was dead, but which, prompted by love, manifested itself in clean lives and good works, and it was this kind of a faith in behalf of which the people to whom Jude wrote as well as the people of today were and are directed earnestly to contend.

But it should also be noted that to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints means not only to defend but also to extend that faith. We have no fault to find with those who believe that they are set to defend the faith in the sense of defending certain views which have long prevailed, though, for ourselves, we have no fears for the safety of the truth of God's word; we have the very warmest sympathy with those who feel constrained to defend the faith in the sense of standing and striving for the utmost purity and uprightness of life among all who name the name of Christ, but the men who are doing most in the way of contending for the faith once delivered to the saints are they who not only stand firmly by the essentials of evangelical truth, and insist upon consistent Christian lives, but who also zealously endeavor to extend, even unto the uttermost parts of the earth, into the heads and the hearts and the lives of all men everywhere that "faith which worketh by love." Thank God, there are many of this kind of men, and this is the very greatest work in which Christian men can engage. It is the most important expression of Christian fidelity. "Defender of the Faith" may be a title of honor for kings, popes, or other dignitaries, civil or ecclesiastical, but of far greater honor is the title, "Extender of the Faith."

Not in Unrighteousness, but with the Truth

One writer says that when Paul began to dictate the thirteenth chapter of I Corinthians, "the Apostle's amanuensis must have paused to look up in his master's face at the sudden change in the style of his dictations, and seen his countenance lit up as it had been the face of an angel, as this vision of divine perfection passed before him." But Paul does not substitute enthusiasm for sense. Another writer says of this chapter, "St. Paul's ethical teaching has quite an Hellenic ring. It is philosophical, as resting on a definite principle, viz. our new life in Christ; it is logical, as classifying virtues and duties according to some intelligible principle."

Gifts of speech are subordinate to love. They are important. Paul knew their value. The tongue of an angel would be worth much to the man who loves other men. But mere skill in the manipulation of words is not a guarantee of usefulness. Good men use eloquence to win their fellows to the love of God. Bad men use it to confuse and to ruin.

To present Paul as being opposed to the increase of knowledge would be to misrepresent him. Love is not blind. It leads to knowledge and is itself enriched by knowledge. The desire not to injure another but to do good to him is one thing; knowledge of what ought to be done is another. Christian love has in it an intellectual element. Of course, if we have no concern for the welfare and happiness of anybody but ourselves, we shall use our knowledge for the hurt of others if we think our advantage is thereby gained. It is the knowledge of the selfish man that Paul regards as useless, not that of the disciple of Jesus who has learned from his Master what love is.

If the disciple bestows his goods to feed the poor or gives his body to be burned, he has a reason which he can give to the world without shame. Some men give that they may cover up evil deeds or open the way to office and honor. Some give because the sight of starving human beings is annoying to them, not because they feel the woes of the poor. It would suit these persons better if the wretched would all die and thus be removed from sight. It is giving of this sort that Paul condemns. And he has no word of praise for the self-sacrifice that has as its object the gratification of anti-social feeling. He is himself an example of one who gives himself for the common good. The kindness of love is the kindness that puts character first. The notion that love hastens to extricate a man from an unpleasant situation without regard to how its act may influence his conduct is anti-Christian. It is not kindness to make it easy and pleasant for men to sin. It is kindness to make those who work harm to society feel the shame of their deeds. Personal spite rejoices in the agony of one whose errors and mistakes it exposes. Kindness rejoices in the hope that the wrong doer will repent and live as a Christian.

Love knows neither envy nor hatred. It is a pooling of interests. The man who loves shares in all the blessings that come to humanity. The success of his neighbor is his success. If he fails, there is comfort for him in the fact that his friends have not failed. The man without love sees only his own failure in the ability and wisdom of other men. He does not rejoice in their blessings and thus lay the foundation for his own recovery from defeat.

The braggart is lacking in love, for he thinks his dignity and worth consist in his being different from other men. He likes to be thought superior to the common herd. If he were morally sane he would know that what he has in common with other men is vastly more to his credit than what he has that differentiates him from them. Love makes one glad that he is a man and that he can share the common lot. It creates feelings of opposition to all special privilege.

Love is the basis of all courtesy. Polite selfishness is the meanest sort of selfishness, for it is conscious of itself. The rules of politeness are merely ways by which we may show our respect for men. If we are brutish in our feelings, rules only help us to conceal the fact that we have not risen to the level of humanity.

Love does not rejoice in unrighteousness, for it is concerned for the growth and perfection of character. It therefore has nothing to gain by unrighteousness. It loses whenever men sin. It is victorious whenever sin is renounced and God is enthroned. Its indignation is directed against whatever degrades and defiles the soul of man. Its praise is for all that purifies and enriches life. [Midweek Service, Oct. 11. I Cor. 13:3 John 3, 4.] S. J.

II. THE MEANING OF THE WORD (Continued.)

Our study of last week was a critique upon the version of the New Testament edited by Alexander Campbell in which he translated the Greek word baptizo and its cognates by "immerse" and its cognates throughout. Mr. Campbell contended that the word always meant "immerse" or its equivalent, and that instead of the transliteration to which the King James version had accustomed English readers the meaning of the word should be expressed by the use of this plain English term.

From this position of Mr. Campbell The Christian Century squarely dissents. We regard his translation of this word as a flaw in what otherwise was a work of scholarly distinction. It is not as a mere academic error that we regard it as significant enough to demand discussion in this late day, but because of its far-reaching consequences in the thought and practice of a great body of Christian people. This translation of baptizo is the basis of the immersion dogma which the various Baptist denominations cling to. There is no possibility of freeing the baptism question from its dogmatic grip so long as immersion is regarded as synonymous with baptism. The ill effect of Mr. Campbell's translation is seen especially in the thinking and practice of the Disciples of Christ who justly look to him as a great teacher and leader. It commits them to a theory of baptism utterly impossible for them logically to practice, wholly inconsistent with their more fundamental conviction with respect to Christian unity, and largely nullifying the constructive purpose of both Thomas and Alexander Campbell and of the Disciples themselves.

In passing this judgment upon Mr. Campbell's position the reader must not infer that we are giving aid and comfort to his pedo-baptist opponents. The attempt to make baptizo mean "sprinkle" or "pour" has even less ground to sustain it than has Mr. Campbell's position. Only by a wresting of the word in certain of its highly rhetorical uses can any meaning with the semblance of aspersion be extracted from baptizo. In the literature of theological thought there are no more classic specimens of artful subterfuge and solemn trifling with facts than are found in the arguments of the pedo-baptist debaters who contended with Mr. Campbell that the Greek word meant "sprinkle" or "pour" as well as "immerse."

Had these debaters won their point they would have been no better satisfied with it than were the Baptists with their assumed victory. For if Mr. Campbell's version of the New Testament in which "immerse" regularly appeared instead of "baptize" was unsatisfactory to the whole Christian world, Baptist and pedo-baptist alike, equally unsatisfactory to pedo-baptists would have been a version in which "sprinkle" or "pour" appeared. The indecisiveness of the whole controversy would have been plain had some pedo-baptist debater, exultant over an assumed victory, published a version of the New Testament in which Peter is made to say, "Repent and be sprinkled every one of you for the remission of your sins," and in which Jesus is made to command his disciples to "preach the gospel to every creature, sprinkling them in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit." No pedo-baptist would have endured such a translation. Such an attempt at carrying the affusionist argument right into the Scripture would have revealed to pedo-baptist debaters what Mr. Campbell's attempt revealed, namely, that baptism is neither affusion nor immersion, that the substitution of any English word denoting only a physical action for the word "baptize" involves a sacrifice not only of a part of the meaning of the sacred text but the essential part of it.

In his negative position, the great immersionist champion is unassailable when he denies that baptizo ever, in any connection, means "sprinkle" or "pour." In his positive construction of the New Testament word as "immerse," however, he falls under condemnation equal to that which his own and subsequent scholarship so decisively meted out to his opponents.

At this point we wish to assure our readers that it is not within the scope of this series of articles to include a discussion of any technical linguistic problem. It is far from our purpose to go over again the classic paths trodden by the controversialists. The lengthy citations from Hellenic Greek literature tending to show the meaning of the word baptizo have only a secondary interest for us. We regard the linguistic aspect of the baptism question as very simple. With the knowledge of certain facts it can be worked out by one unacquainted with the Greek language quite as conclusively as by a Greek scholar.

Indeed, the conviction which underlies our present study, and of the truth of which we hope to convince our readers, is that much of the dispute over the classic meaning of baptizo is quite irrelevant in determining its New Testament meaning. The appeal to the signification of baptizo in the classic Greek of any age does not settle anything with respect to its use in the New Testament. It is not safe to appeal to etymology in general for the meaning of a word. The question is: What is the meaning of the word right here, in this specific context? The meaning of a word depends upon actual use, not upon etymology, and the context with which we have to do in determining the meaning of baptism is the New Testament itself, not classic literature.

This is not to say that we have no interest whatever in the classic use of the word. But our interest in its classical use is academic. An induction of a thousand passages in general Greek literature in which baptizo is shown to mean "immerse" or its equivalents would not determine the meaning of the word in the New Testament, though such an induction might show how the word came to be used in its New Testament signification.

We have on our hands, then, a problem in English, not a problem in Greek. Average intelligence, a few easily obtainable facts of language and of history, and a moderately developed faculty of historical insight are all the equipment necessary to a thorough and independent understanding of the meaning of this Greek word in its New Testament use. If minds possessing this modicum of equipment differ in their conclusions, the reason must be found elsewhere than in the disparity of their scholarship. The baptism question is not a scholar's question any longer. It is a plain man's question. We depend upon scholarship, of course, for certain data, but these data are in this case practically undisputed. Without the slightest timidity, therefore, we hope the humblest reader will make the study with us, and we promise to leave this less interesting linguistic aspect of our problem after briefly pointing out a few relevant facts bearing upon the meaning of baptizo.

This word is derived from the root word bapto, whose simple and primitive meaning is to dip, to immerse. Baptizo is the intensive or frequentative form of bapto and means, primarily, to dip, to immerse, to dip repeatedly, to sink. The simple word bapto is not used in the New Testament in referring to baptism. It does occur in other connections, however, in both Old and New Testaments, and is nearly always translated "dip."

The difference between bapto and baptizo in their primary meanings, is that the latter carries with it a more intense, a heightened, signification usually. Bapto expresses the simple, casual act of dipping. Baptizo means to dip deeper or longer or repeatedly, or it reflects emotion or purpose in the one dipping. It often means to put under and keep under, therefore to sink or drown. Baptizo is bapto underscored or in italics, so to speak. Except for this intensive difference the two words in their primary and radical import have identically the same meaning. Certainly there is no distinction in the action implied by both words. But because of this intensive quality of baptizo it lends itself more naturally than bapto to figurative use. Hence we find it used to signify "crush," "overwhelm," "intoxicate," "ruin" "drown," etc.

With the exception of this figurative usage of baptizo it will be noted that we have been speaking only of the primary or radical meaning of the word. And even in the figurative use the radical meaning is present. But besides the radical and figurative use, it is a common phenomenon for words to branch out into new meanings through association, and to take into themselves a special or, as the scholars say, a "technical" signification. This new technical meaning may be totally unlike the primary meaning. It grafts itself on the old word and in the appropriate context is more essential than, and sometimes entirely displaces, the original connotation.

A clear example of this differentiation of meaning in the same word is afforded by the word bapto which, besides its primary meaning, "dip," was also used to signify "to dye," "to color." A dyer was therefore called a baptist, one who baptizes, that is, dyes. Now the fact that in a thousand instances bapto means "immerse" does not in the least demand that the word be translated "immerse" when it manifestly means "dye." To dye and to immerse are not synonyms. Their meanings are totally incomparable. The radical use of bapto as "immerse" explains how it came also to mean "dye." The word originally and in its main usage signified the mode or act of immersing or dipping. From the fact that things were usually dyed by dipping them in the colored liquid, the word was used to signify to dye by dipping. In time it was bound to be used to signify to dye in any manner. And as a matter of fact there are instances in which the garment is said to be baptized when the colored liquid is dipped upon the thing dyed. When the liquid drops upon the garments they are said to be baptized, dyed.

Defenders of affusion have used such instances to prove that bapto meant to pour or to sprinkle. Champions of immersion have assumed that they had conclusively answered this argument by tracing out the etymology of the word showing that it originally meant "dip" or "immerse." Both arguments were irrelevant. The word in such a context means neither immerse nor sprinkle. It means dye. The Greek word originally denoting the particular process or action (immersing) by which the thing was dyed, has taken into itself a new meaning, that of the effect (dyeing) produced by the action. In this new and special meaning of the word its original signification is practically disregarded.

The point that should be made clear by this illustration is that this special meaning of bapto as "dye" is not discoverable in the root of the word. It is a meaning that must disclose itself by an examination of a sufficient number of instances.

We shall take up our study at this point next week.

AN EXPLANATION AND A HOPE.

This issue of The Christian Century will be received by many who have not themselves subscribed for the paper. To them we make this word of explanation: Your paper has been paid for for ten weeks by some friend who is interested in making you acquainted with it and with its ideals. Do not hesitate to accept it. It costs you nothing for these ten weeks and will be continued beyond that period only by definite order. We wish you to read each issue carefully and ask yourself if you would not like to receive this paper on your own account as a regular visitor to your home. At any time during this "acquaintance period" you may send in $1.50 and your name will be put upon the regular list and you will receive the paper until December 31, 1912, a period of thirteen months—the month of next December being free. If you are a minister $1 will be accepted. Our hope, in which the editors also join, is that you may become a permanent member of the Christian Century family. The Publishers.

Editorial Table Talk

A National Memorial Baptist Church

Baptists of the country are asked to give $50,000 to erect a National Memorial Church at Plymouth, Mass. The proposed structure is to be of stone, to have colonial columns in front, a conventional dome, and rooms suitable for social work in a small city. From the sale of the old Baptist Church of Plymouth $22,000 has been realized, but it is intended to keep this amount for an endowment fund if possible.

The Baptist Church of Plymouth, now gone, was historic in many ways. The Massachusetts Baptist Missionary Society was organized there, and from it have come not a few men who, in past years and now were, and are, leaders in American Baptist interests. The plan for a national structure, exerting an influence as wide as the country because of the great number of visitors to Plymouth, is endorsed by leading men of the denomination. The old church and its grounds were taken by the United States Government, which is to erect thereon a post office.

Hardly less than Congregationalists do Baptists look back to Plymouth and the landing there in 1620, and hence the new church, if made memorial, will contain the names of Pastor Robinson, Elder Brewster, Roger Williams, and others who helped to make New England Christian history, and perchance those of Adoniram Judson and others who helped to make Baptist missionary history. The project has, it is announced, received already a considerable financial endorsement.

May Improve American Pulpit Work

A new venture for ministers is a Correspondence School of Theology incorporated under the laws of New Jersey in July last, and located at Madison, N. J. This is the Madison that is the seat of Drew Seminary, a Methodist institution, but the new school has no connection with it or with any other school. Its courses, beginning this autumn, are for men in the ministry who desire to brush up after some years of preaching, for men of unusual ability who are driven by that ability into overwork, for ministers which the prospectus describes as "going to seed," and for men who are graduates of college or of seminaries, but not of both.

The courses, carried on through the mails, are expressly declared to be makeshifts merely, and are not contemplated as substitutes for courses in institutions where such are possible. Emphasis is laid upon studies in social service, and the courses are long, six to eight years. There are departments for the direction of reading, and for the solution of ministers' problems.

The advisory council has upon it Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, both north and south, Presbyterian, north and south, Reformed, United Brethren and Protestant Episcopal divines of note, including Bishop Hendrix of Kansas City; Bishop Murray of Baltimore; President Thomas of Middlebury College; Rev. John Balcom Shaw, Chicago; Rev. Dr. Chas. A. Eaton, New York; and Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tompkins, Philadelphia.

Training Men to Secure Mission Gifts

The Laymen's Missionary Movement is inaugurating what it calls an intensive compaign. That is, it is seeking to garner the fruits of its publicity efforts for the past two years. Institutes have been planned in the immediate future for Western New York, Eastern Pennsylvania and North Carolina, the last named to be attended by workers in all of the churches of particular counties.

Beginning with Boston, where fruits of the exposition called the "World in Boston," are to be reaped, there are to be held institutes for instruction in every member canvasses. The instruction having been given, actual canvasses of churches are to be made. Following the Boston meetings are to be meetings in Detroit, Pittsburg and Minneapolis. Some conventions are also planned for cities in which the campaign of two years ago did not enter.

Co-operation of the Movement is to be had this year with the Men and Religion Movement, Mr. Horace Sanderson, a secretary, being furnished for one of the teams this fall, and another secretary for another Men and Religion team after the Christmas holidays. A series of conventions is holding in Canada, extending from ocean to ocean, with John R. Mott, Robert E. Speer, and J. Campbell White, the last named just returned from China, as principal speakers. The movement has a new secretary, Mr. W. E. Doughty, who has become editor of its monthly newspaper and will undertake other educational work.

Features of the Men's Campaign

A part of the Men and Religion Movement campaign, the meetings of which are just beginning, is the gathering up of successful methods in churches of all names and their publication in permanent form. The aims are both to save such results of the campaign as may be useful, and to extend to officers of churches unable to take part in the campaign the benefit of wise methods, whether developed in and by the movement or not. Especial reference will be made to methods of work by volunteer laymen.

Connected with the movement meetings in many cities, that he may assist newspaper reporters in getting names, dates and speeches in accurate form, is a man filling a new profession—publicity secretary. His name is Henry E. Rood, and a noteworthy thing about him is that he gives eight months from October to next May, wholly without compensation. He has spent years with some of the great newspapers and magazines.

As far as fixed the dates of the movement's institutes, from October to the end of the year are as follows: October 2-8, Minneapolis; 9-15, South Bend, Ind.; 16-22, Grand Rapids and Des Moines, another team of instructors starting in on the date named; 23-29, Sioux Falls, Detroit and Cedar Rapids, the third team beginning on this last named date. During the first five days of November, and until after general election day, there will be a conference of the instructors, to see where mistakes have been made, and what improvements are possible. November 6-12, Dallas, Kansas City and Milwaukee; 13-20, New Orleans, Columbus, O., and Fort Worth; 21-26, Louisville and Oklahoma City, at this time a place for one team during these dates not having been fixed upon; 26-December 3, Little Rock and Dayton; 4-10, Houston, and St. Louis, two teams taking part because of the importance of the institutes; and 11-17, Nashville, Charleston, W. Va., and Topeka. A fourth team will start after the New Year.

Benevolent Money Coming Hard

It is no condonement of the slight shortage in the receipts of certain of the Disciples' Missionary Societies to point out that 1911 is proving to be one of the most difficult years in recent times in which to secure benevolent money of all kinds. But this general condition puts a different aspect on our own delinquency from that which some newspaper interpretations have given it. It is hardly believable that any considerable loss has been sustained by our missionary treasuries on account of the unholy attack made by a certain newspaper upon secretarial and executive boards. Other benevolent and missionary enterprises are suffering too, this year.

Officers of these organizations report this year to be the hardest for the securing of money gifts, small and large, that they have ever known. Some say it surpasses any of the panic years of recent times. The income of many benevolences is far behind. Development is not thought of, and nine in ten institutions are bending their entire efforts to get funds for absolute necessities. The condition came in early last winter, reached bottom at the beginning of summer, and is expected to continue to the end of the current year at any rate. Most officers of benevolent boards admit that they see no improvement likely for the coming year.

The difficulty is reported on the Pacific Coast, throughout the Middle States, and is most acute in the principle cities of the East, where ninety per cent of the benevolence of America is garnered. It is also reported in what is not pure benevolence, because it has the religious appeal behind it. Missionary societies are feeling its effects. Just what may be the cause experts in the collection of money for benevolent and religious purposes confess they cannot tell. Replies from givers, as to why they will not give this year as formerly, reveal little. Inquiries put to them, and to expert collectors, bring a variety of explanations.

On the Pacific Coast givers of previous years say they are confronted with peremptory demands from the projectors of the Panama Exposition at San Francisco, who tell them that unless such and such sums are secured by such a date the exposition will fail. In the Middle West unsatisfactory crops are given as the cause. Throughout the East where givers are less inclined to be communicative upon reasons for not sending checks, the only explanations secured are the attacks by the Government upon the trusts, a fear for the future of incomes, and a determination to wait and see. Several large givers are known personally to have put this plea forward.

One benevolent expert, a man who usually secures $50,000 to $60,000 a year in quite small gifts, $5 to $100 a year each, says a few of his subscription books have been returned with explanations that tariff tinkering by Congress has interfered with income. One man bluntly stated that he must buy a new auto. The same expert disavowed belief, however, in the theory that expenditures for automobiles are interfering with money sources of hospitals, education and missions, and said that American charity rests upon a firmer basis. He admits to a falling off of a third in his collections this year, however, and says that to get a dollar requires fifty per cent harder work than on any year for the last ten at least.

Interests affected by this stringency are far greater than most people imagine. The exact amount of American benevolence cannot be stated. Twenty years ago certain newspapers began to foot up, at the end of each year, the total amount of gifts reported in the public print for education, for hospitals, and for Christian missions. Their figures then reached $50,000,000 to $60,000,000. Now on some years they total up to $175,000,000. Yet only a very small part of the money gifts are reported in the newspapers. Gifts to foreign missions by Americans total $11,000,000 and to home missions $40,000,000 a year. The Young Men's Christian Associations and allied work, that having the Christian motive behind it, amounts to another $40,000,000 a year. Some put the amount as high as $60,000,000. There is no reliable data. Besides all these are the millions annually needed to maintain existing charities, part coming from private gifts, part by grants from public funds.

Vast sums are secured each year through mail appeals. Givers are splitting up their contributions, multiplying the number of recipients far faster than the amount. Most benevolences are finding the average gifts received by them to be much smaller than formerly, so that to get $10,000 they must see and influence many more persons. Many of these streams of benevolence are quite outside of the reported incomes of religious societies. One New York benevolent expert looking over his books and his letters, said a day or two ago:

"The year 1911 is the hardest one from a benevolent point of view, that I have known in fifteen years at least. I secure small gifts only, but I know the same conditions obtain in the large-gift field. Those who confine themselves to large givers tell me so. The cause? I give it up. The Panama Exposition is affecting general gifts on the coast, and there is some justice in the plea of poor crops in the Middle West, but in the East, from whence comes the bulk of benevolence, there is no reason that I can see. I only know that I cannot secure gifts as in former years, and I know that everybody else in my line is having the same experience. We have the same need. We appeal to the same givers. We are working far harder. We get less money. We do not allow ourselves to think of new projects. We see no improvement ahead."

Serious Outlook in Western China

Secretaries of American missionary societies, the American Bible Society, and others having work and workers in the upper Yangtse region of Western China, express the belief that American missionaries are safe, while they admit that the troubles there may be long continued and may result in much loss of property, belonging to American and English missionary societies.

Cheng Tu, the capital of the Szechwan province, the centre of the present outbreak, is headquarters for vast missionary interests, most of them American. There is located here one of the numerous presses, or printing houses scattered throughout the far east, where are manufactured Bibles, Testaments and vast numbers of Christian books in languages of the Orientals. The American Bible Society makes and distributes there upwards of a hundred thousand volumes a year, and others do colportage work in proportion.

We hope no reader overlooked the artice in last week's issue by Dr. Paul Wakefield, describing the distress with which our own Chinese Christians have been stricken. While our missionaries are probably safe, these native converts, our brethren, deserve our especial concern. Heretofore the famines have been quite a distance from central China where Disciple missionaries are at work. The present distress is right in the heart of the country and our people will suffer quite as much as any in the empire. There should be substantial succor sent by our churches and individuals to aid the work of rescue and relief. The Foreign Society at Cincinnati will forward all offerings.

Just cultivate a friendship with Christ and prove the truth of Emerson's memorable dictum that "any high friendship transfigures the world for us."

Interpretations

Pioneering in Grace

In John Wesley's Journal I recall that in referring to a worldly church there is a sentence like this: "There is here no pioneering in grace." What do we need more in our churches today than pioneering in grace? What were the prophets and saints but pioneers in the mysteries of God? They were discoverers of truth and life. The revelation given long since needs to be sought out by pioneer souls and revealed through them afresh to the souls of men. The Bible of the average man has only a few chapters. It is lamentable to hear the same few thread-worn passages quoted in every prayer-meeting. We belie our audacious motto, "Where the Scriptures speak we speak." We are silent concerning its great reaches. Even its familiar passages we do not fathom in their mighty depths. We need to pioneer in Scripture devotion. Our experiences should help us to interpret the Bible and the Bible our experiences. If the pioneer finds but one verse that speaks to the depths of his soul it may be enough to cleanse his life. The church is lagging because we fail to reveal revelation to the souls of men How hackneyed and commonplace our prayers are. This simply means that we do not put the strength of our souls into it. The depths of our wants we have not explored and the providences of God which should elicit our praise we have not marked. The gates of prayer only open to the pioneer. It is he who seeks and knocks and finds and gains admittance.

The pioneers of grace either in literature or our churches are not many. But wherever we find them we recognize at once their kingly authority. The pioneer in any church soon becomes marked as a spiritual leader. And in literature when we get a taste for the pioneer writers, those whose truth has been tested by their own soul, we will have little to do with mere reporters. A sentence from a pioneer is worth more than pages from average writers. Here for instance is a sentence from John Wesley; "Oh, how God does sweeten whatever cross we may bear for His sake." That sentence is "deep calling unto deep." You can arise and go many days in the strength of that word.

How much of our Sunday-school and organized church work is ragged and wholly unworthy of our Lord! But in every church there will be found the pioneer. He has a conscience concerning church duty, concerning the day of worship, concerning his example, concerning his personal morality and devotions and all of his relationships. In him the Spirit of God is seen in many delicate expressions. The pioneer is ever the remnant of Israel that holds our race to high purposes. The pioneer is not a crank nor is he a reckless explorer. He is a quiet and thoughful discoverer of the ways of God, and a follower in those ways.

* * *

The awakening of the church awaits upon the multiplication of pioneers For instance if we would have a large number of pioneers in all our churches with regard to Sunday, our rest and worship day, how mighty would be that day compared with what it now is. Samuel Johnson wrote this program for his Sundays:

1. To rise early, and in order to do it, I go to sleep early on Saturday.
2. To use some extraordinary devotion in the morning.
3. To examine the tenor of my life, and particularly the last week; and to mark my advances in religion or recession from it.
4. To read the Scripture methodically with such helps as are at hand.
5. To go to church twice.
6. To read books of divinity, either speculative of practical.
7. To instruct my family.
8. To wear off by meditation any worldly evil contracted in the week.

These resolutions are a good illustration of "pioneering in grace."

Hannibal. GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

"God is not ashamed, nor weary, of waiting to do you good; why should you feel shame or weariness in any way of waiting on Him, which reason and His holy Word recommend?" So spake one of our sainted worthies upon his deathbed; and he knew what he spake; he knew that it was not the language of enthusiasm, but the words of truth and soberness.

What a Time Like This Demands

A Searching, Timely, Deliberate and Inspiriting Challenge

BY TRUMAN E. WINTER.

EDITORS' NOTE: Not in a long time has a message so like the prophet's own been printed in these pages as is this article by Mr. Winter. It will strike the bull's-eye of every conscience. It will be answered by amen and amen in a great chorus. The article is deliberately written. It is two months and more since Mr. Winter notified us that he wished to write on this theme. It is not an effusion of his first thought. There is evidence in it of the seasoning of second judgment and of prayer. It is a genuine irenic—not to be classed with the weakly appeals of those who are blind to the fact that for many years a great body of sentiment has been growing among the Disciples of Christ to take their plea for union seriously and to live in the power of it. Mr. Winter has written from the midst of a busy pastorate at Fulton, Mo., where he is just now directing the completion of one of the best church buildings in that state. His message will, we doubt not, receive the approval of every soul that reads it.

"God give us men. A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith and ready hands;
Tall men, sun crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking."

The sentiment of this poem deserves to be the sentiment of our brotherhood today more than at any previous time in our history. We are in a crisis; our feet are at the parting of the ways. Many most important matters are before us for consideration; they cannot be settled until they are settled right. We should make haste slowly, in order that our forces may not take ground which we cannot hold. Every age makes certain demands upon its people, demands which must be met if the interests of true progress are to be served. Our age is no exception. If our great communion is to fulfill its distinctive mission to the world, whether Christian or non-Christian, it must meet the demands which this age makes of it. Among these demands, it seems to me, are the following:

The Utmost Loyalty.

Our time is no time for disloyalty. As we stand today and look back over a century of our history, we need to feel that this is no time for us to prove false to the great plea that we have been making before the religious world during that century. Our existence as a people is justified by that plea, a plea, as we all know, for the union of all the children of God on the basis of the simple faith of the New Testament, a basis sufficient, as we have held, for a universal Christian fellowship. It is only within the past few years that we ourselves have been taking our own plea at all seriously; at least so far as its practice is concerned. And even now there are indications of our faltering in our attempt. When Christian union movements of various kinds and degrees are being recognized by other communions, and entered into most heartily, we are hesitant and fearful. And that, too, when the integrity of our "plea" is in no wise involved. God forbid that we should prove recreant to our plea, for to forsake that is to yield the only ground on which our existence as a separate religious body can be justified. But there is nothing in the practice of Christian union that involves such an abandonment of our plea. This practice of union involves no more recognition of the Christian integrity of those of other communions than we have been giving for over fifty years. Nor does it involve us in the difficulty of sanctioning any of those things in those bodies which we do not feel able to accept in the light of our interpretation of the New Testament scriptures. This, then, is one of the things that our time demands of us—the utmost loyalty to our plea.

Loyalty to Mission Boards.

Nor is this a time for disloyalty to our various church boards. Historically these church boards are the agencies through which we have accomplished our great victories in the world, both at home and abroad. They stand for the larger interests of our movement and we should stand loyally by them, whether we are "conservative" or "liberal." There is nothing in either of these points-of-view that requires our assuming such an attitude toward our boards. President McLean's article in a recent issue of the Christian-Evangelist, entitled, "Conservatives and Liberals," is very opportune; in that article he says among other things:

President McLean Quoted.

"Instead of the conservative condemning the liberal and the liberal in turn despising the conservative, each should thank God for the existence of the other; each should love the other: because each is essential to the growth of the other in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. There are some who would employ only conservatives and others who would employ only liberals to preach in the pulpits, to teach in the colleges and to go to the mission fields. If either party had its way a serious mistake would be made. God needs both conservatives and liberals in his service, and it is only as both are engaged that the best results can be obtained. If we were to place only one class in all influential positions, we would degenerate into a sect, in the true sense of that word. It would save us from a good deal of acrimonious debate and needless fear if Paul's teaching on this subject were borne in mind. If the conservatives would refrain from judging the liberals, and the liberals would refrain from despising the conservatives, the cause of Christ would be immensely advantaged."

These are strong, brave words and should be received into our hearts and lives that they may become fruitful. There is no church among us that should not stand loyally by our church boards in their great work of faith and labor of love; and there is no pastor, or editor or educator among us who should not stand loyally by these men of God who are our chosen representatives in the glorious work which has been committed to them. Neither conservatism nor liberalism furnishes a ground upon which disloyalty to out church boards can be justified.

Larger Truth of Christendom.

And yet our loyalty to the plea does not forbid our loyalty to the larger truth of Christendom. Our loyalty to the church boards does not at all require that we be disloyal to any of the larger interests of the Kingdom of God. Otherwise we are bound hand and foot with the grave clothes of denominationalism. A time of crisis like this through which we are passing while seeking the larger light and feeling our way toward a better adjustment to the conditions of our time, demands of both conservative and liberal alike the utmost loyalty to our plea and to our church boards, yet at the same time leaves every one free to bear witness to what seems to him to be the larger truth, and to promote what to him seem the larger interests of the Kingdom. Practical unity, regardless of our theoretical differences, is what our time demands of us. No communion should allow dogma, ordinance, or polity to cause it to divide.

Time for Re-study.

Another demand which our time makes of us, it seems to me, is a careful re-study of the fundamental principles of our movement. Take for example the principle of Christian union. There is much difference of opinion on both the principle and its application. Who are to be united? And what, exactly, is Christian union? These two questions bring us at once to the heart of the problem. Who are to be brought together in this union? There are those who contend that we ourselves constitute the true church of Christ and that all who are in that body are one already. But that is not the view which the founders of our movement held; they looked upon those of all denominations as Christians. Again, there are those who say that the church of Christ is composed of all immersed believers, regardless of their denominational affiliation; that these are the people who are to be brought together into this union. That, of course, purposely excludes those of the various bodies who have not been immersed. The former view is an exclusive view, the latter a semi-exclusive: the former makes no hesitancy in drawing the line plainly, the latter seeks to run it indistinctly through the great body of believers in Jesus Christ, thus saving its advocates from the bald and unchristian harshness of those holding to the former view. But it is only an apparent salvation from such harshness.

Restoration Principle.

Now what involves us in this difficulty is our principle of the restoration of primitive Christianity. This has led us to feel that since in the primitive church there were none who had not been immersed, therefore there should be none in the church today who have not been immersed; that to restore a primitive church membership means, among other things, to restore an immersed church membership. And right here those who hold the exclusive or the semi-exclusive view, part company with those who hold what we may call the inclusive view. This view is that the members of the various denominations are Christian, and therefore the subjects of Christian union, regardless of the fact that they have not been immersed. The number of those among us holding this view seems to have been growing very rapidly.

A Half-way House.

But there is still another position occupied by no small number of our brethren, a sort of half-way house. This view is that these unimmersed people of the different churches are Christians, indeed, but that they are not to be admitted to this Christian union movement. Even though they may believe ever so firmly in the evils of division, and in the union of all the people of God, and are anxious to practice such union with all other people of God, still they are not to be admitted. The question arises, Why? And the answer seems to be that to admit such people would be to jeopardize our denominational integrity. For shame! A people who have for over a century been preaching against the sin of denominationalism now refusing to practice Christian union with people whom we recognize as Christian, because, forsooth, to do so would jeopardize our denominational interests!

What is Essential and Permanent?

Perhaps one may say that there is no other course left to us if we are to hold to the principle of restoration as the principle whose application will be most effective in accomplishing the desired union. This brings us to the question, Is it absolutely certain that the principle of restoration is such a principle as we have thought? One thing is certain, this principle is capable of different interpretations by different men in their effort to apply it. It involves the question as to how much of primitive Christianity should be restored? How much of it is essential and permanent, and how much of it is incidental or formal, and only temporary?

New Testament and Unimmersed Christians.

It seems evident that the New Testament contains no plain word upon the question as to what should be our attitude toward unimmersed Christians. That question was not up in the apostolic day. It is a question with which we have to deal today as our fathers had to deal in their day with the question of organs in the church worship and with missionary societies as agencies for the carrying out of the great commission of our Lord. This brings us to the consideration of a second principle of our movement, namely the principle of Christian liberty. The principle of union advocated by the fathers included the principle of the simplification of the platform on which that union was to be accomplished. It is expressed in our day in the words, "In faith unity, in opinions liberty, in all things charity."

Faith is Personal and Vital.

This faith in which unity is to be realized is not faith in any authoritative statement of doctrine, whether written or unwritten. It is simply faith in Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord: a personal and vital (as distinguished from doctrinal or theoretical) faith in a personal, present and living Saviour and Lord. It means the reduction of this faith to its lowest terms as a basis of union. In all things else large liberty is to be cheerfully granted to any who may seek our fellowship. This is in perfect harmony with the tendency of thought in our day. Doctrinal holdings, in so far as they are tests of fellowship, are to be reduced to a minimum in the interests of a practical or vital union, rather than a doctrinal or theological union. Here lies the solution of our problem of Christian union. But some one says, perhaps, that we are not at liberty to go beyond the express teaching of the New Testament. And here we come upon another principle that we should re-study—the principle of authority. Two of the shibboleths of our communion are,—"Where the Bible speaks, we speak; and where the Bible is silent, we are silent:" And, "Thus saith the Lord."

Further Question for Re-study.

Here we come face to face with such questions as these: Is the New Testament church a perfect norm? If so, it must be restored, or reproduced in all its minutest details. If not, we must distinguish between the temporary and the permanent. Again, Is the New Testment a book of law, or is it a book of principles whose application varies from age to age according to the conditions? Our judgment as it is expressed in our history gives a negative answer to both of these questions. We have shown that the New Testament church is not regarded by us as being a perfect norm, by our adoption of instrumental music in our worship and our adoption of missionary and other societies as auxiliaries to the church to make both our worship and our work more effective. While hypothetically our principle of authority historically has been that of the acceptance of an objective written law in which we could find a "thus saith the Lord," actually, the operative principle of authority has been that of the spirit rather than the letter; for we have recognized the fact that the letter indeed killeth, but the spirit giveth life. It was so with Jesus in the sermon on the mount; it was so with Paul in his refutation of the Judaizers and his leadership of the church from Jewish sectarianism to the universalism of Christian fellowship; it was so with us in our dealing with the matters already mentioned; and it will be so with us unto the close. So it ought to be with us in the matter of federation, in the matter of the unification of our missionary and benevolent enterprises, and in the matter of the practice of Christian union with all of the people of God whether in home or foreign lands.

The Spirit of Such a Re-study.

It seems to me that our time demands of us a very careful and prayerful re-study of these and other fundamental principles of our movement. Such a study can only be indicted in its very broadest outlines in this article. But the success, and, therefore, the value of such a re-study as this will depend almost wholly upon the spirit in which it is entered into and carried on. This leads me to say that another very important demand which our time makes of us is that we shall have in pulpit, in pew, in class-room and in our religious press, an absolutely untrammeled statement of our personal convictions on all these phases of our present-day church life.

Untrammeled Statement of Convictions.

It is altogether certain that we have never had this. But in the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom. If we could have such an untrammeled statement of the wholehearted, and deep personal convictions of our brethren on these questions, conservatives and liberals alike, if you please; and that, too, without the harsh judgment of the liberals by the conservatives, and without the equally harsh judgment of the conservatives by the liberals, it would mean much for our cause. If we could have such a statement without the branding cry of "heresy," on the one hand, and without the cry of "mossback" on the other; if we could have such a statement as this from our pastors without their being hounded from their pulpits because of it; if we could have such a statement from our missionaries on the foreign field without their being sure that their work would be cut short either by recall by the board or by lack of support through diversion of funds; if we could have such a statement from our college and university professors without their being made to feel that just as soon as it had been made their term of service in their institutions would be at an end; if we could have such a statement as this from our strong-minded and far-seeing business men without their being at once branded as false to the plea, or as being ignorant of the first principles of our movement; if we might have an untrammeled statement of personal conviction on these great questions how much it would mean for our own welfare and for the welfare of the kingdom of God! Can we not have this? This is what this article pleads for.

The Grace and Guidance of God.

Last of all, but by no means least of all, our time demands of us deep, heartsearching, yearning prayer for grace and guidance that we may see the larger light and walk in it; that we may see the larger interests of the kingdom of God and seek to serve them regardless of denominational interests; that we may have the humility, as well as the courage, to practice Christian union as the times shall enable us to do, that God may use us in bringing about an even more complete and effective union of his long divided people. To this end may God lead us, and bless us, and use us!

San Francisco Letter

Womans' suffrage is to be the fore in California. Next month we shall say whether both men and women hereafter shall vote in this state, or whether mere man alone shall continue to hold this prerogative. Just now it seems that he will not, for all the prominent papers in the state are fighting with the women with one exception. The ministers are in the thick of the battle; so are the saloon-keepers. Still, slush funds to defeat the proposition seem unavailing, for it has assumed the proportions of a "movement." Dr. Chas. Aked is perhaps foremost among the Baptist clergy as an advocate. But he is rather unfortunate in some of his speeches in illy comparing the English and Americans.

The coast is in a ferment just now, not only over the question of suffrage, but over most every question one might think of. Of course the next mayor of San Francisco will be the Panama-Pacific Exposition mayor. McCarthy, incumbent, wishes to be continued in our next. Mr. Rolph wishes to be installed in our next issue. And with but two outstanding candidates in the field (something rather unusual for this western city) the fight is warm. Now McCarthy is a proletarian with the mind of an autocrat, while James Rolph is of the bourgeoise, and the papers are having it that he has the mind of justice, etc. McCarthy is making a strong appeal to the labor union, being himself prominent. The papers are trying hard to ingratiate Rolph into their favor also.

Organized labor on the coast just now is puzzling most everybody including itself, perhaps. So the reform element is not able to put its finger on the labor vote. But San Francisco's political situation is but an incident. Labor has prepared itself for a great struggle in connection with the trial of the McNamirah brothers at Los Angeles. Now it is a city of churches; of eastern and middle-west people; of moral yearnings; of set notions on a good many subjects. Labor fears Los Angeles and in turn it fears labor. The position of the church in the struggle and of the minister (the thoughtful, justice-loving minister) is hardly to be envied.

This is a varied, interesting civilization, and so lusty that one can see it in process of formation. The church is going to have a battle to fight. Thoughtful preachers have seen this for some years now. Labor on this coast is as strong, in general terms, as capital. Both are on the ground floor, so to speak, and the arena is to witness a struggle. Class distinctions are clearly drawn. Perhaps here as in no other section of the nation has it become so evident that some people are on one side of a certain great question and some on the other. A certain great question has thrust itself into our life and will not down. There seems to be no escape for any man in any walk in life. It is literally a case of, "Choose this day whom ye shall serve."

Here is a significant bit. William Haywood spoke in Alameda and said, "In a pinch we can get along without the preacher." He had been enumerating those whom we could get along without. He was cheered a little too loudly to suit my own ears. It would seem that labor out here has already placed the church on the other side of the question. Here is a tragedy for both churches and preachers if this be so.

But the churches and the preachers (some of them) seem determined that they will attempt to be of some use in the pending struggle. The rife question in the church just now is the social question in its broadest aspect. A great many preachers are attending meetings of the labor unions; some are addressing them. Comity is resulting in certain instances. But of course reconciliation is not possible by compromise. Justice must prevail.

Two factors make it most difficult for the church right now to be of help in the battle. First, there is the arrogant, selfish, conscienceless attitude of a certain portion of capital. Secondly, there is that extreme "Left" of the labor movement which gives itself over to passion. The Industrial Workers of the World recently held a street meeting in Oakland. On their banner one could read, "We teach no creed; we have no cause but Brotherhood." Again, "The Capitalist has no flag, no patriotism, no cause, and no God but gold." Once more, "If the McNamariahs die die ten million men will know the reason why. Arouse ye slaves and break your chains!"

And the church! What can it do? How impotent it seems, how timorous! Perhaps it may well be so. Still, the issues are too clear cut to admit of indirection much longer. To those who would yet save labor and its thousands to the sanctuary the problem is pressing and depressing as well.

A Woman of Samaria

A Wyoming Fragment

BY MORTEN JOSLIN

My horses were sick, and the wagon consequently hors de combat. So with valise bulging with Bible, Testaments, and other good things, in one hand, and a stout willow, doing double duty as staff to comfort or to kill rattlesnakes, in the other, I set out "with face to the sun and feet to the sand," upon one of those wagon tracks in the sage brush, which the Wyoming pioneer has the audacity to designate a "road."

Only those who have spent the day on these roads under the pitiless summer sun, with the heavens as brass above, and the earth devoid of any sympathetic green beneath, can know what they are. They recall Pope's description of Virgil's hexameter verse: "Which like a wounded snake drags its slow length along."

This particular road wriggled out of Thermopolis toward Worland and took me by several ranches that fondly hug the bank of the Big Horn. Into one of these I entered. A log shack of unromantic appearance, with its rear buried in a low bluff, and roofed with dirt on which a few half-starved Russian thistles struggled for life, stood just inside a broken-down barbed wire fence. Two small windows blinked like fierce little eyes from its dirty face, and a grimy, unpainted door discouraged intrusion.

An unhappy-looking English bull-dog, anxious to argue matters, stood with his legs like an inverted lyre, right across the plank that led to the door. I addressed him in affectionate terms. He replied by a significant lifting of the corner of his upper lip, which showed he was superior to flattery. I offered him a piece of sandwich, but he was not sufficiently Americanized to accept a bribe. Just as I was coming to the conclusion that discretion might be the better part of valor a voice that sounded like the tearing of muslin screeched from within.

"Shut up, you ugly devil! or I'll skin you alive."

The household pet, recognizing the voice and the term of endearment with which he was addressed, and wishing to retain his cuticle, resigned the plank, and I knocked at the door.

The tearing muslin screeched, "Come in!"

I entered. Swinging in a rocking-chair and chewing gum was a woman with a hard face. She glared at me for a moment from steel eyes.

"Good morning," I ventured.

"Howdy." She continued to swing in her chair. Then after a moment: "Watcher got in yer grip? Hair-dye?" and she grinned at the question.

"Do I look like a canvasser?"

Another pierce from the steel eyes. "No. Your dial looks too straight."

"Thank you. Let me show you the contents of my grip."

"Sure. Dig 'em out."

The grip lay open on the floor between us, and Bibles and Testaments were silently and unceremoniously handled. The Nelson "Pocket Testament" took her fancy and she fondly fingered it a few seconds.

"What cute little books."

"How long is it since you read any of that Book? I ventured.

"Never. I was raised a Catholic, and we never read no Bibles."

"Raised a Catholic," I repeated. "What are you now?"

"Nothin'. Ain't been inside no church in fifteen year."

"Why?"

Memory seemed to suddenly fling a haze of softness over the ferocious face; the steel eyes glistened with a softer light and their gaze slid from the cover of the little Testament to the other days beyond that "fifteen year."

"You may well ask, 'Why.' Fifteen year ago I married a saloon-keeper and the dive we ran was in Thermopolis."

I waited for the story to proceed.

"Ef you got any idea what Thermopolis was like fifteen year ago, you'd know why I never went to no church.—Say I want one of them cute little books. How much do I have to shell out?"

"Forty cents."

"Ain't got it—not until the boss comes back."

I picked up a "Presentation Testament." "If you'll promise to read this every day I'll give it to you."

"You betcher life I will."

"May I read you something from this Bible?"

"You bet."

I read the heart cry of the prodigal king. I read as though a lost soul needed to hear it.

"Wash me thoroughly from my iniquity and cleanse me from my sin."

I glanced up for the fraction of a moment at the hard face—it was gazing intent out of the window.

"Make me to hear joy and gladness, that the bones which thou has broken may rejoice. Hide thy face from my sins and blot out all my iniquities. Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

And so on through the royal sinner's agony I read, and my heart was in my voice as a prayer was in my soul.

"The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit, a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise.

I stopped, and there was a moment of intense silence.

"Gee! but that's dandy. Who writ them words?"

"A king."

"What'd he bin a-doin'?"

"He took a man's wife and then took a man's life."

She started as though stung, and the ferocious face turned pale. Recovering herself she smiled, a weary, sad kind of a smile.

"Say, is that in that little testament you gi' me?"

"This is in the Old Testament; I gave you the New Testament."

"Then I'm goin' ter git the old testimint if I have ter pinch the old man's dough for it."

She left the room and returned with a dollar which she flung on the open page on my knee.

"Take it out o' that."

I handed her the open Bible, with the 50 cents change lying on the words that stirred her conscience and softened her face

"There's a story in your little Testament I would like to read to you. May I?"

"Yep;" and she dropped into the rocker.

I turned to the story of Sychar's woman who had had five husbands, and saw as I read that I was holding a mirror before a woman's soul. I closed the book and looked her straight in the face. I saw there that the psychological moment had come for a frank question. I asked it.

"Excuse me, but is this gentleman to whom you referred as 'the boss' and 'the old man,' your husband?"

The head dropped low, and her silence was her answer. A tear trickled down the down-turned face and dropped on the Fifty-first Psalm in her lap. We said nothing for three minutes. He who sat on the well was telling her all things that ever she did and I dared not interrupt. At last I broke the silence.

"Do you ever pray?"

"Ain't said a prayer since I was a kid and used to say 'Holy-Mary-Mother-O'God-pray-fer-us."

"Shall I pray?"

"Don't keer if y' do."

With a full heart I lifted my soul to Him whose needs took him "through Samaria," and sent me through Wyoming.

I took her hand and looking into her face saw a transformation. The steel eyes were soft and glistened with the unshed tears of a convicted soul, and the gum-chewing ferocity was gone.

"Jesus is the same today as then. He will cleanse your soul as he did hers, and will give you peace as he gave it to her. Do let him in. Will you?"

"I think I will." She glanced at the clock. "Gee! It's 'leven o'clock and no spuds peeled. How that old man will swear!"

I gathered the books into the grip and offered my hand again.

"Good-by."

"Good-by, and say! Ef you come through here again and don't call in they'll be suthin' doin'."

The bull dog was asleep as I passed out of the gate.

A year after I passed the spot. The log shack was empty and the grimy door stood ajar. I stepped inside. The floor was covered with dust, faded scraps of paper, and alfalfa stalks. A chipmunk, scared out of his wits, shot down a hole in the corner and a bull snake wriggled his yellow back through a chink in the logs. Some writing on the window casing caught my eye. I stepped closer and saw scrawled in a woman's hand, "John 4:29. Page 1,195." Instinctively I opened my pocket Testament, and while I read an indescribable something told me that she, too, had left her water-pot and was saying to her world, "Is not this the Christ?"

The Hot Box and the Dead Center

How They Tie Up a Train and Tie Up a Church

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

To him who in the love of travel holds communion with her visible forms of uniformed official and railway guides, she speaks a various language. Many are the lessons suggested to the vacationing pastor homeward bound by the experiences encountered upon those quasi-public utilities, railway trains. I write these lines while still in the midst of an experience with a hot box.

Do you know what a hot box is? I do, and will inform you. The weight of a railway car rests upon trucks, which are supported by wheels. It is necessary that the wheels shall rest in sockets at once strong and moderately free from friction. The axles of the wheels, you notice, terminate in iron boxes with covers that lift or slide. Should you look within, you would see a very useful arrangement not intended to be investigated with white silk gloves. The axle of the modern Pullman car is nine inches long within the box, and has a diameter of five inches. That axle must roll around a great many times in a mile. It must be kept well stuffed with cotton waste, saturated with oil. That oily stuff is not nice to handle. But men stuff it into the boxes with their great, greasy hands, and soak it with what they call "dope." The weight of the car rests on that axle, or journal, and is upborne by certain bronze castings laid above the journal, and known to the railroad men as "brasses."

The Los Angeles Limited.

We left Los Angeles on the Limited, being the best train of the Salt Lake Route, and before we had gotten to Riverside there was a hot box on the observation car. We stopped, and the trainmen poured on buckets of water, opened the box and poured in more, pulled out the smoking and bad-smelling waste, and re-packed it with more waste and poured in oil.

You may not know what a Keeley is. A Keeley is a tank which may be suspended above a journal, with a hose clamped so that it shall drip a constant stream into the box and directly upon the point that is heating. It is a patented arrangement, and has a proper name. But the trainmen call it a Keeley, for obvious reasons. They gave our hot box the Keeley cure as we went on.

No use. Every few miles we stopped and repacked the box, and refilled the Keeley. When we stopped at a station they turned the hose on the hot journal till the water, at first almost boiling, became cold. Then they jacked up the car, and removed the "busted brass." It does not often "bust" nowadays; they make them heavier. But in time that hot brass will give way. Ours was carefully watched, and did not break; but the alliterative "busted brass" still sounds appropriate. Several times we put in new brasses, one man lifting the end of the car with a jack. We took on a mechanic, who stayed with us far into the night. The trainmen assisted him, and we assisted them. The box was hot; the desert was hot.

We Kept Cool.

You expect me to say that the trainmen and passengers got hot. On the contrary, no one became impatient. No one swore. Every one made the best of it. But the hours moved on faster than we did. The sun went down, and the desert changed its glare to the soft and wonderful pinks and elusive greens and swiftly changing purples that so mysteriously and softly steal in as sacraments of the closing day.

Meantime the train that left Los Angeles three hours after us caught up with us. When we stopped they had to stop. They had on board a large delegation of men who had been attending a secret society convention. They had a lot of pasteboard musical instruments, and some drums. One of them got a window stick from the porter and used it as a drum major's baton, and the band marched forward to serenade us. They were a more democratic crowd than we. None of them wore coats, and few wore collars. They surrounded our hot box and played and sang sentimental songs, while we applauded. They were the jolliest crowd that ever broke loose from an asylum.

Orders from Headquarters.

Then we got orders from headquarters. The slow train following us was to go ahead, and take our mail car, and travel on our time. We were to keep our hoodooed observation car all the way to Chicago. So the other train took the United States mail and went around us, their band playing, "How can I bear to leave thee?" After that, headquarters troubled themselves no more about us. We were a train that had lost its right of way, and we took the siding for everything. They left us alone and we crept toward home like little Bo-Peep's sheep, bringing our observation car behind us.

At last our mechanic gave it up. He said the journal was like a plaster-paris map of the mountains, so ridged was it, and that not even the Lord himself could take that car to Chicago on that journal. I do not think he meant to be profane.

So finally they cut off that car, away in the night, and left it on a siding somewhere in Nevada. And we learned that that same hot box had become hot on the outward trip, and had been all the way from Omaha to Los Angeles.

Hilarity Gone.

Then this happened. We were two cars lighter, and the train ahead of us was one car heavier than their regular equipment, and we came up to them. They, too, had trouble, and kept us back all night. We came up beside them at breakfast time. Their hilarity had gone. Theirs was the sobriety of the morning after. Few men are merry at dawn. They feared we would go ahead again. But, no. They carried the mail, so we dropped behind, no longer held back by our own troubles but theirs. And the best we now hope for is to reach Salt Lake six hours late. And all for one hot box that already had a bad reputation.

I commended our conductor for keeping good natured through it all. He said,

"I have had long and intimate association with hot boxes. It does no good to get angry. A car with a hot box is like a balky mule. There are only two things to do: either swap him off, or make up your mind to be patient."

Hot Boxes in Churches.

Dear brother pastor, did you ever have any experiences with hot boxes? Have you in your church some good member, liable on the least provocation to get hot about the bearings? And have you tried to drip water on the troubled oil, adjusting your Keeley to the situation the very best you knew, without very permanent results?

I saw our conductor as he came into the wash room after one of our numerous stops for repairs. He sopped a towel in water, and bathed his hot head and face and thrust his head out of the window to detect the smell of the hot oil he was morally sure would soon greet his nostrils.

"Well, we're off again," observed a passenger, feeling that something ought to be said.

"Yes," replied the conductor, "but she's with us still, and she's a peach."

Some way as I looked at him his blue uniform and brass buttons dropped from him, and I saw his perspiring face above a white necktie and black coat.

Dear brother, she, he, or it, is still with you, and she, he, or it, is a peach.

But fill your Keeley with tact, and lay in a good supply of dope and fresh brasses, and be patient.

I have had as few hot boxes among my parishioners past and present as most ministers. It commonly is not the car with big journal that soonest gets hot. I have been mercifully spared the experiences of some ministers in this particular. Still I have sometimes smelt the smoking waste, and have used the Keeley the best I knew.

Permit me to give this admonition: take heed that you yourself get no hot box. A hot box on the rear car is bad enough, but on the locomotive it is beyond remedy. A hot box in the pew is a misfortune to the parish, but of all intolerable nuisances the minister whose journals heat with every grain of sand that sifts in with the dope is most insufferable. The journey is long, and the desert is

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XLI. Ezra and the Priestly Law

Oct. 15. Text for Special Study, Ezra 7.

1. THE BOOK OF EZRA.

In the last section some of the problems connected with the Books of Ezra-Nehemiah were discussed, and it was noted that the priority of Nehemiah in the order of incidents seems probable. A reconstruction of the events recorded in the two small volumes would probably show the following order of events.

1. The erection of the temple. The decree of Cyrus in 538 B. C. and the beginnings of return from the exile; efforts to build the temple; the opposition of the neighboring tribes; the renewal of royal permission to erect the temple; and the completion of the work through the earnest activity of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (Ezra 1-6). These events cover the period 538-516 B. C.

2. The Work of Nehemiah. The deputation to Susa, and Nehemiah's preparation to assist his fellow Jews at Jerusalem; his journey to the province as governor and the rebuilding of the walls, in spite of the opposition raised by a combination of Jews and foreigners. (Neh. 1-7:73a.) The time included in this period is the year 445 B. C. and some years following, while Nehemiah remained in Judea. (See Section XL of this series.)

3. The work of Ezra. The decree of King Artaxerxes II (404-358 B. B.) giving Ezra his commission to attempt reforms in Jerusalem in the year 397 B. C., the list of those who accompanied him on the journey (Ezra 7, 8). Ezra's public reading of the law; the celebration of the feast of tabernacles (Neh. 7:73b-8:18). The discovery of laxity in regard to mixed marriages; the reformation instituted by Ezra, and the list of those who put away their foreign wives (Ezra 9,10). Another public meeting with confession of sin, and ratification of a covenant with God; a list of the signers of the covenant (Neh. 9, 10). Later and traditional narratives regarding the reforms of the governor (Neh. 11-13). The length of time occupied by these events is not even suggested. On two occasions during the progress of Ezra's work Nehemiah is mentioned as present (Neh. 8:9; 10:1). This would suggest that Ezra's activity lay in the period following the visit of Nehemiah back to his home in Persia, when he had returned to Jerusalem to resume his duties as Tirshatha or governor (Neh. 13:6, 7). But the uncertain character of these later chapters throws the entire series of events into some obscurity.

2. THE NEW LEGAL IDEAL.

The Jewish communities in the east during the period following the exile were much larger, wealthier and more concerned with the religious status of their race than the "remnant" of people left in the province of Judah at the destruction of Jerusalem. Among them, in proportion to the decline of political hopes there developed a larger interest in the preservation and enrichment of the religion which their fathers had known. This movement was the result of combined efforts on the part of priests and prophets in behalf of the national faith. Its effect was to send back to Judah successive groups of volunteers in the days following the decree of Cyrus, and to strengthen the nationalistic feeling on the part of those pious Jews who did not deem it their duty to forsake their eastern homes for the meager life of Palestine.

So there grew up in Babylonia and Persia schools of Jewish instruction, in which the past glories and writings of the nation were made the theme of instruction, and the laws which had prevailed in the fatherland were carried to greater perfection of statement and greater detail of insistence. Gradually the Priest Code, as it is now known, took form. It was as much more elaborate and ambitious than Deuteronomy as that code was in advance of the modest Book of the Covenant (Ex. 20-23, and 34). In fact Ezekiel's code had pointed the way of development during the exile, and the Priest Code was the legitimate and inevitable extension of all that had gone before, yet with careful preservation of the Mosaic tradition. That portion of the law which is found in the last chapters of Exodus, and in the Books of Leviticus and Numbers, with its nucleus in the Holiness Code (Lev. 17-26), constitutes the latest section of the legislation of Israel, and had its formation in the east during the post-exilic age.

It was natural that those Jews who constituted this eastern section of the nation should be deeply concerned that their brethren in the ancient land of their people should observe the same rigorous religious program to which they had become accustomed. Moreover, since in their view righteousness and the prosperity dependent upon it were to be attained only in conformity to exact ritual requirements, they believed that the failure of the Jews in Palestine to observe the stricter terms of the law as it had taken form in the further orient, might well be the cause of the small progress yet made toward the revival of the holy city.

The journey and reforms of Ezra represent the efforts of the more consistent and devoted Jews of the east to bring their Palestinian brethren up to their standard of holiness, as the basis of a new and desired prosperity. Of late it has been openly questioned whether the Ezra narrative is veritable history or an effort to put in personal and precise form a movement which was in reality a slow and only partially successful attempt to incorporate the ideals of the advanced Jews on the soil of Judea.

3. EZRA'S JOURNEY. (Ezra 7.)

According to the record of the Book of Ezra, whose basis purports to be the personal journal of the reformer (Ezra 7:27-9:15), this man was a scribe, one of the new order of religious teachers which grew up in the later period. Intent on bringing to the people of the province of Judea the knowledge of the fuller law with which they were as yet unfamiliar he secured a firman from King Artaxerxes II in 397 B. C. which conferred upon him almost regal powers as inquisitor, instructor, reformer and administrator in Jerusalem, in accordance with the "law of God" which he was taking in his hand. The document recorded in chapt. 7 cannot be genuine, for it confers upon Ezra powers which no viceroy could have claimed. And it placed at his disposal wealth which would have been beyond the dreams of even royal officials.

Thus provided, and in company with a group of Levites and other men of religious vocations, Ezra made his way to Jerusalem. It took four months to make the journey. The chapter which falls to be studied in some detail, gives an impressive picture of the man and the sanctions which supported his efforts to bring his fellow Jews to a higher standard of ritual perfection.

Chapter 8 gives a list of those who went with Ezra, reaching several hundred. After they reached the Abana, one of the irrigating canals of Babylonia, they discovered that there were none of the priestly class in the caravan. With some difficulty a few of the proper order were secured and after a fast by the river, they proceeded on their way. On reaching Jerusalem with their gifts for the temple service, they were warmly received by the officials of the sanctuary, and a sacrificial festival was held in celebration of the event.

4. THE PROCLAMATION OF THE NEW LAW.

The continuation of the narrative is given in Neh. 7:73b-8:18. Two months later the people were gathered in a great assembly in Jerusalem, and Ezra read to them the provisions of the new code, much as Josiah gave popular opportunity for the hearing of Deuteronomy (2 Kings 23:1-3). Elaborate arrangements were made for this public reading. A company of priests and Levites assisted in the work, and Nehemiah, the governor, lent his influence to make the occasion impressive.

It was a solemn yet joyful time. A half day was taken in the reading. On the second day they came to the law relating to the feast of tabernacles, and as the time was that prescribed, they proceeded to make the booths of olive branches and keep the feast seven days, while Ezra continued the reading of the law from day to day.

The principal feature of the new law as it affected the life of the people was the prohibition of the intermarriage with the heathen. Israel had never gone beyond the natural tribal sentiment in its limitation of mixed marriages. The earlier laws had little or nothing to say on the subject. In all the earlier periods the people had freely taken wives from the neighboring nations. Public sentiment was not averse to this custom. Malachi had denounced the custom of abandoning Hebrew wives to marry strangers (Mal. 2:10-16), and Nehemiah had forcibly reproved the practice, but seemingly without avail.

It was at this point that the reforms of Ezra proved most drastic. Chapters 9 and 10 of the book record the astonishment and grief of the scribe when he discovered how lax the people of Judah had been, and contrasted their behavior with the strict exclusiveness of the eastern Jews; how he gathered the people again in a public assembly, denounced the practice, and appointed a commission to determine the merits of the various cases of transgression. Then follows a long list of those who were compelled to send away their non-Jewish wives.

5. EZRA'S REFORMS.

It is somewhat difficult for us to share Ezra's sentiments on this subject of mixed marriages, or to avoid the feeling that he made too much of the principle of exclusion. We are more likely to sympathize with the families that were broken up by these severe measures, and to wonder if they accomplished more good than evil.

Certain it is that the sentiment of strict and exclusive nationalism began among the Jews with Ezra. It was not an element in the earlier history. The impression that the Hebrew race was always scrupulous in its avoidance of intermarriage with other peoples is supported by none of the facts, nor would intelligent Jews today attempt to defend the theory of their ancient purity of blood.

In fact the age of Ezra, or one soon later, saw the rise of a sentiment of protest against such narrowness and insularity. One of the literary products of that protests is the beautiful Book of Ruth, with its story of a Moabite maiden, whose fidelity and charm made her worthy of a place in the tribal lists of Judah, as an ancestress of the great king, David.

On the other hand, while one reads the story of Ezra with a feeling that the depth of his horror of the conditions he found in Jerusalem was rather humorous than convincing, and his reforms rather harsh than helpful, yet it must be remembered that later Judaism gained much of its tenacity, thoroughness and devotion to detail from the spirit of the great scribe, and that his contribution to the life of the nation was one of the most formative in its later history.

TOPICS FOR FURTHER STUDY, REPORTS OR PAPERS.

1. The literary problems of Ezra-Nehemiah.
2. The chronology of Ezra's period.
3. The comparison of Jewish communities in the east with those in Judea.
4. The characteristic of the Priest Code.
5. The value of the work of Ezra as compared with that of Nehemiah.
6. Ezra's influence on Judaism.

QUESTIONS.

1. With what events do the first six chapters of Ezra deal?
2. Where is the work of Nehemiah described?
3. How is the story of Ezra's activity to be gotten from our present sources?
4. Were both Nehemiah and Ezra in Jerusalem at the same time?
5. How did the Jews in the east compare with those in Palestine?
6. In what way did the Jewish faith develop in Persia and Babylonia?
7. What can you say of the origin, date, and character of the Priest Code?
8. Were the people of Palestine as yet in possession of this form of the law?
9. What was the purpose of Ezra's journey to Jerusalem?
10. Why have some recent writers questioned the historical nature of the narrative regarding Ezra?
11. What is the basis of the Book of Ezra?
12. What reason is there to question the correctness of the royal decree given to Ezra?
13. What did Ezra take with him to Judah?
14. What company went with Ezra?
15. Where did they stop on the journey? Why?
16. How was the new law proclaimed?
17. What feast was celebrated and why?
18. What provision of the law did Ezra discover to be suffering constant violation?
19. What did he do to change conditions?
20. What was the value of the work of Ezra?
21. What Book of the Bible offers a protest against the work of Ezra?

The Hot Box and the Dead Center

hot; provide thine own journals with plenty of oil and packing, and let thy bearings be of generous width and strength, that so thou mayest bear the strain of this new season of labor and not heat thy boxes.

Now as to the Dead Center.

We went down from Los Angeles to San Diego and National City, my wife and I. National City is a few miles beyond San Diego, the nearest to the Mexican line, and the railway terminus. We went on the best train, which is a good thing to do, but sometimes is disappointing. And one side of our locomotive broke down. Something got into the cylinder, with the result that the cylinder-head at one end was broken out. They took off the outer casing, and removed the smashed casting, and dropped it beside the track, and I was interested in seeing how two men can take a great locomotive so nearly to pieces between stations, and screw it up again.

We stopped in a beautiful place beside the sea, and felt quite indebted to the railway company for affording us that pleasant stop over. We sat on the sand, and some great big men chased the waves, and laughed like little boys when they got their feet wet, and they dug pits in the sand, and piled up sand fortifications, and watched the waves fill the holes and wash away the houses they had built. And all that was good for them.

Crippled Cylinder.

After a long stop we went ahead with three-quarters of an engine. One cylinder was in good condition, and the other one worked from one end and wasted steam at the other. We moved on slowly, and with frequent stops. At length we made another and much longer stop. They had to carry ties and build up a sort of trestle, and they took out the entire piston on the left side of the engine. We had bent it out of shape, and it threatened to wreck us.

Then we moved on with half an engine. And when we stopped we had the hardest work to avoid stopping with the piston out at such a point midway as that the steam could not push it either way. There is such a point in a locomotive, and one way of avoiding it is by having the two cylinders off center so that one can always start.

Reached San Diego.

The train was full as far as San Diego, but every one got out there except us two. We, alone, went on to the very end, and got off at National City. The conductor was very good about it, but I know he was sorry we did not get off. If he had had no passengers for National City he would have run straight to the roundhouse and not to the station. It was almost too bad to have him run the whole train to the station just for us. We felt quite distinguished, and made the most of the experience, for we had friends waiting for us till midnight in the dark station at National City, and it was needful that we meet them there. So the one-legged engine had to haul the train to the station, and back it to the roundhouse, every one of us fearing that it would stop on its dead center, and not be able to get to the roundhouse without more tedious and wearisome labor. But as this extra stop and start were made for me, I am glad to be able to state that the locomotive did not stop on its dead-center, and as we moved away in the midnight we saw it backing with much heavy jerkiness to its home for the night. And there, I hope, they repaired it.

The Moral.

Of course, you have known all the time that this experience would be the text of a sermon, and it is.

My dearly beloved brethren and sisters, do you ever stop on a spiritual dead-center?

Do you take offense at little things and stop your church work and never take it up, or if you resume it, is it with a jerky, half-hearted motion that proclaims the nature of the accident?

I suppose that never since the church began did a minister go to a new field without finding some people who had stopped on dead-centers of one sort or another and remained immovable.

Did the former pastor call on you less frequently than you wished, and did you cease your church work? Did some one criticize the way you taught your Sunday-school class, and did you give it up in a huff? Did you feel as if you ought to have been appointed on a given committee, and did you drop out because you were not appreciated? Please don't! It isn't pretty. You have no idea how it worries a minister to have his members stop on dead-centers.

Sometimes people stop after a summer vacation. They come back and notify the pastor that he really must get some one else to teach their Sunday-school class, not for any particular reason, but just because they have returned too tired from their resting, or too busy with club work (God save the mark!) or merely because they don't quite feel like it.

I am confident this article will be read by some people who are in this condition. And that is why I have written it. Dearly beloved brothers and sisters, don't get a hot box, and don't stop on a dead-center. Here endeth the second lesson.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

At Harvel, where S. R. Lewis is minister, a revival meeting is in progress conducted by A. W. Crabb, of Brazil, Ind.

There were eight additions to Herrin Church Sunday, September 17. Four of the additions were on confession of faith.

A. N. Hale, for several years pastor of Macomb Church, has become pastor of the church at Virden where an excellent edifice is being erected, costing $25,000.

George Woodman, who has recently concluded his pastorate at Polo and become pastor at Donovan and Iroquois, was formally ordained to the ministry at Dixon Church by the pastor, S. Elwood Fisher, assisted by the elders of the church.

The Roy L. Brown evangelistic company had enlisted a total of twenty-six persons at the end of the second week, in the meeting at Bellflower. Climate conditions were very greatly hindering the progress of the meeting. Much rain, together with the razing of the tent four times by the wind, has seriously handicapped the work of the evangelists. The meeting is continuing however, with the assistance of the minister, L. S. Harrington.

F. L. Davis began a revival meeting with his home congregation at Waynesville the last Sunday in September.

G. M. Burnett has resigned his pastorate at Summum, and will be ready for another pastorate at the close of the year.

S. Elwood Fisher is holding a meeting at Pine Creek Church, near Dixon. The pastor is D. F. Seyster, who will fill Mr. Fisher's pulpit during the meeting.

The contract for the new building at Normal, was recently let for $26,200. This church is being ministered to by J. H. Gilliland during its building campaign.

West Side Church, Springfield, of which John R. Golden is minister, will be led in a meeting the first of next year by J. M. Rudy, of Indiana.

F. A. Sword assisted by J. P. Garmong of Iowa is holding a meeting for W. T. Moore and the church at Toluca, with promise of many additions.

H. H. Jenner, pastor of Stuart Street Church, Springfield, will be assisted in a meeting during the month of November by John R. Golden, pastor of West Side Church.

The remodeled and enlarged church building at Augusta will be dedicated the fifteenth of October. E. T. Cornelius ministers to the congregation.

LaHarpe Church has extended a call to E. A. Jordan, of Omaha, who will succeed L. G. Huff, who recently became pastor at Mt. Sterling.

During the absence of the pastor, C. S. Weaver, from his church at Latham, Mr. Alfred Greening, principal of the high school, filled the pulpit one Sunday.

C. O. Farland and wife are holding a meeting at Stronghurst. The church here has been pastorless for several years, but the evangelists are hoping to enlarge the membership and employ a pastor for the field.

C. G. Cantrell, pastor at Literberry, will be assisted in a meeting in October by Rochester Irwin and wife. Mr. Cantrell had the assistance of A. Sanders of Kentucky in a brief meeting at Berea, in which there were two additions by baptism to the church.

The young women in the State University at Champaign who are members of Disciple churches have formed an organization known as "Bethany Circle." Their purpose is to promote their own Christian culture and seek to influence other young women toward a spiritual life.

Pontiac Sunday-school recently sent a generous donation of canned fruits to the Orphans' Home in St. Louis. Many of our churches and Sunday-schools doing a similar thing, requiring no great effort, would bring much cheer to such a home during the winter months.

F. Lewis Starbuck of Eureka, concluded a revival meeting at Shirley Centennial Church, in which there were thirty-two additions, most of whom were by confession of faith. Mr. Starbuck is preaching for this church while carrying on his regular college duties in Eureka.

Chicago Heights Church, where E. D. Salkeld is pastor, was the only church in the city which accepted an invitation to participate in the Labor Day celebration. This church prepared a float for the parade, upon which rode a number of children and adults with banners, indicating their membership in the Christian Church Sunday-school. The local paper mentioned with favor the church's enterprise, and considerable recognition was received from the unions.

Moline Church is steadily making for itself a place of importance in that city. Recently, instead of paying only the interest on its debt, enough money was on hand to make a payment on the principal. During the last year more than $5,000 has been paid on debts and improvements. Clarence DePew and W. T. Fisher, Sunday-school superintendent of Iowa, held a rally there. The pastor, W. B. Slater, is in a meeting at Fields, Ohio, his boyhood home.

A revival at Blue Mound, conducted by Mrs. Sarah McCoy Crank, closed with thirty-one additions, twenty-six being on confession of faith. At the close of the meeting, a note for $1,436 was burned in the presence of a large congregation. This money was raised by Mrs. Crank in a personal canvass of the membership during the concluding days of the meeting. The church is now out of debt, and is succeeding admirably under the ministry of F. W. Harlow.

Russell F. Thrapp to Leave Jacksonville.

Russell F. Thrapp for over ten years pastor at Jacksonville, Ill., has resigned there to accept a call to First Church, Los Angeles, whose pulpit is made vacant by the recent resignation of A. C. Smither. Mr. Thrapp has accomplished in Jacksonville one of the most substantial pieces of church work which Illinois has witnessed. He has received 1,252 members into the congregation during the ten years and led in the erection of the finest church house in the state. Not in extensive work alone but in intensive values has his pastorate been characterized. The Jacksonville church is a true church of Christ in the personal spiritual life of its members. A remarkable—perhaps an unmatched—record in thoroughness of membership enlistment is indicated by the fact that last year 1,004 members of the church made offerings to current expenses and missions. Mr. Thrapp will be a great addition to the Pacific coast ministry. He will be felt as a force in Los Angeles from the very start. He combines as well as any man in Illinois the elements of manly vigor and decision with spiritual grace and insight. He will be missed on every hand in the counsels of his brethren in this state, and sorely missed in Jacksonville where he had come to be regarded as a sort of fixed institution. His church has been able to hold him against the charms of many other calls in recent years, but he feels that the call of Los Angeles is so unanimous and manifestly carries with it so magnificent an opportunity that he must accept it.

Secretary's Letter.

John B. Dickson is doing a very satisfactory work at Herrin. He is a splendid addition to our ministerial force in Illinois.

S. Elwood Fisher, of Dixon, is in a revival with the Pine Creek Church where D. F. Seyster ministers. Brother Seyster supplies for Dixon during the meeting.

De Forrest Mullins, of Detroit, has just closed a good meeting, assisted by John M. Asbell, evangelist, and Geo. Butler, singer, both of Missouri. There were eleven additions. They are building a new parsonage and the church and Sunday-school are doing well.

Rochester Irwin and wife will hold a meeting at Ashland in November, assisting pastor F. M. Morgan. They are building high hopes.

F. L. Starbuck, a senior student at Eureka has just closed a very successful meeting with home forces at Shirley, thirty-two additions. This makes nearly 100 additions, including his meeting about a year ago with over forty, all adults but four. Considering the fact that the town only has about 1,000 inhabitants we regard this as an unusually good work. A new parsonage project is on foot and is practically a "sure go," to cost $2,500. Brother Starbuck is an enthusiast on rural community building and everything is looking toward the betterment of rural conditions. He has been elected manager of a "Corn Show" to be held at Shirley in the near future, that promises to be one of the biggest things held there in a long time.

The next important matter now before Illinois Disciples is to prepare for a truly great Illinois Day offering in November. Not so many churches sent offerings during the year just closed as the year before. We must make a different record this year if possible and to this end let us all rally for Illinois missions next November. Our aim should be, "Four Hundred Churches in Line."

Send all offerings to the treasurer, W. D. Deweese, Bloomington. It causes inconvenience when checks, drafts, etc., are not drawn to him. Please keep this in mind.

The new Year Book is in the hands of the printer and will be out about October 10 or 15. We want a full and correct list of our preachers and their addresses. If any have changed their addresses in the last few months please drop us a card at once.

The field secretary assisted in the ordination of elders and deacons at Clinton. Lewis Goos, H. M. Barnett and J. F. Rosborough the minister in charge, were present.

He also dedicated the building at De Land. The house is beautiful and is equipped with every convenience, and the church and minister, G. W. Wise, are pleased with their plant. Brother Wise followed with meeting.

The field secretary will also dedicate at Nebo and Bridgeport. He will also spend a few nights at Mt. Auburn, and help R. Burl Doan in a meeting at Armington. He cannot answer one call for his services in ten but he likes to have them come.

W. W. Denham and the Carthage Church are anticipating a great meeting in November with W. E. Harlow, evangelist.

F. A. Sword is waking things up at Toluca where J. T. Moore is the faithful minister. There were forty-one additions up to Sunday September 24.

H. F. Kern, who ministers to the Bethel Plaine Church in Marshall County, reports the work moving along in good shape.

Miss Myrtle B. Parke, minister at Cullock, has been engaged to conduct a revival meeting at Hudson before the holidays.

Everett Stephens of Paris is entering upon the work of the ministry and is highly spoken of by the pastor, W. W. Sniff. He can serve churches near Paris. Write him or Brother Sniff.

E. P. Gish is in a meeting at Oakford and the prospects are that he will organize a new church.

The contract has been let for the new church at Normal to cost about $35,000, J. H. Gilliland, minister. Work begins at once. The congregation has purchased a splendid lot centrally located on the street car line. Normal church is coming into her own.

October is an important month for state missions, for, during this time, preparation is being made for taking the offering and making it really worthy and worth while. The minister who is deeply interested in this matter will hang up the big poster soon as it comes, announce "Illinois Day" frequently, read up on the subject and get himself full of it, talk it and pray for it till the whole church catches his enthusiasm, and when the day comes (first Sunday in November) and he presents the opportunity the brethren will be ready to respond liberally and cheerfully.

Tell your people about our Annuity Plan whereby they can make large gifts to our society and receive 6 per cent in semi-annual payments as long as the annuitant lives. He pays no taxes and has no worry about investments and the income is certain. The plan commends itself to every business man. Send to us for literature.

Eureka College

Eureka College opened this fall with the largest atendance for several years. The increase in attendance is in the college proper. To those of us who read aright the signs of the times, this is encouraging. It may be that Eureka College and all other schools of a similar character will be compelled to eliminate the Preparatory Department within a few years. We are making our fight now for the high school graduates and the success that we have attained this year adds encouragement to the battle.

Brother A. McLean delivered a wonderful address at the opening of college. He is always a welcome visitor in Eureka and never more so than at present. His vision of greater things, his loyalty to our plea, and his interest in our people commend him to the people of Eureka and vicinity. The students, old and new, were especially charmed with his message. There were many other interesting things in the opening days of college, but to mention all would require too much space.

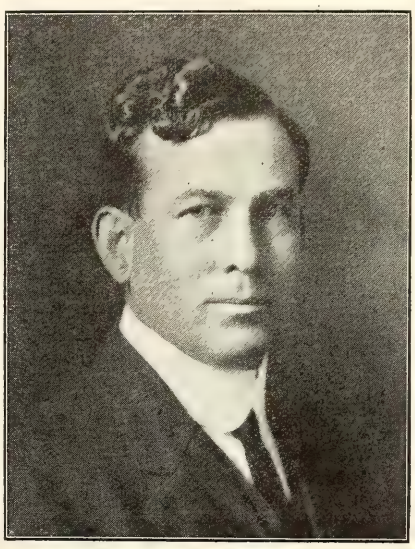
The friends of the college who have observed the closing of our Endowment Campaign which ended September 1, will be glad to know that our money is coming in quite rapidly. I have not asked the chairman of the committee for a few days, but feel safe in saying that setlement has been made on something like $75,000 or $80,000 already. We hope to have everything straightened up soon. Thus we have had no difficulty with anyone who made a pledge toward the Endowment Fund. Two or three men said to me that they did not expect to have to pay when the pledge was made, but they wanted to make me feel good. I am always willing to have my good feelings "cashed in."

It is too early to make definite announcement concerning the next special campaign. We ought to have $35,000 within a year for new buildings and we ought to have $100,000 additional endowment within the next two years. The trustees are working on these two propositions now, and one or the other, or both, will undoubtedly be launched within the next two weeks. In the mean time we want our friends everywhere to remember that the battle has only commenced.

H. H. Peters.

Eureka's New President.

Charles E. Underwood, the newly elected president of Eureka College is a graduate of Butler College and Yale. He expects to receive the degree of PhD. from the latter institution before taking up the active duties of his new position. For several years he has been professor in the Bible College of Missouri where he took high rank and where his going will be greatly missed. Eureka has been blessed in its acting president, Prof.



President-Elect Charles E. Underwood.

A. C. Gray, since the resignation of R. E. Hieronymus more than a year ago. Professor Gray will continue in the work of teaching in the college now that his administrative responsibilities are to be assumed by Mr. Underwood. The new president takes up his work February 1.

Chicago

The church at Irving Park has called an assistant pastor, who will take charge at the athletic work in their gymnasium annex. Physical culture classes are being arranged.

"Gypsy" Smith was a recent visitor here. He spoke at some of the churches. The large auditorium at the Fourth Presbyterian Church, John Timothy Stone pastor, was unable to care for the large number of people who desired to hear the "Gypsy." He is on his way west to begin a series of evangelistic meetings.

The program for the quarterly assembly October 8, at the First Methodist Church, corner Washington and Clark, has been completed. The main address will be delivered by Dr. Willett, who will speak on "Chicago Missionary Ideals." O. F. Jordan will tell of the "Achievements of a Year." Will F. Shaw, Vaughan Dabney and Basil Keusseff will bring reports of the work in their respective fields.

The officers of the C. W. B. M. union send out a last announcement of their rally to be held Thursday, October 5, at Sheffield Avenue Church, corner George street and Sheffield avenue.

At a recent meeting of the executive committee of the Business Men's Association, a committee was appointed to arrange for a social union banquet to be held October 19. The fellowship at such gatherings ever proves rich and churches are urged to cooperate in making this a well-attended and inspirational banquet.

Church Life

Work is progressing rapidly on the new church at Knoxville, Iowa

L. C. Harris, for two years pastor of First Church, Onawa, Iowa, has resigned.

W. B. Wilson, of Delta, Iowa, has begun his new pastorate at Grinnell, Iowa.

David J. Elsea has resigned his work at Ottumwa, Iowa, and will probably locate in some Western field.

W. H. Knotts, formerly of Storm Lake, Iowa, has assumed his duties as pastor of Highland Park Church, Des Moines, Iowa.

D. Munro, for six years minister of the church at Algonac, Mich., has accepted a call to Wychwood Church, Toronto, Ont.

Garrett McQuiddy has concluded his pastorate at Alva, Okla., and will take up work in Oklahoma City, Okla.

Large audiences have attended W. J. Minges' meeting at Herington, Kan. There were 367 additions during the first eighteen days.

E. B. Quick, for three years pastor at First Church, Braddock, Pa., has resigned to enter Yale Divinity School where he will take a post-graduate course.

A. O. Riall, until recently connected with Texas Christian University at Fort Worth, has accepted a call to First Church, Commerce, Tex.

The new building being erected by the congregation at Mineola, Tex., is rapidly nearing completion. It is hoped that it will be ready for occupancy by October 10.

W. R. Burbridge and A. E. Buss are in a meeting at Dewey Church near Smith Center, Kans., with C. S. Earley. There have been a number of additions.

William Oeschger, of Cotner University, Bethany, Neb., is assisting Wm. J. Carey in a meeting at Havelock, Neb. There were six confessions at the first Sunday service.

Many delegations from nearby towns are attending Charles Reign Scoville's meetings at Terre Haute, Ind. During the first two weeks there were 443 accessions.

An interesting contest is in progress between the Sunday-schools of Chillicothe and Brookfield, Mo. At present Chillicothe is leading.

W. F. Rothenberger, of Franklin Circle Church, Cleveland, Ohio, has returned from a three months trip in Europe and begun his new season's work at the church with characteristic vigor.

Central Church, Fitzgerald, Ga., is without a pastor, due to the resignation of C. Thos. Combs. Correspondence regarding this field may be addressed to H. W. Brown, Fitzgerald, Ga.

H. K. Pendleton, of Santa Barbara, Cal., who was recently called to the pastorate of the church at Independence, Mo., has accepted and will begin his work there November 1.

The church at Ann Arbor gave a reception recently to welcome George W. Knepper to its pastorate. Mr. Knepper, who is well-known through his interest in social betterment, was formerly pastor at Wilkinsburg, a suburb of Pittsburgh, Pa. Previous to entering the ministry he devoted seven years to Y. M. C. A. work.

W. B. Harter has concluded his pastorate at Sterling, Colo., where he has ministered for the past two and one-half years. The Sunday-school at Sterling has recently been reorganized on the commission plan.

E. N. Duty, who has resigned his pastorate at Minerva, Ohio, will close his work there in December. This church will be the meeting place of the annual convention of Ninth District, October 12-13.

The meeting of the Kentucky Christian Mission Society was held at Frankfort, September 18-20. There was a large atendance more than a thousand visitors being present. Many well-known speakers from Kentucky and adjoining states were on the program.

The church at Platte City, Mo., has extended a unanimous call to their pastor, Harry E. Tucker, to remain with them another year. Mr. Tucker has been with this congregation for six years.

Plans are nearly completed for the new Norwood Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, and construction work will begin soon. An attractive edifice is planned and an institutional department will be maintained in addition to the usual activities of the congregation.

W. J. Lockhart, of Des Moines, Iowa, has concluded his meeting with Thomas W. Grafton at Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City, Mo. The Men's Brotherhood took an active part in conducting the meeting and contributed much to its success.

The congregation at Newton, Iowa, recently celebrated the eighth anniversary of the pastorate of E. F. Leake. During this time the work has made good progress as a result of united and harmonious congregation.

J. F. Baxter of New Castle, Pa., who was called to the pastorate of Central Church, Flint, Mich., begins his work there October 15. He will succeed J. Frank Green who has accepted the work of corresponging secretary for the Michigan Missionary Society.

Rose T. Armbruster, who is stationed at Akita, Japan, writes the following: "Four baptisms in Akita Church today, three young men and a married woman. Attendance at morning service was forty, twenty-four of whom were women. Usually men predominate."

Work has begun on the new house of worship to be erected by the congregation of Centenary Church, Indianapolis, Ind. The building will be a handsome one of birch and stone, erected at a cost of $20,000. It is expected that it will be ready for occupancy by the first of the year. C. W. Parks is the minister.

W. J. Clarke and O. M. Walker held a meeting recently at Tenth Street Church, Paducah, Ky., where G. D. Wyatt ministers. The meeting lasted three weeks and during that time there were fifty-one additions. All the organizations of the church were greatly strengthened and the Sunday-school reached the front rank standard.

George A. Campbell, pastor of First Church, Hannibal, Mo., was one of the speakers at a recent meeting held by thirty pastors and laymen, representing the various churches of Hannibal. The meeting was held in the interests of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, and efforts are being made to interest the laymen of the church in this movement.

The first annual meeting of the churches of Shelby County, Ind., was held September 23-24, at Fairland with a good attendance. All of the churches in the county, with one exception, were represented. Among the speakers were the following: E. E. Moorman, Fred Jacobs, Garry L. Cook, L. E. Murray, O. E. Gulley, L. E. Brown and Mrs. Anna Atwater. Next year's meeting will be held at Morristown.

A temporary structure has been erected at Billings, Mont., under the leadership of J. S. Raum, state secretary. This will house a new congregation which was organized through the efforts of Frank Maples, pastor, of First Church, who saw the immediate need of providing for the rapidly growing membership in that locality. A good site has been secured and a permanent building will replace the temporary structure as soon as funds are forthcoming.

W. J. Wright, of Enid, Okla., intends to hold two or three meetings during the approaching autumn and winter. He will furnish one of the best singers in the work. Mr. Wright has had much experience in union meetings with the best known men in that line of evangelism, and likewise in the best churches of our brotherhood. His work is not sensational or spectacular. It is positive and constructive.

First Church, Davenport, Iowa, where S. M. Perkins ministers, celebrated the seventy-second anniversary on September 24. This was followed by a ten days' rally service, at which Finis S. Idleman, of Des Moines, Iowa, preached each evening on the following subjects: "Jesus and the Home;" "Monuments of the Gospel;" "What Christ is to Men;" "C. W. B. M. Address;" "The Meaning of Discipleship;" "A Man After God's Own Heart;" "The Church and the Moral Man;" Strength and Weakness of Protestantism;" "The Good Samaritan;" "Opportunity and the Kingdom." Home Coming Day was celebrated October 1.

H. L. Ice, pastor at Shadysde, Ohio, just closed a series of excellent meetings there. In spite of frequent interruptions by rains, the convening of the delegates of the Belmont County Sunday-school Association and the West Virginia State Fair at Wheeling, the metings were a decided success, much interest being manifested throughout, resulting in thirty-six additions, twenty-seven of which were by immersion. This meeting was a source of great strength to the congregation, leaving our plea more firmly and favorably established in this community and building the church up to where they can hope for still greater things in the future.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon sends the following letter from Looag, Philippine Islands: "Loaag Station Itocos Notre, P. I., has come through the storms of July which have been unusually severe—with the following report: 1,016 medical treatments; twelve surgical operations; forty-one surgical treattwelve visits in city. It has been almost impossible to reach other towns, owing to excessive rains,—our city being surrounded by rivers it is an exceedingly difficult and dangerous undertaking to attempt crossing, so we have had to confine our work to a limited area. In the evangelistic department 266 sermons were given; 1,000 tracts distributed; 111 houses visited; 509 in Sunday-schools and eight baptisms recorded. One evangelist could not reach the monthly meeting and three churches not yet heard from. Last month 'San Roquin' was called on by the people to send rain and I fear he has over done the thing; roofs destroyed and much other damage done. We will have to ask this saint to not lay it on so heavy next time."

William Bayard Craig has returned from his vacation trip to California and resumed services at Lenox Avenue Church, New York. The services on September 24 were in line with the work of the Men and Religion Forward Movement. In the evening the missionary objective of the campaign was observed by an address an Foreign Missions, by A. L. Shelton, M. D., of Batang, Thibet. Dr. Shelton is home on furlough and has a wonderful story to tell of his mission work. His station is 260 miles overland from post office and is 14,000 feet above sea. The nearest doctor is 700 miles away. After a course in the Post Graduate Hospital, Dr. Shelton will return to Thibet.

A. D. Harmon, as announced in these columns last spring, closed his thirteen years' pastorate of First Church, St. Paul, September 24. The Tuesday evening following the congregation gave him and Mrs. Harmon a farewell reception. He will spend a few months on a farm near Cable, Wis., trying, as he says, "to rebuild my fallen arches." This figure of speech is quite as pertinent, no doubt, as it is striking. The St. Paul work through these years has been most difficult and no doubt the stress of the burden would make a man feel that the arches of his strength had been somewhat strained. After a rest, Mr. Harmon will travel in Europe and then be ready for another pastorate.

First Church, at Mishawaka, Ind., has extended a unanimous call to O. E. Tomes. The Mishawaka Church is to be congratulated on securing his services and it is felt that an impetus will be given to the work which will lead to the accomplishment of much good. Mr. Tomes graduated from Butler College, Ind., in 1904, and has since had charge of the churches at Englewood, Indianapolis; Ann Arbor, Mich.; and for the past three years of the church at Kalamazoo, Mich. For some time he was at the head of the state Christian Endeavor work in Indiana. While serving the Mishawaka Church he will take a course of training in Applied Christianity at the Chicago University, making his home in Mishawaka and spending a part of each week there. E. M. Barney, of Indianapolis, who has twice been pastor of the Mishawaka Church, and has endeared himself to the hearts of the people, has again been serving them and has assisted them in securing Mr. Tomes. At a recent congregational meeting, in recognition of the valuable services rendered by Mr. Barney, he was enthusiastically and unanimously elected pastor emeritus, an honor conferred on few preachers in the brotherhood.

The Movement is Moving

By the time these lines are being read the opening guns will be booming in the great Men and Religion Forward Movement campaign, in the city of Minneapolis. The following specialists have been employed by the movement, and among them several of our own workers:

Chas. Stelzle, Fred S. Goodman, W. E. Beiderwolf, A. M. Bruner, R. A. Waite, David Russell, J. A. Whitmore, I. J. Lansing, W. C. Pearce, W. R. Lane, Charles R. Drum, Fred B. Smith, Clarence A. Barbour, C. R. Scoville, John M. Dean, W. A. Brown, John Alexander, W. L. Binger and Raymond Robins.

It will be a matter of great satisfaction to those who are anticipating a campaign in their local communities to know that the above men have been secured to act as special representatives upon the field and are ready for the year's work. The central cities, for the most part, are thoroughly organized, and are pressing the campaign vigorously. In most of the campaign cities our people are in the fore-front. We are now solicitous that each of the Christian churches and the campaign centers shall find themselves in intimate vital coöperation with the work. It seems to us of utmost importance that men of our churches, in addition to our ministers, should attend the convention which occurs nearest to them, and while you may not be on any committee, your presence, counsel and coöperation will be of great value.

As soon as the conventions are far enough along so that their method of operation may explain more fully the nature of the eight day campaigns, we expect to put before you graphically, just how the campaigns are conducted. After months of earnest endeavor in the work of preparation the time has come for the real bedrock work of the Men and Religious Forward Movement. The need of such effort and of special emphasis upon a more vigorous type of Christian program for men and boys has been strongly emphasized in hundreds of our churches. Our people have allied themselves with local committees which have at once encouraged enlarged work and are now actually in the midst of revival. The conference at Silver Bay was attended by 318 leaders of Christian forces from ninety-seven different cities, representing nearly every province and state of the continent, and was so intense that many delegates expressed the conviction that it alone was worth the whole movement. Other training centers have also been giving large place to the plans. Lake Geneva, Estes Park, Lake Couchiching and Mt. Gretna have reported unusually strong meetings, all of which have been adding momentum to the call which is being sounded out for a renaissance in the masculine emphasis of Christian enterprises, and have also been presenting a program for permanent effort that is in advance of any hitherto proposed.

Brethren, this is no idle word but a strong admonition for our people who have not yet identified themselves with this movement. Every one of our churches should observe the program for Rally Day, which was originally set for September 24. If you have not already done so you should take the matter up at once. The church that puts most into this movement is bound to get the most out of it. As the campaign progresses, until three or four teams are at work simultaneously in different parts of the country, it will be very essential that our men everywhere are lined up with the movement.

If you have not already seen the literature, send twenty-five cents to the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ, 420 R. A. Long Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., and a packet will be sent to you.

Victory in Sight

The friends of Transylvania University are beginning to feel jubilant over the prospect of completing in the near future, the endowment campaign which has been in progress for nearly two years.

Of the $240,000 required, $225,000 has been subscribed thus far. However, three things must be considered: first, that practically all the subscriptions received with the express understanding that the entire $240,000 be raised; second, that the field has been canvassed closely, much of it again and again, until few prospects remain; third, that but little time remains in which to secure the remaining $15,000. "All or none" has been our slogan.

It would be humiliating in the last degree to those who are especially interested in Transylvania, and anything but creditable to the Disciples, for disaster to come at this juncture. Let all who are willing to make a subscription of $50 or more, payable, without interest, on or before June 1, 1916, write me to that effect at once.

Lexington, Ky. R. H. CROSSFIELD,
President Transylvania University.

Hiram College

With an enrollment in excess of the expectations of those at the head of the college work, Hiram began a new year Tuesday, September 19, for the first time in her history strictly as a college institution, the move of the trustees abolishing the academic department taking effect with the opening of this school year. Universal satisfaction is heard over the results so far apparent from the inovation and a most promising year as well as future for our Western Reserve institution of learning is anticipated.

Sunday, September 24, President Miner L. Bates delivered the annual convocation sermon, which was an eloquent presentation of the value of thought to give men liberty. The discourse was scholarly and heard by a large and appreciative audience.

A number of improvements have been made to the college buildings during the summer including work on the girl's dormitories which will make them more attractive and comfortable. A new laboratory has been added to the college building which will be utilized especially for the advanced courses in science, including an additional year to the course in chemistry.

Wisconsin News.

The Wisconsin Christian Missionary Association held its forty-eighth anual convention at the First Church, Milwaukee, September 14-17. The attendance was the largest in the history of the association and in some other respects there was evidence of decided advancement. All were delighted to have with us Mrs. Atwater, C. C. Smith, Austin Hunter, Vaughan Dabney, J. H. Garrison, B. M. Hopkins, from without the state with us. The program in all respects was good and the deliberations most helpful. Reports from all departments show a most helpful condition. Every one unites in declaring the past year the best in the history of the work of the state. We give a few items from the report of the corresponding secretary: Places visited, some a number of times, thirty-six; revivals held, five; baptisms, eighty-eight; other accessions, fifty-four; sermons and special addresses, 175; ministers located, five; churche organized, three; buildings dedicated, two; revival meetings arranged for, other than held by himself, six; issues of Wisconsin Christian Monthly edited, published and mailed money raised in state for state work, $1,964.48; places assisted in regular work, nine, in evangelistic work, four; individuals supported, nine; baptisms by missionary pastors, 114; otherwise, ninety; number of days service, 779; sermons preached, 346.

Perhaps the most important feature of the past year's work was the actual net gain in the membership of the churches of 33.63 per cent. We wonder if this isn't a record. Wisconsin has caught a vision of larger things. Larger plans have been laid and loftier aims established for next year. Hereafter there will be two sets of officers made possible by amendment of the constitution. The convention of officers for next year are: President, Mark Wayne Williams, Milwaukee; vice-president, P. Sig. Stone, Rib Lake; secretary, I. H. Beckholt, Viroqua. The board of directors, who are to elect their own officers, are: President, J. C. Thurman, Green Bay; vice-president, J. H. Fisher, Evansville; recording secretary, J. H. Bullock, Richland Center; treasurer, Rupert A. Nourse, Milwaukee; corresponding secretary, Frank L. Van Voorhis, Green Bay; J. O. Klapp, I. W. Davis, additional members. The next convention will be held at Footville, September 12-15, 1912. The brethren of Milwaukee cared splendidly for the convention, both churches participating. FRANK L. VAN VOORHIS.

Milwaukee First Church Celebrates.

First Church, Milwaukee, Wis., celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary in quite an elaborate series of exercises. On one Sunday Dr. J. H. Garrison, of St. Louis, and C. C. Smith, who was the first pastor of the church. Meetings of various kinds were held during the week. On the following Sunday the pastor, C. C. Wilson, preached in the morning and C. C. Morrison, of The Christian Century, spoke in the evening on "The Ideals of the Disciples of Christ," to a union meeting of four congregations in the Hanover Street Congregational Church. There is a fine spirit of unity among the churches of the south side of Milwaukee, where First Church is situated. The very bigness and urgency of their common problem in that environment draws the people of God together. It is a rather unusual thing for the ideals of the Disciples to be made the theme of an address at a union meeting, but it was felt by Mr. Wilson that such an interpretation of our historic purposes could be made as would lead to a better understanding and yet more complete co-operation among the churches of that community. The pastor of First Church stands high in the city. He is thoughtful, deeply in earnest, conservative, and modern in his interests. His people are loyal and united, and the best days of church are before it.

National Benevolent Asssociation Activities.

After much delay the organization of our Northwestern forces has been satisfactorily completed. This means that the work at Walla Walla, Wash., will now be pushed vigorously. There is a great need for enlargement of the association's work in the northwest. Many aged brethren are waiting for the promised needed comfort of the home at Walla Walla. With an efficient organization and the hearty support of all the churches in the northwest, the long-felt need in that great empire can and will be supplied to the joy and satisfaction of all.

The annual meeting of the Christian Orphans' Home, St. Louis, will be held at the Home Tuesday, October 2 This is the time for the election of officers. All members, those who have contributed $1 a year or more, are invited to be present and participate in the proceedings. They will enjoy the annual report, for the year has been one of unequalled fruitfulness.

Mrs. Oreon E. Scott, the president of the Board of the Christian Orphans Home, has returned after an all summer's vacation. She went away with badly injured health. Her home-coming brings with it an added pleasure because she comes back with improved health. She has devoted herself unsparingly to the Orphans' Home.

The following named persons are the only authorized representatives of the association: J. D. Dillard, Missouri; J. W. Strawn, Oklahoma, Kansas and Nebraska; A. J. Bush, Texas; E. T. C. Bennett, Iowa; Fred Kline, Illinois; M. Gunn, Ohio; and J. P. Davis, Indiana. These, with the accredited vice-presidents of the local churches, where appointed, are prepared to show certificates of appointment bearing the seal of the corporation. The same is true of the field men. When in doubt ask for the certificate. Money not sent through the vice-presidents or field men should be sent directly to the general office, 2955 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis.

Notes From the Foreign Society

Doctor Drummond writes that in the month of August he treated nine hundred and seventy-five out-patients. The total attendance at the dispensary was two thousand and seventy-nine. The lack of rain has made it possible for people to come in from the villages, and there are many villages among the patients. One day two women brought a child for treatment. They said, "Oh, please give medicine that this child may soon recover. We have been three days getting here with it." A man came the other day from a town one hundred and fifty miles distant. He said that I had saved the life of a friend of his and he wanted to bring another friend here for treatment."

In India the summer has been dry. The outlook for the crop is not encouraging. Recently the rains have been good, but the report is that these rains are local. In some districts there is an abundance while in others scarcely any. The lack of rain has caused sickness. Plague has broken out in a town sixty miles from Harda.

In India several men are asking for baptism. They say that in becoming Christians they will be ostracized from their people and unable to earn their own living. They say: "Give us something to do, anything by which we may earn our bread." A tract of land that would accommodate five thousand people can be purchased for $25,000. The mission believes if it had such a tract of land where the Christians could be offered self-support, it would be filled with Christian families within five years.

C. E. Robinson of Japan reports that a ministerial student of Sendai was recently drowned. He was the most faithful worker in the Sendai church. He leaves a widowed mother. A promising student preacher has been stricken down by tuberculosis. The greatest need of the mission is faithful Japanese workers.

There were three baptisms in the Sendai district during the month of August. One of the Japanese pastors has come to America. He expects to attend school for a few years and then work among his own people.

Mrs. Fred E. Hagin reports one baptism at Hongo, Japan.

Miss Kate Johnson announces one baptism Lord's Day, August 27, in Tokyo, the result of the work in Sendai. She says that it was the hottest summer they have had in Tokyo in many years.

O. J. Grainger and family have started back to India. Their furlough was of the greatest benefit to them. They feel because of their experiences while at home they are better fitted than ever for their work in India. They know the brotherhood better and are in closer touch with the executive committee.

Herbert Smith of Lotumbe, Africa writes, "We are not in our new house yet. We shall be glad to get there, of course, but the mud house has never worried us very much. It has many inconveniences, we know, but since it was the best we could have we have no need to complain. We get jiggers in our toes, but then it is some fun getting them out, especially when you think your toe is coming off. Brother Hedges is about ready to put the roof on the new house. If he keeps well it will not be long before we are living with boards beneath our feet again. I am very glad to report that the work of the whole African mission is doing very well at present. "It is wonderful what the gospel is doing here. Of course, we cannot talk of nationai movements as in China, Japan and India, because the African people is divided and subdivided. If the Congo people were united, the Belgian state would not be here for one month. They would drive the Belgians into the sea. At present the state is not trying to do anything for the people. It is content with collecting taxes and keeping the peace. The state is not a teacher in any way whatever."

A. F. Hensey writes: "Our evangelists are doing the finest work we have ever seen done by native preachers. At the last conference they brought in over three hundred people with them. The outposts need visiting very badly, but in the absence of Mr. Moon and the departure of Mr. Wilson, I cannot hope to go, so tomorrow two of the elders of the church leave for a three week's visit to all the outposts. A week ago two more left to visit those in the Monieka district. We are sending with them two good men to open the work in an important town up there, and one goes with the Bolenge elders to begin an outstation at Ilanga. Last night we had one of the best meetings of the native church we have had for months. The Christians report visits that they had made to nearby towns and a number of backsliders wish to return to their Lord."

H. C. Saum reports six baptisms at Bilaspur, India. The evangelists are taking a good degree of interest in their work.

The missionary year closes the last day of September. In a few days it will be known how much money has been received. The annual report will be published about the first of November. That will give full and detailed accounts of the work.

R. A. Long to Make Brotherhood Tour.

During the month of October Mr. R. A. Long, President of the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ, has determined to visit our centers of influence and address our people upon the subject of the Brotherhood. He will be accompanied on the tour by various directors of the Brotherhood Movement and one of its secretaries. In recent years since Mr. Long became prominent among our people he has been compelled to decline many invitations to make addresses before our churches, men's organizations, and various groups of people. These declinations were made necessary by the execution of his large business enterprises, but seeing the necessity at this time of a more determined advance in the affairs of men in the church, Mr. Long has arranged his business affairs so that he can devote the entire month of October to this tour.

Already announcements have been issued covering a number of the points and the matter of his visit has been undertaken with our people in all of the various cities looking toward a consummation of arrangements for both afternoon and evening meetings. It is understood that the afternoon meetings will be for both men and women, to be addressed by specialists upon men's work and women's work in the church, and will be largely of the educational sort. Suppers or banquets will be held for men at the evening dinner hour at some convenient point where the greatest possible company of men can be assembled and served. It is also probable that a representative of the Christian Women's Board of Missions will address each of the meetings upon the subject of the C. W. B. M. and its early days.

While on the Pacific Coast this summer Mr. Long had occasion to attend several conventions of our people besides the Portland Convention, among them the Northern and Southern California Conventions. He later visited some of the churches along the coast and spoke to gatherings of our church men at various points, notably at Long Beach, San Diego, and Francisco. In speaking of Mr. Long's appearance, one of our San Francisco ministers said: "We have been blessed with many great meetings on the coast this year and we have had many noted speakers among us, but no meeting and no speaker brought a greater up-lift to our work than the Brotherhood meeting in San Francisco on last Tuesday night and the National President of our Men's Brotherhood, Mr. R. A. Long. There were five men from my church present and if we could have had five times as many the church would have received five times the enthusiasm, for each one of these men brought back all he could hold. It would be impossible for any man to go through that meeting without being possessed with the determination to do 'a man's work in a man's way.' Mr. R. A. Long is today the most conspicuous man in the ranks of the Disciple Movement and yet absolutely modest and unassuming. He started his business career with two fixed principles; first, to make money and make it honestly; second, to give his money and give it wisely. He has been a great success in both particulars; he gives probably more time to the giving away of his vast wealth than he has to the accumulation of it. God has given to him wonderful opportunities for service and he has grasped them with a mighty grip. Power and wealth have only served to strengthen the desire for effective stewardship."

One man sometimes may uplift a nation and this man in whose possession mingles both wealth and consecration to mighty achievements will lead our men to a new sense of stewardship if only we may supply him with the kind of audiences he seeks.

The suggestive dates and cities to be visited by Mr. Long and party are as follows:

Wednesday, October 4, Parsons; Friday, October 6, Wichita; Saturday, October 7, Topeka; Monday October 9, Kansas City; Tuesday, October 10, Joplin; Thursday, October 12, St. Louis; Monday, October 16, Springfield, Ill.; Tuesday, October 17, Bloomington; Wednesday, October 18, Indianapolis; Friday, October 20, Louisville; Saturday, October 21, Lexington; Monday, October 23, Cincinnati; Tuesday, October 24, Cleveland; Wednesday, October 25, Pittsburg; Thursday, Oct. 26, Buffalo; Monday, October 30, Cedar Rapids; Tuesday, October 31, Des Moines; Wednesday, November 1, Omaha; Thursday, November 2, Lincoln.

The New England Convention.

On Sunday evening, September 17, at the Main Street Church in Worcester, Mass., the benediction fell upon a crowded assembly and what is unanimously proclaimed as "the best New England convention in many years" came to an end. Meeting in this historic church, which from the beginning has been in the forefront of our work in the East, in which a spirit of highminded loyalty to the Disciples plea has been blended with a richness of culture rare among our people, East or West, the entire convention was pitched upon a dignified plane.

The programs were tastefully printed, and the sessions were not over-crowded with speeches. Suitable music was provided. The singing was spiritual. The hymns were not not of the "dickey bird" order, but were the great moving psalm-like songs of the soul. The Gloria in Excelsis was used throughout, and the effect of this best of all our hymnals was marked throughout the convention. To one whose ear has been jaded by the cheap swinging and galloping songs so frequently heard in our conventions, the contrast was heartening. The spirit of the convention was good.

The speeches were uniformly well prepared, and were delivered on time, to expectant audiences. It was remarked by the president, Rev. E. J. Teagarden, that of the speakers who accepted places not one failed to appear, to begin on time, and to close within the limits assigned to him. But two changes in the programme were made, to allow Dr. Albert L. Shelton, of the mission at Batang, W. China, to be heard. He was secured by the committee too late to have his name appear. W. A. Parker's Saturday night Biblical Study lecture was shifted to the Sunday-school hour of Sunday morning, and President Teagarden who was to have preached the convention sermon gave way, that the two addresses of Doctor Shelton might be heard.

Some of the addresses were notable. That of W. R. Mains, the minister at Haverhill, Mass., on "Prayer and Life," was a masterful exposition deserving an abiding place in our literature. The address of Mrs. Effie Cunningham, of Indianapolis, at the women's session was strong and inspiring. The three addresses by Lowell C. McPherson, the newly elected superintendent of missions and New England evangelist, confirmed in all minds the wisdom of the committee who chose him to direct the work of this section. Friday evening's two addresses by L. N. D. Wells, of East Orange, N. J., who spoke for the Foreign Society, and M. L. Pontius of the Graduate School of Yale University, reached high water mark. The former especially in view of his theme, found a notable response to his message. The address of Mr. Pontius was more deliberate, but was strongly spoken and impressive. J. W. Robbins, of Swampscott, dealt with the aspects of the Unity question with great clearness and forcefulness. Loren B. Sanford spoke humorously and seriously of the problems of the small city church, an utterance that will be remembered as a classic. H. S. Conant of the Massachusetts Sunday-school Association talked with a readiness that reminded his hearers of Herbert Moninger or W. C. Pearse of the work of the Bible-school in this day of graded lessons and modern organization. W. C. Crerie, of the Highland Church, in Worcester, delivered an uplifting message. G. A. Reinl spoke Saturday evening of "The Modern Minister's Message" with a modern minister's insight, and with a prophet's faith and power. He united a rare mysticism with straightforward practicalness. Sunday afternoon's session listened to a great address and appeal upon the general subject of "Christian Benevolence," by the eloquent secretary of the National Benevolent Association, James H. Mohorter. His advocacy of the restoration of the grace of giving to its rightful place among the graces professed by an Apostolic people moved the assembly mightily. His former residence in New England, his acquaintance with New England people and problems gave him the open sesame to all hearts from the beginning. His influence was a blessing to the convention throughout.

It is no injustice to all others to say, however, that the climax of interest in the convention centered in the story of Dr. Albert L. Shelton, the robust, boyish, mild-voiced missionary doctor who has brought back from Thibet the most wonderful story of missionary conquest ever told among our people. His address on Saturday evening, flashing with humor, ignoring the hardships

The Best

Did you know that the Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 will be in The Life of Christ? That means that you will want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition is now being prepared to meet the great demand expected this fall. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

that discerning hearers supplied between the lines, relating the conditions of life which must be shared with this primitive, inland, godless people if they are to be won to Christianity, was by turns the theme of laughter and of tears. His Sunday morning address as the main service, following the communion, which began with a description of the little group of missionaries that met for years, three, then four, then five to celebrate the Lord's Supper in that far away place in the top of the world released the flood gates of feeling in the hearts of all. His accounts of the cures performed, which he ascribed with childlike faith to the interposition of God; their effect upon the people; the friendships he has formed with heathen men of high and low degree; his account of the tragic death of Dr. Z. S. Loftis, and of the gloom it cast over the missionaries and their work; and the story of the heroism of the women and children of the missionary homes created an impression that can never be forgotten. The worthy president of the convention but uttered the sentiment of all hearts when he pledged the New England churches to greater zeal than ever before, in the support of the misisonary work of the Foreign Society in China, and India, and Africa, and wherever its workers may go.

The executive board was practically all re-elected for the coming year.

One feature adopted by the convention which promises much if continued, was the setting apart of several hours during the sessions for the devotional study of the Bible. The writer was honored by being heard in four lecture studies, which dealt with "The Missionary Psalms," "The Missionary Prophets," "The Book of Acts," and a general address entitled "Biblical Study and Religious Life." The reverent hearing accorded them augurs well for the profitable continuation of this feature of our conventions.

Rev. Harry Minnick is a splendid host. His great church is standing loyally behind a building enterprise that promises to more than double the size and efficiency of the present structure. A great future is at hand for the work in Worcester. A spirit of hopefulness prevails throughout the churches of this section.

New York City Notes.

The Disciples of Christ in Greater New York took the new Borough Park Church by storm Tuesday evening, September 19. A mass meeting of the Disciples Missionary Union had been arranged with an interesting program, but we were not expecting as large a delegation from the other churches in the city, or as enthusiastic a gathering. It demonstrated the fact, the New York Disciples are as wide awake, as keenly interested in the progress of the work, and respond with as great interest and enthusiasm to the call for service as can be found anywhere. We are apreciating the stupendous task before us and by the grace of God will be found doing what we can to discharge it.

The program was arranged in view of the work just started at the Borough Park Church. The superintendent of city missions gave to this church a word of welcome to the fellowship of the churches of Christ, which was responded to by Fred S. Nichols, their minister. M. M. Ammunson gave a most instructive and appropriate address on "The Program of the Disciples of Christ." Dr. W. Bayard Craig gave an inspiring report of the Portland Convention. The church greatly appreciated the meeting and enters with greater interest upon their new program.

With the starting of this new work, we have in Greater New York, six missions and five self-supporting churches. This truly indicated life, and suggests what ought to be the program of the Disciples of Christ in this great city, with its nearly five million souls, if it is taken for Christ. We are no longer a "feeble folk" and cannot now excuse ourselves from entering the greater fields and assuming the more difficult task for the redemption of our country.

"Christian Unity Foundation, Study Number One, Disciples of Christ" is the title of a little booklet of twenty-four pages that should be read by every Disciple. Rev. Arthur Lowndes, D. D., secretary of the Christian Unity Foundation is the author. The most interesting and refreshing fact is the clear, concise statement of the origin, growth and message of the Disciples of Christ. We are impressed with the fact, if we all work as faithfully to discover the truth, emphasize the truths accepted in common, the dissension among Christians would largely pass away. The evangelization of the cities waits for a united church.

The Russian classes in English have opened with good interest. Twenty-six men are thus far enrolled. The most practical Christian service is helping to solve the "alien" problem. This work could be entered upon in any city where groups of foreigners are found. Such work attended to by the young people of your church would prove a blessing.

The ministers of all our churches have returned from their vacation and taken up their work for the fall and winter. They are the most optimistic that you could find anywhere. They have a message, they believe, and are determined to preach it. New York City will yet know the Disciples of Christ.

If any are coming to the city, and will write me, I wil send them a list of all our churches, so they can be found in their places at the church on the Lord's Day.

Bethany Graded Lessons

Charles Clayton Morrison, Editor

Now Cover the Entire Sunday-School

As the Bethany Graded Lessons unfold from quarter to quarter it becomes increasingly plain to informed and discerning Sunday-school teachers, superintendents and workers that no private or sectarian publishing house can compete successfully with the great union enterprise supplying these graded lessons to twelve leading denominations.

[The Graded Lessons are approaching completion. The Beginners' and Primary Departments are fully completed. Three of the four Junior grades are complete. Fourth year Junior pupils may use either third year Junior lessons or first year Intermediate. Two of the four Intermediate grades are complete, and these materials may be used for the entire Intermediate Department. For Senior and Adult Departments, Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus" is provided. Other Adult classes may use Dr. Strong's "The Gospel of the Kingdom."]

The Bethany Lessons surpass all others—absolutely—in every particular in which it is important for lesson helps to excel: In mechanical get-up, in chaste and fascinating art work, in practical adaptableness to the needs of both teacher and pupil, in sound evangelical and scriptural teaching, in rich spiritual insight. Nothing has been left undone that money, intelligence and Christian character could do to make these lessons the acme of excellence for the Sunday School.

EVERY LESSON WRITER IS A RECOGNIZED AUTHORITY IN THE INTERDENOMINATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL WORLD!

Demonstration of Christian Unity

Perhaps nothing has been done in modern times to demonstrate so clearly the essential unity of the churches and the possibility of organic union than the successful carrying through of this great enterprise of an interdenominational series of Sunday-school lessons. There has been no serious conflict among the editors representing a dozen denominations, among them Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. If the churches can unite in what they teach their children, who can doubt that co-operation and union is possible at every other point?

The Bethany Lessons thus afford a signal opportunity for the Sunday Schools of the Disciples to promote Christian Union.

The Significance of Jesus

It cannot be doubted that Jesus is the most conspicuous personality in history. From him in both directions all the records of occidental life take their way. No influences have been so potent for the shaping of convictions and the organization of institutions as those he released.

Into human society at the moment of its most climacteric social and political experience he entered as almost the least impressive of its factors, and there are daily proofs that he is rapidly on the way to its complete mastery. His word possesses a power it never had before. His teachings dominate increasingly wider circles. His disclosure of ethical and religious values is taken with growing seriousness. His revelation of God becomes convincing and authoritative to groups never before moved by religious ideals.

These facts are the more remarkable in view of the radical changes that have occurred in the church's thought of Jesus during recent years. No greater revolution has taken place in the history of Christian thought than that which relates to the person of Christ.

The Jewish Christian church, which inherited the older Hebraic hope of a coming deliverer, seized upon the phrases and interests of the Messianic expectation, and applied them to Jesus. And the church has gone on through the centuries under the spell of this partial and material ambition of the Jewish community.

The early Christian society laid eager stress upon the Master's works of power. And though it gave them only a subordinate and comparatively unimportant place in his program for the world, it furnished the suggestion which later centuries of teaching have developed into a dogma of the supernatural, unearthly Christ, whose life was manifested in continuous miracle, and whose efficiency was demonstrated by marvel.

Catching at the words of adoration in which the first disciples poured out their love and reverence for the Savior, the Church has elaborated definitions so metaphysical and titles so mysterious as at once to rob Jesus of all human values, and to plunge spiritual religion into that very abyss of polytheism from which it was the task of the great prophets and of Jesus to rescue it.

And belief in these definitions and categories men call faith, as if the rich life of God to the world by the Master could be cabined in terms of metaphysic and speculation!

The results of this tendency to imprison Jesus in the realm of intellectual interests are easily perceived. He is lifted quite out of the normal life of human experience, and is made a supernormal, unreal and ineffectual being. He is divested of the qualities which give him value for the winning of character, and is removed to a cloudland of theology where he touches but remotely the lives of the men and women who most need his aid.

Further than this, religion is warped from life to dogma, ritual and organization, and the Church is robbed of its vitality and power. In consequence, Christianity is not taken to be a necessary and worthful possession, and its great ideas are doubted accordingly. The God of whom its appears to speak is given the estate of one who is concerned with second-rate things. A religion that gives the impression that it is mainly related to trivial matters easily acquires the reputation of believing in a trivial God. And beyond this point it can hardly go on its downward way.

What then has the Church to say about Jesus? What are the vital elements of its faith in him? If it is not to exhaust itself in affirmations of a secondary character—such as his fulfilment of Old Testament prophecy, his realization of Jewish Messianic hopes, his supernatural birth and ministry, his procurement of human salvation by mysterious, not to say magical, means, and his transcendental and metaphysical nature, all of which might be true without having special significance for human life—then what is to be the great affirmation of the Church as to his character and service?

The positive significance of Jesus finds expression, in part at least, in something like the following terms:

He is the heart and the hope of humanity. All its best anticipations for personal life and social enthusiasm find realization in him. All that the prophets hoped for in a better and more ideal humanity, all that bards and seers of non-Hebrew peoples yearned to see of personal nobility and public service, all that philosophy strove to attain by earnest effort and religion sought to realize by the aid of the divine, Jesus brought to expression in personal holiness and in a program of universal good.

He is the revealer of God. In himself were disclosed the qualities of love and righteousness which—as he made men understand—are the essence of the life of God. And he made God real to men by awakening in them a love for the things the Father loves, and a passion to perform the work of adjustment and service in which the Father has evermore been active. By vitrue of this disclosure of the life of God he vindicated his right to be called the Son of God, for the true son is the manifestation of the father's character and purpose.

He is the interpreter of life. He spoke of his plan of living as the Way, the method by which completeness of life could be attained. He meant by this that whoever would take his point of view, adopt his attitude toward God, toward man and toward the universe could not fail of success. He did not ask men to accept some set of definitions which he formulated, nor to conform to a list of duties which he sanctioned. Rather he disclosed the realities of being, in harmony with which life comes to its noblest estate. The principles he announced and illustrated are basic and fundamental, as self-demonstrating as the laws of perspective or the rules of mathematics.

And the proof that they are fundamental and final is that they actually work when tried. This is the ground of the new appeal of Christianity. The old intellectual objections, the academic difficulties raised against the program of Jesus, have no longer the slightest validity. Our generation brings all things to the test of experience, and here the claims of our Lord are completely vindicated.

The first friends of the Master insisted that this would be true. They said that whoever tried his plan with serious purpose would know. The choice spirits of the ages have said the same. But the modern man, taking nothing for granted, makes trial for himself and finds it completely true. If any one today is still unconvinced, he simply has not tried the great experiment, or he has missed the point of emphasis.

And more than this, every claim for Jesus made by the historic Church is now seen to be true. Some of these claims were unimportant and secondary, but at base they are valid. He is the fulfilment of prophecy, when studied at its highest level. He is the Messiah, in virtue of the fact that no other term in the Jewish vocabulary was large enough to suggest even a fragment of his purpose. He is supernatural, not merely because of miracle in his life, but by reason of his complete harmony with the divine order in the universe, in which God is eternally realizing his gracious ideals. He is the atonement of humanity, because he proclaims and illustrates the complete harmonization of the human and the divine as possible for all men. He is the final authority in the realm of religion, not by reason of arbitrary command over the mind and conscience, but because of his revelation of the intimate truths of being. Like the pilot, the physician, the artist, he has authority because he knows.

His call is to himself, to his ideals, his way of living, his program and his service for the world. And this call has all the authority of a divine imperative, because it is fundamental to happiness, efficiency and the achievement of life.

He is the Son of God, in the fullest sense of which human thought or language is capable of conception or expression. But there is a title even higher than this—the Son of Man. That title expresses the completeness of his human experience, the closeness of his relation with us, the ideal, representative character of his humanity, and the reality of his ability to understand and assist the least of his brothers. It is the title he loved and used. Beyond all others it reveals his significance and his redemptive service. It is the badge of his final and atoning work.

Social Survey

The "Liberte" and the "Maine"

Because of the investigation of the causes of the destruction of the battleship "Maine," search for the causes which led to the recent "Liberté" disaster in French waters is of peculiar interest to Americans. The opinion has been put forward in France that there was an explosion of what is known as "B" powder in the magazines. There is also suspicion that the explosion was the result of a plot, since fire was discovered on the battleship "La Petrie" simultaneously with that on the "Liberté." There is no doubt, however, that the vessel was destroyed from internal causes. An examination of its hull seems to confirm the opinion that the "Maine" was destroyed by a mine from without. The effects of the destructive force upon the French and United States vessels are wholly different. The bottom and sides of the French vessel were blown outward and her destruction was practically complete. The bottom of the "Maine" is pushed inward, and, while the force of the explosion was sufficient to wreck the vessel it did not destroy every part of it as in the case of the recent accident. Expert opinion that the catastrophe to the "Liberté" is traceable to ignition of "B" powder is the cause of alarm in naval circles. It is recalled that a half dozen other vessels have been destroyed by the explosion of this powder without apparent cause. For several years it has been known that "B" powder deteriorates with age and becomes so explosive that it will ignite spontaneously. Its use, therefore, is highly dangerous upon war vessels in which it must be stored in large quantities. Either some new explosive of equal efficiency must be found, or the unused powder in the magazines must be entirely replaced at regular intervals. The expense incident to the latter course would increase the already enormous cost of the navy, but something should be done to prevent wholesale destruction of human life.

A New Identification Science

Until recently the use of finger prints as a means of identification was never heard of except in novels and in the laboratories of experimental biologists like Galton. Distrust of the accuracy of this means of identification was so great that little credence was given such evidence in criminal court procedure. Not long ago, however, a criminal was convicted in New York City, on the sole evidence of a finger print. Objection by counsel was made on the ground that such evidence was irrelevant, but when finally convicted the prisoner broke down and confessed the crime. In the Dietetic and Hygienic Gazette (New York) we read: "The expert witness who demonstrated the evidential value of finger-prints at this trial was Lieutenant Faurot, who heads the Identification Bureau of the New York City Police Department. In demonstration Lieutenant Faurot introduced in evidence the photographs of twins. The front and profiles of the two were remarkably alike, as were also their Bertillon measurements; these measurements and photographs being passed around to the jury, they all (so it is reported) admitted they could not tell which was which. Lieutenant Faurot then demonstrated by means of their finger-prints how simple a matter it was to tell these twins apart. Further testimony of great scientific and practical interest was given by this admirable expert. Since the finger-print system of identification was introduced in the United States he has taken 65,000 impressions. This method is relied on when photographs and the Bertillon measurements fail. Apart from criminal proceedings: At least one railroad now uses this system as a means of identifying employés. Banks now identify foreigners in this way. Some of the government employés in the Canal Zone are paid by means of this system, as are also the Indians, who can not write their names. One may conceive here a veritable revolution in civilized transactions; for example, the substitution on behalf of people who can not write their names, of the finger print for 'his mark' on documents. About a month before Galton died the finger-print method was temporarily (and for the first time) successfully controverted in an English police court: A man was charged on suspicion with having been found loitering, supposedly in order to commit a felony. A previous conviction was sought to be established against him by the production from the police records of finger-prints, these being pronounced identical with his. He, however, handed in papers showing that he was serving in the army at the time of the alleged conviction, whereupon he was promptly discharged. . . . . A week later it was ascertained and proved beyond peradventure that this prisoner had stolen the army papers from another man; what is more, it was shown clearly by other marks of identification (as well as by his handwriting) that here was indubitably the man to whom the police had referred. . . . .Galton published his 'Finger-prints' in 1892, and soon afterward his "Index of Finger-prints.' He claimed that the chance of the finger-prints of two individuals being identical is less than one in sixty-four billions—a margin safe enough for the most careful of judicial procedures. If, therefore, two such prints are compared and found to be identical, nothing human can be more reasonable than that they are the prints of the same person; if they are not identical they must surely belong to different people. The chance of error is here infinitesimal; and such chance is still further eliminated if prints of three or more fingers are taken. The only requisite seems to be that the prints be taken clearly enough to bring out all the lines. It is considered that these lines and prints are more enduring than any other mark of the body; they do not vary from youth to age; they persist even after death, at least until decomposition has set in. Injuries alone change them; but a cut would be an added identification."

Europe's Three-Cornered Puzzle

Over-zealous newspaper correspondents and the severity of the censors of both Italy and Turkey have combined to produce as confusing and conflicting a mass of reports of the conquest of Tripoli, as was thrust upon the public in the beginning of the Spanish-American War. Dispatches were received telling of the bombardment and capture of the port of Tripoli before a gun was fired. But from the best information obtainable it appears that the port has now been taken by the Italians after the destruction of several Turkish war vessels, and the capture of the ancient and practically defenseless fortifications, the latter probably taken by a hand-to-hand struggle. But what puzzles Americans most is, why did Europe allow Italy so free a hand in this domain while the occupation of Morocco, in northwestern Africa almost precipitated Germany and France into a war which undoubtedly would have involved other powers. Perhaps this answer may be summed up in the words of the Outlook: "Italy would hardly have taken the step without such consent [of the powers.] The consent of England and France, if it has been secured, was doubtless due to the conviction that the Italian would be a better neighbor for the Egyptian on the one side, or the Tunisian on the other, that is the present native with his power to stir nationalistic aspirations. The consent of Austria and Germany was doubtless secured by the conviction that, with Italy busy in Africa, Austria could more easily prepare Albania for the time when she can absorb it, and Germany could more easily influence the world to acquiesce in her dreams of larger colonial empire, the desire for which might even suggest to Italy that, as she would snatch Tripoli from Turkey, so one day Germany might snatch Tripoli from her!" The Outlook's editor feels that should Italy deprive Turkey of Tripoli, Turkey will in turn seize some part of Greece, for it will be necessary for the Young Turks to do something to redeem themselves if they hope to remain in power. But Italy has not been left to treat with Turkey entirely as she might desire. Austria is said to have warned Italy officially that if the conflict is carried into Albania she will regard it as an unfriendly measure, and will accordingly dispatch war vessels to that quarter. Russia is represented as even more aggressive, in announcing that she will take drastic action if the conflict is carried outside of Tripoli. Italy so far has been as tactful in diplomacy in keeping off the toes of the other powers as she was artful in strategy in declaring war at an opportune moment when she could take full advantage of Turkey's unpreparedness. This tact continued probably will prevent complications, while a misstep on her part may throw the delicate mechanism of European peace into the confusion of a widespread conflict.

One decided advantage of the modern immense floating palaces called ocean liners over the small steamships in which all passengers were carried a generation ago was shown recently when the Olympic of the White Star line received a terrific blow in a collision with a British man-of-war. While a great hole was torn in the Olympic's side, the ship is said to have scarcely felt the shock, and the number and size of the compartments insured her against the fate of a smaller vessel, which would have quickly gone to the bottom. The man-of-war was more seriously damaged than the vessel of commerce.

Father Phelan's Opinion of the Liquor Business

Father Phelan, editor of The Western Watchman, uses plain words when he writes about the liquor traffic. Here is a paragraph from his paper:

"We must be candid with those gentlemen. And candor compels us to tell them that they are the most despised class of men in this state and in every state in the Union. Their business is disreputable and they are thoroughly disreputable themselves. For a half century the people have been devising means of getting rid of them. The saloon is a pitfall for the weak and a rendezvous for criminals. The saloon men have fostered crime and criminals from the day the first saloon was opened. It is regarded as disreputable to go into a saloon. It serves every base purpose and can not serve any good purpose."

The Motive of Catholic Schools.

"Now, if the curriculum and method of these (parochial) schools are practically the same as those of the public school, why do a people who are by no means wealthy choose voluntarily to assume the onerous burden of establishing and maintaining them?" A writer in the Catholic World, Michael Henry Lucey, answers this question with the words of Mr. Lavelle, Rector of St. Patrick's Cathedral:

The Catholic schools are supported by a large body of earnest, sincere, God-fearing men, who believe in their faith as they do in their life; who are anxious to see their faith stamped indelibly upon their children; who fear that this faith and all faiths are liable to be weakened, if not lost, by an education purely secular; and who are convinced that by making this sacrifice of double taxation they are doing the best possible service for the welfare of religion and morality, and, at the same time, for the honor, exaltation and solidifying of those institutions, whose symbol is the royal red, the lily white, and the azure blue of the Stars and Stripes. Why do they believe this? They dread, on principle, the education of the head without the heart. They see more vice than there should be about them, in high places and low—drunkenness, licentiousness, dishonesty, hate, with all its revolting sequels—divorce, disloyalty, anarchism, faithlessness to trusts.

A Catholic Social Worker.

Certain writers and speakers have appointed themselves a publicity committee to keep the world informed of the failure of the church to meet its social responsibilities. It is proper for religious periodicals to tell what men of faith are doing to adapt religious institutions to the needs of the age. Protestant and Catholic will take pleasure in reading the tribute of Edward T. Devine, editor of The Survey, to William J. White:

Social workers of every faith pay eager homage to the memory of their fellow-worker, the Very Rev. Dr. Mgr. William J. White, supervisor of Catholic Charities of Brooklyn, who died on August 29, as he was completing the forty-first year of his age. Dr. White, he has usually been to us, though we took our full share of satisfaction in the rank conferred upon him by Pope Leo for his success in the supervision of the charities of Brooklyn. More completely than almost any other man he embodied for us the rapprochement between the eternal religious tradition, and the new social spirit of our own age. Of his loyalty and devotion to the Catholic Church others may more appropriately testify, though it never occurred to any of us to question it. Of his loyalty and devotion to the ideals of modern philanthropy as they are held in common by Jew and Gentile, by Catholic and Protestant, by socialized wealth and by socialized labor movements, we were always equally assured. Dr. White's address at the Boston National Conference of Charities and Correction in June, the last of his public addresses before a general audience, was a stirring and vigorous defence of the church against the charge of being reactionary and indifferent to the material needs of men, and a luminous exposition of the attitude of the church towards social needs and social reform as Dr. White finds it expressed especially in the encyclicals of Pope Leo XIII. Most striking is the eloquent closing paragraph of this summary in which he brings together the threads of his argument, and pays just tribute at once to the church in whose name he speaks and to the social workers in the midst of whom he stood: "Finally, she boasts, not without reason, that in proclaiming the sanctity and indissolubility of marriage, the solidity of domestic society, the divine origin of authority, and the need of virtue and morality in the private citizen, she has given the social worker a background for his reforms, a solid foundation upon which to build that city of God which every earnest social worker sees in vision, labors to bring down from the clouds, and which in a thousand centers of teeming humanity is slowly becoming a reality."

Sane, sincere, open-minded, sympathetic, and plain spoken, Mgr. White was a most valuable worker whether on the foundations or the superstructure of that city of our visions. The national, state, and city conferences were filled with his friends, who mourn with those of his parish and of his communion, and who hope with them that his influence will not soon disappear from among men.

Methodist

Opening the Pulpit.

Dr. Tennant, superintendent of the Burlington District, Iowa Conference, has taken a strong position against the opening of the pulpits of his district to the various causes which demand the attention and support of Christian people. Dr. Tennant has shown his interest in these causes by ready co-operation, but he does not believe the gain to them is not sufficient to make up for the positive injury to the church which comes from frequent interferences with the regular preaching. The Central Advocate has this to say on the subject:

This deserves consideration. It is well established fact that the real strength of a pulpit depends upon, not its occasional flashes, but its substantial continuity, its cumulative lines of thought, its system, its long and comprehensive plan. This is the strength of a year and of a pastorate. It is this that makes a steady, church-going congregation. The work of the pulpit is a serial; it is "to be continued," it is to grow; to come to a finish. The pulpit is ever in motion, ever going forward. To permit this continuity to be broken in upon by outsiders, no matter how zealous or how commendable, is an experiment, and its end may be far from what is expected. It is likely to be upsetting all the way round.

The better way is to give the field agent fifteen minutes, perhaps twenty, to recite his story. If he has the grace of compactness he can tell more in fifteen minutes than he can in fifty, so far as results are concerned. There can then be a hymn, there can be a word of prayer; and the sermon can come on as usual; this plan helping all interests, including that the field agent has presented, because of the vision and tone the sermon has brought. Have both.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement

The purpose of the Laymen's Missionary movement, says Samuel B. Capen, President of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, can be stated in a single sentence. "It was organized to help the boards of foreign missions of the United States and Canada prosecute more vigorously their foreign-missionary work." In the Christian Endeavor World, Dr. Capen gives a summary of the results of the movement. It has created a new atmosphere everywhere, it is reaching mature men as no other movement has done, it is helping to put the whole church upon a better business basis, it has helped the missionary work at home, and it has made it easier for churches to meet their local expenses. There has been a wonderful gain in the offerings to all the mission boards. The sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth items are given in Dr. Capen's own words:

Sixth. The Movement has helped as nothing else has ever done to give foreign missions their true place. The church as a whole has never taken the foreign-missionary enterprise seriously; to many minds it has been incidental. In the past if you asked a man for a gift, he would regard it as optional with him whether he should give or not; he looked at it very much as he would at an invitation to buy a ticket to a concert of a lecture. But men are beginning to see that an obligation rests upon them. The command, "Go ye into all the world," was not restricted to the apostles. The Movement lays its emphasis upon the stewardship of life. In the new thought the missionary offering is seen to be a part of divine worship.

Seventh.- The new emphasis upon missions has brought encouragement to missionaries. The hardest of all the burdens they have had to carry was the feeling that they had been sent to the front only apparently to be neglected or even forgotten. They knew of the costly buildings at home and the personal luxury. They saw their own work growing year by year and the needy hands outstretched for help; they heard the pitiful cry for something better from the thousands all about them. Then they turned to the home land and voiced this cry, and it seemed to them sometimes as though the chrches had mocked them. They asked of us bread; and, if we did not give them a stone, many of us sent them only crumbs. But this Laymen's Movement has given them new courage and new hope.

Eighth. The Movement has done much to promote unity in the church. In past years each denomination has been thinking only of its own interests; all this has been changed. In this Movement, which is both interdenominational and international, there are no more rivalries; we are not building up denominations and sects, but the kingdom of God. The Movement has helped to bring about a greater practical coöperation between mission boards. In the judgment of some this is the greatest work of the Laymen's Movement.

Ninth. I believe that it can be fairly stated that one of the great results of this Movement has been the new spirit of devotion and the new meaning to prayer which has come to tens of thousands of lives. Missions have a place in the "silent hour," at the family altar, and in the public place that they did not have a few years ago. A letter recently received from an observer well situated to know the facts states that he believes there is twice as much prayer heard in the church of God for missionary work as there was six months ago. Prayer is the real dynamo in the church life today, as it has been in all the movements of the church from the beginning.

My Favorite Old Testament Character

The study of the heroes of faith, if it is real study, is a method of self-examination. We may thus discover where our faith is weak, where selfishness is enthroned, and how insignificant are many achievements of which we have boasted. On the other hand, we may learn what great things men of limited talents can do. We ought, therefore, to read the lives of the saints not only to rid ourselves of the conceit of an upstart age, but also to deepen our appreciation of what every faithful man is doing to add to the virtues and happiness of mankind.

Abraham is the pioneer. He goes into new territory. He leads the way to a higher faith. All true religion is progressive. The best is always yet to be. The golden age is not in the past; it is coming. We look to the past not wisely if we imagine that it would be better for us to return to its ways and conditions. The men of the past whom we justly praise were great because they were dissatisfied with things as they were and wrought for the building of a nobler society. In so far as their labors have not been in vain, we have privileges which they did not enjoy.

The courage of faith is illustrated by Abraham. He knew not what the future had in store for him. One thing, however, he must have known, that he could not keep on good terms with himself and not make the venture of faith. To live the life of those about him meant certain failure. Then, when he was called upon to do the thing that promised to defeat his highest hope, he obeyed the voice of the supreme authority. We need prudence, but prudence never does great deeds. It merely helps us to avoid mistakes. The daring of faith has been and is the explanation of great lives.

The generosity of faith appears in the life of Abraham. The strife between his herdsmen and those of Lot would have given a mean spirited man an opportunity to assert his rights in swelling words and by a show of force. The man of faith could leave to another the choice that divided the land. The lack of generosity has marred the work of many a religious leader. The ecclesiastic has been afraid to entrust power to the people. The theologian has been afraid to let the multitude think. He has written out his creed and tried to force others to subscribe to it.

The giant figure of Moses may not seem to have any lessons for the common man, yet its significance is essentially that of every successful life. Faith and courage and human sympathy are at the basis of the greatness of Moses. He is larger than most men, but he is still a man. The love and solicitude which watched over his infancy have nothing in them that is unusual. We know fathers and mothers who love their children and are ready to lay down their lives for them. And doubtless from his parents he learned the lesson of love and faith.

It is the ambition of many a youth to have a comfortable place in the government service, with an assured salary and no danger of a dismissal. Moses had no such ambition. He knew, what every intelligent young man knows after he has done a little thinking, that royal and government favor cannot make men. Men are made great by what they do. Among the most insignificant fellows in the world are men whose living depends upon official favor. He who seeks the praise of royalty seldom gets himself enrolled among the benefactors of the race.

Moses was a labor leader. Slavery was a corner stone of Egyptian civilization. The Pharoah and his nobles had no compunction about living by the toil of other men. Indeed, they measured their greatness by their ability to exact tribute from what other men had produced. The Israelites were very unwilling slaves. They were free sons of the desert. It was only for a time that they could forget their origin. The coming of a leader was sure to mean, at last, a fight for freedom. Moses saw the injustice his people suffered, and, seeing it, his life work was made clear to him.

The rights of the spirit as well as of the body were demanded by Moses when he stood before the king of Egypt. "Let us go, we pray thee, three days' journey into the wilderness, that we may sacrifice to Jehovah our God." Slavery was not only depriving the people of the work of their hands; it was robbing them of their spiritual heritage. In his demand for the liberation of Israel from the rule of the taskmaster in order that Israel might be spiritually free, Moses is a leader whom all who believe in freedom must follow, if they are to lead wisely. The Meaning of Baptism

Careful reading of Alexander Campbell's utterances on baptism will disclose three assumptions upon which he builds his entire defense of the Baptist dogma. They are:

1. That a word always retains its root meaning in all its forms and in every context.

2. That baptizo in the New Testament is a word of specific action.

3. That scholarship justifies him in translating baptizo by "immerse" in the New Testament.

Each of these assumptions is erroneous.

1. The first assumption is one that we have been considering in the two previous chapters. We have already before us data enough to justify our astonishment at such a statement as the following from Mr. Campbell: "According to the usages of all languages, ancient and modern, derivative words legally inherit the specific meaning of their natural progenitors, and never can so far alienate from themselves that peculiar significance as to indicate any action specifically different from that intimated in the parent stock." In the following statement the italics are Mr. Campbell's: "Wherever the radical syllable ["dip" or bap] is found the radical idea is in it."

Mr. Campbell conceived some "law" to obtain which held words to a certain logical course of usage. But there is no such "law." The meanings of words are not governed by a determinate principle or law. They mean what they are meant to mean by those who use them. Their meanings are often accidental, even capricious. It was purely capricious that bapto should have come to mean "dye," that candidatus should have come to mean an aspirant for public office. This assumption that words retain their root meaning throughout their entire usage is purely fictitious.

Instances could be multiplied indefinitely to substantiate this point. But we shall limit ourselves to those illustrations that have already been given. In the case of psallo, as we have seen, there is a clear refutation of Mr. Campbell's first assumption. This word's primary meaning was the specific physical action, "pluck," or "pick." In its specialized use as "sing," or "making melody" in your hearts, there is no trace whatever of its root meaning. The word actually did what Mr. Campbell said a word could not do, namely, "alienated from itself" its primary meaning and took to itself a meaning "specifically different from that intimated in the parent stock." In the case of bapto it has been shown that the italicized statement (above) of Mr. Campbell is erroneous. This word we have found used as "dye" or "stain" in contexts where no hint of its primary meaning "dip" is present.

But the most convincing evidence against this assumption of Mr. Campbell is found in the actual use of the word baptizo itself two or three centuries after Christ. As is well known it was at about that time that sprinkling or pouring was introduced as a substitute for immersion in administering baptism. Greek was then the common language of the church, just as common as in the time of Christ. But this ceremony in which water was poured upon a person was called baptisma.

Here was a Greek speaking people to whom, according to Mr. Campbell's argument, baptizo meant "dip" or "immerse," and yet they apply the word to a ceremony in which there is no trace or hint of dipping. Such a procedure would have been impossible. We cannot conceive one who speaks English pouring a little water on another's head and saying, "I immerse you into the name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit!" Manifestly baptizo did not mean "immerse" to the Greek speaking church of the third and fourth centuries. It connoted the rite of induction into the church, a rite whose essential meaning was found elsewhere than in the particular physical act by which it was solemnized.

This use of baptizo at the time the form of administration began to be corrupted both refutes Mr. Campbell's assumption as to the immutability of a word's meaning and establishes our contention that baptizo in its Christian and New Testament context stood for the total social act by which a new religious status was conferred.

2. The second assumption of Mr. Campbell's, that baptizo is a word of specific action, demands but little attention in view of what has already been said. He illustrates his point by citing "go" as an example of "generic" action. "Creep," "run," "walk," "ride," etc.—these are all "specific" actions, particular forms of "going." Baptizo, Mr. Campbell said, signifies a specific action, "dip."

Of course this is true, in the primary meaning of the word. But when once it is admitted that words take on different meanings in new circumstances it is fallacious to reason from the meaning of the word in its primary signification. We have seen in the cases of bapto, psallo and candidatus how specific words become generic in their specialized usage. Whether baptizo in its New Testament usage entirely lost its primary specific meaning "dip" or not is a question whose answer waits upon an examination of the actual New Testament texts. But that there is nothing in the so-called "laws" of language to prevent its becoming wholly generic the illustrations we have adduced amply prove.

3. There remains now to be considered the assumption concerning the confirmatory support which Mr. Campbell conceives the scholarship of the world to give him in his translation of baptizo. There is something very naive and yet very shrewd in the way Mr. Campbell and all Baptist controversialists quote the "scholarship of the world" on their side. One cannot help wondering how these scholars, the great majority of whom are pedo-baptists, can go right on practicing affusion if they are on the Baptist side of the controversy!

The fact is that on the vital point of the argument the scholars quoted by Mr. Campbell are not on the Baptist side. Baptist controversialists have a way of overlooking the most important utterances of the authorities they quote. They also have a way of reading their own view into the silences of these scholars.

Scholars generally agree to two points made by Mr. Campbell—that the root meaning of baptizo was "immerse" and that baptism was solemnized in New Testament times by immersion. But on the point that baptizo in its characteristic New Testament meaning signifies "immerse" and should be so translated, these scholars are either silent or opposed. We must not review the scores and scores of quotations which Mr. Campbell gives. It will suffice our present purpose to examine his quotations from the three scholars whose translations together constitute "The Living Oracles"—Doctors George Campbell, Doddridge and Macknight. The following quotations are given by Mr. Campbell:

Dr. Doddridge says, "Baptism was generally administered by immersion, though I see no proof that it was essential to the institution." On Romans 6:4 he says, "It seems the part of candor to confess, that here is an allustion to the manner of baptizing by immersion as most usual in these early times."

Dr. Macknight says, "In baptism, the rite of initiation into the Christian church, the baptized person is buried under the water."

Dr. George Campbell says, "The noun ought never to be rendered 'baptism,' nor the verb "to baptize,' except when employed in a religious ceremony."

In addition to these we may also give a quotation from Professor Stuart of Andover, of whom Mr. Campbell speaks in the highest praise. He quotes him as follows: "For myself, then, I cheerfully admit that baptizo in the New Testament, when applied to the rite of baptism does in all probability involve the idea that this rite was usually performed by immersion, but not always."

We do not give these quotations here on account of the possible exceptions to immersion in early practice which they suggest. Those exceptions we regard as extremely unlikely. Our purpose now is to draw the reader's attention to the fact that these authorities on whom Mr. Campbell leaned evidently regarded New Testament baptism, not as a physical act of immersion, but as a rite, an institution, an ordinance, and that they would have regarded the translation of the word by "immerse" as emptying it of its essential meaning. We have put the italics into the quotations to aid in making this clear.

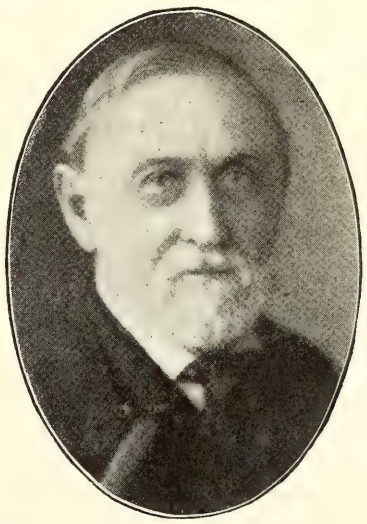
Mr. Campbell entirely overlooked this implication of almost all his authorities. He assumed that having obtained their admission that the root meaning of baptizo was "immerse" and that the early practice was by immersion, he could then substitute the word "immerse" for "baptize" in the Great Commission and throughout the New Testament. But he does not quote, to our knowledge, a single non-Baptist authority for this procedure. The scholarly authorities on whom he relies all imply by their statements that the word meant much more and something different in its characteristic New Testament use than simply "immerse."

How Mr. Campbell and other Baptist disputants could have overlooked this very vital point is hard to explain. But the time has fully come when Baptist writers should exercise greater modesty in their claim as to the attitude of "the scholarship of the world."

Next week we shall consider the primitive practice of baptism.

The Death of Professor McGarvey

The news that the aged and revered president of the Bible College at Lexington, Ky., had passed away brought sincere regret to the Disciples throughout the country. His ill health during the past two years, and his advanced age rendered it probable that he might be called at any time. Yet the event was not expected at once, and the death of such a man is always the occasion of surprise and grief to those who have known him.



He was born in Hopkinsville, Ky., in 1829. His father was from Ireland, and his mother from Virginia. In 1839 the family moved to Tremont, Ill. In 1847 J. W. McGarvey entered Bethany College, from which he graduated in 1850. For a time he taught in a school for boys, but in 1851 he was ordained to the ministry. He preached for several years, chiefly at Dover, Mo., where he spent nine years. During this time he became widely known in the state as a preacher and debater. Five public discussions were held by him in various places and with representatives of different denominations. In 1862 he went to Lexington, Ky., as minister of the church, and there he remained till the time of his death.

But his life work was not to be that of a preacher, though he was often heard in the pulpit. In 1865 he accepted the position of teacher in the College of the Bible, and for some years he has been president of that institution, connected with Transylvania University.

Professor McGarvey's department was that of biblical exegesis, and the students of the institution, whom he trained in a masterful way in the knowledge of the English Bible, looked upon him not only as an able and honored guide in the Scriptures, but also as a personal friend for whom deep affection was felt. Few teachers among the Disciples have drawn their students into a more intimate and trusting friendship than he.

As a writer, Professor McGarvey made for himself an assured place in the literature and journalism of the brotherhood. His "Commentary on Acts" passed through several editions, and was probably the most widely used text book ever written by a Disciple. In the first period of critical studies in America, he took cardinal interest in the new movement, as his work on the "Text and Canon" shows.

But as the critical activities of the world of scholarship moved on into the field of literary and historical investigation, he found himself unable to follow the main current of opinion. In his views on the leading questions of Old Testament study he accepted the conservative attitude of such scholars as William Henry Green, and Edward Cove Bissell. When Driver's "Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament" was published in 1891 he wrote extensively in dissent from the views it maintained, views which would now be regarded as the moderate and generally accepted verdict of biblical scholarship. His most ambitious work of a critical character was a review of Driver's "Deuteronomy," with which he dealt in a series of articles, strongly affirming the traditional view of the Mosaic authorship of the book.

In the same conservative spirit he has contributed for years to the department of "Biblical Criticism" in the Christian Standard. With many of the critical views expressed there and elsewhere in his writings numbers of his brethren in the ministry and in the work of education have found themselves unable to agree. Most of all have they deprecated the tone of mordant and caustic severity in which too often he permitted himself to pronounce with apparent finality on the views of others. This style of expression was chiefly regretted by those who knew and loved him best, and were able to discriminate between the hasty and biting paragraphs of a clever, witty and able writer, gifted with a fund of humor and sarcasm for the defense of his opinions and the chastisement of the dissenters, and the rich Christian character and warm heart of a teacher and father in the faith.

But though the critical views of Professor McGarvey belonged to a period and school of thought now largely passing, his sincerity and earnestness, his unalterable fidelity to the deeper values of the Christian faith which he shared with all his brethren of every critical attitude, and the sweetness and serenity of his personal experience of religion, were noble qualities which leave enduring influence on his students and friends.

In his class room he was at his best. Though afflicted with deafness for many years, he listened to the recitations of his students whom he called one by one to his desk. To the last he was not convinced that some of the practices of his brethren were right, and during the last years of his life changed his membership that he might worship with a church that did not use the organ. But his convictions on this and many other matters were respected by those who did not share them. And the life he lived gave convincing proof of the profound faith he possessed.

In the passing of Professor McGarvey the Disciples have lost a notable figure. He was fearless and positive in his views. He did not hesitate to condemn opinions and practices in which he disbelieved. If he was sensitive to the reactionary tendencies of some who claimed his authority for their illiberal interpretation of the gospel; or found it necessary to protest at times against the obscurantism, perversion and divisive character of the journal to which he was the chief contributor, he yet had confidence that the constructive elements of his message would win home to the hearts of his children in the faith. And in this confidence let us believe he was not mistaken.

For Professor McGarvey as a man and a Christian all Disciples have profound and sincere respect. Many will feel deep personal grief at his departure. His place is assured in the regard and memory of the brotherhood. And his name will be honored among the noble men whom this religious movement has given to the world.

Shall These Christians Be Received?

The Christian Century's Opinion

Last week The Christian Century presented a report of a questionaire on Christian unity, tabulating the sentiments of 109 representative ministers on an actual opportunity for the practice of the Disciples' plea. After the paper went to press, but before it was received by any subscribers, seven additional replies to our inquiries were received. One of these was personally favorable to receiving the Methodists but unwilling to do so lest the work of the Foreign Society should lose support thereby. This reply should be added to Class VI, making a total of eight in this class. Six replied decisively, Yes, the Methodists should be received. These added to the sixty-four reported last week make seventy in Class VII.

Not the least remarkable feature in this questionaire is the fact that only ten out of 126 whose opinions were requested failed to reply.

We may repeat here the revised returns: 2 declined to give an opinion, 3 gave vague or inquiring replies, 22 were opposed to receiving the Methodists, 6 suggested some form of associate affiliation, 5 said whatever the missionaries do will be satisfactory, 8 were personally favorable to receiving them but feared its effect upon the home church, 70 answered, Yes, receive them.

The Christian Century promised to give its own opinion, with reasons therefor, in this issue. Without repeating in detail the missionary's description of the situation within which the problem arose, it is sufficient to say that by the principles of economy and comity under which mission work is carried forward, it is agreed by all concerned that the Methodists should retire from a certain city in which Disciples and other religious bodies are at work. It seems desirable, whether from reasons of convenience or previous fraternal relations, or whatever reason, that the Methodist members should identify themselves with the Disciples church rather than any other mission church in the city. This the Methodists are willing to do and their missionary authorities are willing that they should do, provided the Disciples will receive them without invalidating their church membership by insisting upon their rebaptism.

Should the Disciples receive them or not? The Christian Century answers unhesitatingly, Yes, and for the following reasons:

I.

Because it is the will of Christ. These Methodists are our Christian brethren, members with us of the one and only church of Christ, already in the fellowship of all who belong to the church of Christ. That they should be received into the full and complete fellowship of all disciples is the plain commandment of the church's Head.

Our Lord's prayer for the unity of his followers is the highest disclosure of his will. Too long Christ's followers have read their Master's intercessory prayer as merely his prayer. Now they are beginning to read it as their duty. His prayer is his supreme commandment. Not in edicts and formal commissions is the will of such a Lord revealed, but in his prayers. What Christ prayed for, that represents his supreme will. What Christ willed, that is the disciple's top-most duty.

Our Lord's prayer for the unity of his disciples was prompted by the possibility of just such a situation as is actually presented to these Disciples on the mission field. The Master yearned that nothing should prevail to break the unity of those whom the Father had given him. The fact that these his immediate followers, and all who in the future should believe on him through their word, were his—the fact that he had accepted them—this fact he besought the Father to make an effective and sufficient ground of their fellowship and unity one with another.

There is, therefore, a certain disloyalty in even debating the question of receiving these Methodist Christians into fellowship. If the church were a human institution, a club or society, there would then be room for parley here. But the church is not just a human institution; it is divine. Its terms of admittance are not made by man. Man's duty is to maintain unity among those whom God receives. A congregation of Disciples has no jurisdiction in the matter of receiving other Christians into their fellowship. They may not raise the question, Shall we give them our fellowship? They have no right to withhold it.

A body of Disciples, ever going back to Christ, speaking where he speaks and remaining silent where he is silent, must obey him in the practice of unity with all members of his church or stand convicted of fundamental disloyalty to his will.

II.

The historic ideal of the Disciples demands that these Methodists be recognized as members of the church of Christ and received as such. From the earliest days the Disciples have set themselves to advance the cause of Christian unity. The primal impulse of their movement was a protest against the divided condition of the church and an earnest and practical attempt to transcend sectarian distinctions.

From the beginning the Disciples sought to maintain fellowship with their brethren of the denominational order. It was not of their own choice that they became a separate movement, with all the outward marks of a denomination. They wished to remain in the churches, and never ceased to deplore the un-Christian spirit that forced them out by making their fellowship uncomfortable.

Is it not a strange irony that we should now turn the tables on those who put us out of their fellowship by refusing to take them into ours?

That this sectarian principle of church-membership should have established itself in our procedure only shows in what degree our denominational success has obscured the great vision of Thomas Campbell. Under cover of obedience to an assumed command of Christ in a single item of the ancient order of the church, we have allowed his great catholic commandment for unity to fall into eclipse. If Christ's assumed command to practice immersion only stood in conflict with his command to practice unity there might be some justification for choosing to obey either of the commands to the exclusion of the other, although our own standard of moral values would be plainly disclosed thereby. But as a matter of fact there is no conflict between these commandments. "This ought ye to have done and not left the other undone."

We write in this strain not bitterly, not critically, but penitently. Our words reflect we are assured, the sentiments of a great multitude of our brethren who perceive the sectarian pocket into which our practice of close membership has thrust us. In the hour when God's people are drawing together, at home and on the mission field, instead of appearing as a prophetic and ardent champion of unity, the Disciples too often actually complicate the problem and hinder this mighty enterprise of their Lord. And all because, as in India this past summer, they were unable clearly and unequivocally to say that unimmersed Methodists and Presbyterians were members of the church of Christ and to receive them as such.

It is high time that we returned to the fountain of our history and drank again of the pure waters of catholicity and idealism from which our great movement sprang.

III.

A third reason is that we owe it to ourselves to receive these Methodists into the full fellowship of our mission church. This is closely related to the second reason given above. That applies to our historic purpose; this applies to our present character as a church.

A church of Disciples cannot afford to cultivate in its practice a sectarian character. We were born in the hatred of sectarianism. The refusal to receive into our membership one who is a member of the church of Christ commits us to the essential principle upon which the whole sectarian order of the church rests.

Any congregation that denies membership to those whom Christ has received becomes thereby a sectarian congregation, narrower in its basis of fellowship than the church of Christ.

The Disciples of Christ have ever been sensitive about becoming another sect among the sects. It was this fear that held our fathers in connection with Presbyterian and Baptist churches long after their fellowship began to be strained and uncomfortable. We have never given over the idea that we are not a denomination. Our favorite description of our position is that it is the common denominator upon which all denominations may find unity.

But no mere theory or claim of this sort will carry far in the face of a contrary practice. Whether we are a denomination or not depends not upon our plea, but upon our practice. If we select from among Christ's people those with whom we will have fellowship and reject the rest we thereby become sectarian. If we practice Christian unity with Baptists and refuse to practice it with Methodists and Presbyterians we are carnal, the spirit of schism is in our heart as it was in the church of Corinth.

Are Baptists members of the church of Christ and Presbyterians not? Has Christ received Baptists and rejected Methodists? If Christ has made no difference in the churchly status of Presbyterians and Baptists why should we? If Christ receives Methodists into his fellowship and into his church without re-baptism why should not we?

In order, therefore, to save ourselves from sectarianism these Methodists should be received.

IV.

Besides all this, the Disciples owe it to the Methodists to receive them. One of the most unexpected revelations of our questionaire published last week was the frequency and unconcern with which some of our respondents consigned the Methodists to the Presbyterian or Episcopalian church. This only shows how far these Disciples have lapsed from their pristine ideals into respectable denominationalism. Here is a group of Christians who are willing to forsake the denominational order and become Christians only. And here is a group of Christians only who insist that they shall not do so but shall remain in the denominational order, simply exchanging one sectarian name for another!

This would be a ludicrous paradox if it were not so sad. Let us review those elements of the denominational order which the Disciples have insisted must be abandoned for the sake of a united church. They are: Denominational creeds, denominational names, denominational orders, denominational communion, denominational baptism.

And now let us see what is involved in the proposal that these Methodist Christians be taken into the full fellowship of the Disciples:

They would abandon a denominational creed.

They would abandon a denominational name.

They would abandon the practice of a denominational baptism.

As Methodists they have no denominational orders to abandon.

They likewise have no denominational communion to abandon.

And yet in the face of their willingness to be called Christians only and thus to completely identify themselves with an undenominational order of things there are those who would insist upon their retaining their denominational name and status. Why should Disciples of Christ thus hinder those who wish to practice Christian union? The only answer given is that these Methodist Christians do not understand the New Testament teaching on baptism as we do and we cannot receive them until they do so understand it and submit to it.

V.

In the premises who is proposing to do more for the sake of Christian unity, the Methodists or the Disciples? The Methodists are proposing to curtail their liberty for the sake of unity. Besides giving up the denominational features above enumerated, they are willing to surrender what privately they regard as a right, namely, the practice of sprinkling for baptism.

They are moved by precisely the same spirit as that which would prompt Paul to refuse to eat meat while the world stands if it caused his brother to offend, if it caused division in the church. Paul's principle of action is the basic principle upon which the unity of the church must finally rest. There can be no unity until the people of God learn to act upon that principle of mutual deference and love.

But these Methodists propose to act upon that principle. To them the form of affusion in baptism stands precisely where idol-meat stood to Paul. They believe there is no disloyalty to Christ in the practice of it. It is a matter of indifference so far as their conscience is concerned, whether they sprinkle or immerse. But for the sake of unity they will forego their privilege and participate in the future in the practice of immersion only. Is not this the very essence of the spirit of Christ? Who contributes more to the unity of God's people in this specific instance, the Disciples or the Methodists? We answer the Methodists.

And for this reason: The Methodists actually give up something; the Disciples yield not a single point. If the proposed union should be accomplished not one conviction cherished by the most conservative Disciple would be either compromised or imperiled.

The act of receiving these Methodists into fellowship involves nothing save the formal acknowledgment of that which no representative Disciple will deny, namely, that they are Christians, members of the church of Christ.

The fact that they abandon their denominational creed and name places them on the same level with the Disciples who have historically, and for the same purpose, done the same thing.

And with respect to baptism, even the Disciple who believes that Christ specifically commanded immersion gains all that his conscience can demand. He is not responsible for the baptism of these unimmersed Christians. Howsoever they came into the church of Christ it is an acknowledged fact that they are now in. His duty in obedience to Christ is to give them complete fellowship. He no more compromises his conscience with respect to baptism by giving them fellowship in his own congregation than by extending it to them as a neighboring Methodist congregation.

The point at which his conviction with respect to baptism is involved is in the actual practice of initiating new converts into the church of Christ. Here, however humble a member he may be, he is responsible. Believing as he does that Christ commands the church to practice immersion only, he can participate conscientiously in no other practice. And these Methodist brethren, should they be received, will not ask him to. They believe in immersion as well as he, and do not ask that the church shall practice any other form.

Here then, manifestly, is an opportunity to aid a group of Christian people to quit the whole denominational order. As those commissioned of God to aid his divided people in doing just this thing, it is little less than disloyalty for the Disciples of Christ to refuse in this particular instance.

VI.

Finally, these Methodists should be received in fulfillment of our duty to the church universal. There are two functions the Disciples are commissioned to perform in Christendom. One is to plead for unity. This is the prophet's task. For a hundred years ours was the voice of one crying in the wilderness of sectarianism. With urgency and passion, in season and out of season, the Disciples have proclaimed a united church as the only adequate instrument for saving the world and the only sufficient recompense to the Redeemer who bought her with his own precious blood. That plea is being heard. Many other voices are being raised. From all sides, often, let us thank God, through the influence of our words, more often by the independent working of God's Spirit in the hearts of his people, leaders have sprung up who now proclaim the acceptable day of unity.

But the Disciples have been commissioned not alone to plead for unity but to practice it. They conceive it to be their duty to illustrate in their actual practice the principles upon which a united church may be realized. As a matter of fact the Disciples have not illustrated unity as well as they have pleaded for it. By an accident of their history they took over from association with the Baptists the practice of sectarian church-membership.

As a result they have taken a position which practically duplicates the Baptist position and renders impossible the consummation of their ideal except upon condition that the Christian world shall become Baptist. It is high time for the Disciples to bear their testimony by illustration as well as by argument. Their fundamental thesis is that the church of Christ is one—is one now, underneath her divisions and in spite of her divisions. Contrary to the prevailing idea, they have maintained that the mystical, essential unity, instead of satisfying the New Testament ideal is the strongest conceivable demand for complete organic union.

Logically, therefore, it is their business to reveal this essential unity in their practice. They must show Christendom the unity it now has, not the unity of episcopal bodies, nor of pedo-baptist bodies, nor of Baptist bodies, but the unity of the whole church of Christ. Up to date the Disciples have revealed only the unity of Baptist bodies. This has been due to the inter-tangling of the baptism controversy with the practice of unity.

There is no more reason for complicating the practice of Christian union with the baptism controversy than with any other controversy.

The Disciples should begin now, in the foreign field and here at home, to show to the church universal that our Lord disclosed his divine wisdom when he made unity a basic and unconditional duty and provided that all our disagreements should be held in abeyance to his will or solved in love within a united church.

Editorial Table Talk

Why Not Into Other Fields?

John Haynes Holmes, of the Church of the Messiah, New York City, was up in Maine this summer during the campaign for and against prohibition. His impressions are recorded in The Survey. The churches, he is confident, were the mightiest forces on the side of prohibition. The ministers and the church members, especially the women, were "on the job" all summer. It is due to the churches that prohibition was not defeated by an overwhelmingly majority. The success of the churches in fighting the liquor traffic raises the question, "Why are they not equally united and enthusiastic and untiring in battling for the prohibition of child labor, the prevention of tuberculosis, the prohibition of the twelve-hour day and the seven-day week, the prohibition of tenement-house and sweat-shop abuses, the prohibition of prison abominations, the prohibition of international war, and so on indefinitely?" The church is ever ready to fight the traditional evils, gambling, liquor selling, and prostitution. But these evils are supported by financial interest which the church need have no fear of offending. Mr. Holmes continues:

If the churches of Maine, or any other state, can enter as a single body into the field of politics to wipe out the liquor traffic, they can also enter in this same way and into this same field of politics to wipe out other abuses of exactly this kind. They can organize, for example, to write a clause into the state constitution for the prohibition of child labor. They can distribute literature, hold rallies, organize processions, conduct prayer-meetings for this cause as well as for the other. They can penetrate the remotest towns and villages to educate and inspire the people upon this question as well as upon that of temperance. In other words, what churches have done in Maine and elsewhere, to banish the saloon, they can also do in Maine, and elsewhere, to banish the child labor factory, the tuberculosis tenement, the underpaid and overworked labor, the sweat-shop and the slum! What is possible in one field of social endeavor is possible in all. What the churches find it necessary to do here for social amelioration they must find necessary to do everywhere. There are no longer two or three social menaces, such as gambling and liquor-selling, which are essentially irreligious; there is today one great, all-inclusive social question, which manifests itself in many forms, and challenges in them all the powers of organized morality. The churches, therefore, if they are to do their full duty, must do battle all along the line. They must move forward into all fields. They must seek everywhere the establishment of the Kingdom.

The Coming Triangular Congress

The joint congress of Baptists, Disciples, and Free Baptists will be held at Atlantic City, Tuesday to Thursday, November 14 to 16. It will be the second of these united gatherings of the three denominations. The first was held three years ago in Memorial Church of Christ, Chicago, and was an occasion of unusual interest to all who attended.

The coming Congress will be further from the center of the Disciples, and it will therefore require a greater effort to secure such attendance on the part of our people as will meet the demands of such a gathering and prove that the brotherhood is really interested in the work of closer coöperation with the two closely related bodies.

The program has been carefully planned, with a series of discussions sure to be of interest to all who attend. The Disciples have representation at each of the sessions and on every theme to be discussed.

Atlantic City is one of the most attractive places on the Atlantic coast and is worthy of a visit for its own sake. It was the scene of the last great Christian Endeavor Convention, which was held at the Million Dollar Pier, and was addressed by the President and other leading men in public life. The place is admirably adapted for gatherings of this character. The hotel accommodations are of the best.

It is hoped that just as many Disciples as can possibly arrange to attend will be present. Certainly all our ministers and educators living in the East will feel it an obligation to be present and to represent the large number of Disciples in the West who would be glad to attend but will find the distance too great.

The program is printed in another column.

Credit Where It Is Due

We are familiar with the religious zealot who believes that all faith and virtue reside in his denomination. Religion has no monopoly on this sort of narrowness. Labor leaders display it. It appears among educators, political leaders, and capitalists. We enjoy ourselves when we have a chance to chastise a religious zealot. We are entitled to the fun that comes from exposing egotism of every description. We ought to give to all the people some credit for the benefits that have come to all. So reasons the Christian Register, it would seem, when it insists that the general public has had something to do with improving the conditions of labor:

One of the worst elements that may be imported into any dispute over labor or the rewards of labor is bad temper. When the spirit of revenge begins to work on either side of any dispute, fair play is out of the question. The most diverse opinions may be held and the antagonisms that result from them may be active and strenuous without the loss of temper on either side. Out of such antagonisms between honest men the truth is sure to be evolved and displayed so that all fair-minded men can see it. After that public opinion, if nothing else, will compel a final settlement that will be just. The general public has never had the credit it deserves. To it is due most of the plans devised for the protection of women and children and the demand for fair play between the rich and the poor, the employer and the employed. Individuals and organizations often boast that they alone wrought the changes for good, but without public opinion back of them both the promoters of measures and the legislators who make laws would be helpless. When they who suffer wrong make their appeal to this august tribunal, with patience, in good temper, and a conclusive display of the facts, public opinion will not be long in suggesting the remedy.

A Big Church

The First Presbyterian Church of Seattle has the distinction of being the leading Presbyterian Church of the United States when leadership is reckoned by numbers. It has 4,576 members. There are other big things about it besides its membership. It has 2,755 Sunday-school scholars. Its congregational expenses last year were $51,640. The gifts to Home Missions were $11,552; Foreign Missions, $4,625; Education, $450; Sunday-school Work, $963; Church Erection, $4,300; Relief Fund, $225; Freedmen, $110; Colleges, $650; and Temperance, $212.

I have carefully and regularly read the Holy Scriptures, and I am of opinion that this volume, independently of its divine origin, contains more true sublimity, more exquisite beauty, more pure morality, more important history, and finer strains of poetry and eloquence, than could be collected from all other books, in whatever age or language they may have been composed.—Sir William Jones.

The Story of Stonebridge

BY EDGAR DEWITT JONES

The story of Stonebridge must, perforce, be short since there is both so little and so much to tell.

Stonebridge was a storekeeper for twenty-five years to a day, and a village storekeeper at that. The population of the village where Stonebridge kept a general store for a quarter of a century is six hundred and six, according to the last census. It is a quiet place, is the town where Stonebridge lived and died; just an ordinary village with the usual number of gossipy tongues and the dull daily round of small talk. But nobody ever gossiped about Stonebridge nor was any talk ever dull that had him for theme.

Stonebridge was very tall, very thin and slightly stooped. He had a long, slim face, clean shaven always, a face that bore a strong resemblance to the pictures of Henry Irving. His hair was gray, "iron gray" some called it. Around the temples it was almost white. His eyes were steel blue, with a handsome habit of twinkling when he talked. And he had a wonderfully sweet smile.

This is the way Stonebridge looked for twenty-five years, except perhaps towards the last when his face grew a trifle thinner and the hair around his temples perceptibly whiter.

Stonebridge was a bachelor and he lived in a big, rambling sort of house at the edge of town, with a widowed aunt for housekeeper.

Everybody knew where he lived, but especially the children.

Stonebridge was a lover of little children. Never was he happier than when they flocked about him like sheep about a Palestinian shepherd. His pockets were never empty of sweets for his little friends, and he encouraged their playing on his wooded pasture where were splendid swings, an even dozen. And many was the time as Stonebridge gleefully tossed a toddler into the air or held one close to his heart, that he said:

"What is so precious as a little child!"

Stonebridge was passionately fond of music. Almost any kind of music affected him. He would trail down the street after a brass band or stop to listen to a boy with a French harp; a violin well played cast a spell over him and a guitar half-way skillfully thrummed brought tears to his eyes. And he knew good music when he heard it. It was due to him that the villagers now and then heard singers and musicians who otherwise would not have come to so small a place. One very great violinist whose name is known on two continents, got to be a very close friend of Stonebridge and once a year came to see him and to play in concerts which were memorable in the village's history. Once after the great violinist had given his concert and he and Stonebridge were sitting in the parlor of the big old house at the edge of the town, Stonebridge opened his heart. He told the violinist of the music that was in his own soul that he could never express, of the thoughts, the dreams, the ambitions, the burning desires that welled up in his heart, throbbed in his temples, swept in and over his very being as he listened to such music as his friend made.

Said Stonebridge:

"If I could play the violin like you play it, if I could make others feel what you make me feel, I could ask no greater thing of God and I should die satisfied."

Whereupon the great violinist's rather haughty face grew very kind, his proud eyes became exceeding tender and he looked upon the face of Stonebridge with a wonderment that was akin to awe.

Stonebridge had an eye for form and color and he knew a good painting when he saw one. On the walls of the plain old house at the edge of town hung some fine landscapes; and while Stonebridge had never visited the great galleries of Europe, he was not unacquainted with their treasures. Sometimes he saw a sunset, or a waterfall, or a group of children romping on a grassy plot that so quickened his subtle sense of beauty as to make him involuntarily exclaim: "Oh, if I could but paint it what might I not bequeath to the world when I die!"

Stonebridge had an artist friend, a man whose studio in a great city of the East is much sought out by the rich and great. How this friendship came about was never known to the villagers, though some thought it was through the great violinist. No matter—the painter and Stonebridge came to be close friends. And there was a day when the painter finished putting the big old house at the edge of town on canvas; the wooded pastures, the lilacs and roses—very wonderfully the artist put them all in the picture. When Stonebridge gazed on the completed work he wept.

"My friend," said he, "if I could do this, I would feel that my life was a grand success, I would feel that God had spoken through me. I know I could die in peace if I could paint like you."

And the artist friend with shining eyes looked full into the face of the village store keeper and while he looked his own face lit up with a strange light as when one sees a seraphic vision, or dreams a great dream.

Stonebridge was fond of literature and the poets were his favorite writers. His library was not large but the great poets were represented there. It so happened that Stonebridge came to know quite intimately a poet whose writings are widely read in America's middle west, not a great poet as poets rank, but none the less truly a man of mark. After Stonebridge and this man of letters had known each other for several years and a friendship had ripened, the poet came to the village for an evening's reading from his published works. Late that night the storekeeper and the poet sat in the parlor of the big old house at the edge of town.

Said Stonebridge:

"My friend, I heard you with the greatest profit. If I were the author of but a single poem out of the many that you read tonight, my joy would know no bounds. I should be willing to die then, feeling that God through me had spoken to the world."

Then the poet, whose nature was tender and with whom sentiment was as meat and bread, reached out and clasping the hand of the storekeeper pressed it hard.

Stonebridge was moved by eloquence, especially pulpit eloquence. He had heard most of the sermons that were preached in the village for a quarter of a century. There was only one church there and each Lord's Day witnessed Stonebridge worshiping in the sanctuary. Not all of the ministers were eloquent perhaps, but whenever one rose to impassioned appeal the spirit of Stonebridge arose with him, his whole being responding like a fine old harp perfectly tuned, to the touch of a master hand. One hundred miles away in the great city there dwelt one of the famous preachers of the land, and thither Stonebridge journeyed occasionally to hear him preach. The great preacher and Stonebridge became fast friends and out of their friendship the village received a blessing as well. Once a year this man of God came to the village to preach, and his speech was golden and his message mighty. One night after the great preacher had spoken thus, he sat with Stonebridge in the parlor in the big old house at the edge of town.

Said Stonebridge:

"My friend, when I hear you preach, I am carried into the third heaven, and like St. Paul, I hear unspeakable words. If I could preach like you, I would be satisfied to lie down and die. I would feel God had spoken through me and that my life was a grand success."

The great preacher's eyes rested on Stonebridge's long, lean face, now wistful beyond speech, and he opened his lips as if to reply but no words came. Instead he smiled a little and like a bashful girl lowered his eyes to the floor.

The morning of Stonebridge's twenty-fifth anniversary as village storekeeper and of his fiftieth birthday brought awful shock and heartache to the community. For the aged aunt wondering why he was not up and about at his accustomed hour of five, found him lying quite naturally on his left side but chill and lifeless.

Stonebridge had died some time during the night, alone, apparently without pain and while he slept.

Very many people came from afar to Stonebridge's funeral.

The great violinist came and when he stood by the side of his old friend and looked down on the long, slim face with the lines of laughter still lurking about the closely compressed lips and the hair so white about the temples, his own face grew pain-wrought. He stood thus a long time and when he spoke it was in a low tone yet distinctly audible to all who were in the large room. Said he:

"NO MUSIC THAT I EVER MADE WAS HALF SO BEAUTIFUL AS THIS GOOD MAN'S LIFE."

The great artist came and when he could trust himself to speak it was to say to the group of silent ones in the large room:

"NO PICTURE THAT I EVER PAINTED WAS AS NOBLE OR WORTH WHILE AS THIS DEAR FRIEND'S LIFE."

The poet came and so long did he stand bowed in grief by his friend's side that one of the watchers was moved to touch him lightly upon the shoulder. Without a word, the poet abruptly left the room, but to a little group on the long, wide porch he said:

"IN YONDER ROOM LIES MY FRIEND WHO PRAISED EXTRAVAGANTLY MY POEMS BUT NOTHING THAT I EVER WROTE WAS AS FINE OR AS TRUE AS HIS LIFE."

The great preacher came and by him was the funeral oration spoken. The service was held upon the lawn in front of his big house at the edge of town, for no building in the village was large enough to hold the multitude that gathered. Besides, the day was of Spring and exceeding fair.

The great preacher's tongue was not so fluent as usual and at times it seemed difficult for him to recall a word or round out a sentence. But at the close of his short address and with a flash of his wonted brilliance he said so that everybody heard:

"MY GOOD PEOPLE, I NEVER PREACHED A SERMON HALF SO ELOQUENT OR SO EFFECTIVE FOR GOOD AS THIS MAN'S LIFE. NOTHING I CAN SAY TODAY COULD POSSIBLY BE AS HELPFUL OR AS INEFFABLY TENDER AS YOUR OWN MEMORIES OF HIS LIFE AMONG YOU."

And this is all that need be told unless it be one other incident of the funeral.

When the people were pasing slowly by to look once more and for the last time on the peaceful face of Stonebridge, a man lifted up a child, a curly haired boy of five, so that he could see the familiar features. In one chubby fist the boy held a single violet that a few minutes before he had plucked at the base of a great oak tree nearby. On the spur of the second, but fully conscious of what he was doing, the boy's chubby fist relaxed and opened and the modest flower fell on the glass just over the face of Stonebridge.

And after this not a single word was spoken by any one till the voice of the great preacher was lifted in prayer at the grave-side.

This is the story of Stonebridge. As was explained in the beginning, it had of necessity to be short since there was both so little and so much to tell.

A Matter of Emphasis

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

All summer I have been hearing the bands play a little melody whose characteristic is a very pronounced syncopation, accentuated by a rest where the accent ordinarily would come. It started somewhere on the Pacific coast, and by this time, I doubt not, has gone to the Atlantic. I heard it many times before I knew the title or the words, and when I saw it in print at length neither the words nor the title showed any particular merit. The popularity of the song was in the music, and the music owed its popularity to this shifting of the accent.

The theme was commonplace; and if I could print it here in musical type as it would be without the syncopation and as it is with the syncopation, you would look twice before you discovered the difference. What is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee? In this case I should judge it would be at least ten thousand dollars. Without at all knowing the amount of the composer's royalties, I make the conservative guess that he has put away in the bank not less than that amount, based almost wholly on the clever little trick of shifting the accent.

Bad Syncopation.

There is more than we have supposed in emphasis. There is a venerable tradition concerning a minister who many generations ago preached a convincing sermon on "The Existence of God." He divided the sermon into two parts, and preached in the morning the half containing all the arguments he could find to prove that there is no God. In the afternoon he preached the other half of the sermon. It was a fine morning, and the church was full. The whole community learned such reasons as the preacher could discover for doubting the existence of God. In the afternoon it rained, and nobody knows what arguments the minister adduced on that side. It was a rather bad syncopation, was it not?

It Grows Upon Me.

It grows upon me that some preachers overdevelop the negative side of some of their sermons. Recently I heard of one. An able preacher, at a large representative gathering, undertook to set forth the losses and gains of modern thinking. He enlarged upon the losses and used up nearly all his time. Having finished the negative part of his discourse, he looked at his watch, saw to his surprise how nearly his time was gone, hastily jumbled the positive part of it into a few generalities and sat down. He left on people's minds a very clear and disheartening impression of the losses, but a most blurred and indistinct idea of the gains.

The effective preacher must consider not merely the material of his discourse, but also the questions of proportion, and position, and emphasis.

First Five Minutes Valuable.

Shakespeare taught us that "All's well that ends well." But it is almost hopeless to undertake to redeem a bad beginning by a good ending. Very generally preachers underestimate the value of the first five minutes of a sermon. Then is when people's minds are fresh. They are alert, curious, expectant. These minutes should not be wasted in mere passage-work. Whether the introduction be long or short, its emphasis should be unmistakable. The introduction should lead by a natural, easy and perfectly clear route to the sermon itself; and the key-note of the sermon should be made emphatic.

Emphasize Vital Point.

I believe that many a mediocre sermon could be made to throb with life and thrill with power if its emphasis were placed on the really vital point.

David Swing had a sermon from the text: "And the door was now shut." He read the text and put his whole introduction into these words:

"This text teaches that there are some things which must be done soon if they are done at all."

What he said after that was not unimportant—but relatively it counted for little. That solemn sentence was a sermon. The emphasis of the sermon was unmistakable. All he had to do was to show what were some of the things that needed to be done at once and to keep the emphasis on those that are supremely important.

Revise Next Sunday's Sermon!

Take the sermon you have prepared for next Sunday. It is a good sermon—and says what you want to say. But it can be a good sermon so far as its subject within goes, and say what you want to say, and yet be lifeless, monotonous and wearisome.

Is there not some way of making the main point a little more emphatic? Can you not go through the sermon and ask, What are the real things that I want the people who hear this sermon to take away with them? Not the negations, surely; they are but the background shadows of your high lights of affirmation. Sketch in the shadows rapidly, the depressing things, the doubtful conjectures, and keep them very thoroughly in the background. Unless you are sure you can do this, leave them out altogether. That is not the best art, for there must be shade as well as light, negation as well as affirmation, in any complete survey of the truth, but see that your emphasis comes strong upon the clear, positive statement of your faith.

Pause Before Key Word.

Even the verbal utterance of it gives opportunity for an emphasis not always used. Few men utter their longer sentences without some kind of pause; utter them so that the pause shall come before the key word. I have known a preacher whose sermons were always remembered, I think more for this one cause than any other, that when he had an impressive thing to say, he said it impressively, pausing an infinitesimal instant just before the word he wished to make emphatic. That little pause was eloquent. I remember a popular lecturer who said a most commonplace thing to a Boston audience, and it was received with delight, just because of a little pause: "The soil of Massachusetts is said not to be very fertile, but it can produce beans—and brains." There was not much wit in that sentence, but it went for the full value of a fine bit of humor; and three-fourths of it was in the pause that produced the emphasis.

Honest Dogmatism Good.

Yet it is not of elocution I write, but of the substance of a sermon. I do not say that a sermon is no place for negations, for that is not true. Negation is one aspect of the truth, of every truth, and something of negation a sermon must contain. But do not be afraid of a little honest dogmatism. Be perfectly sure about a few essential facts—God, and the soul's need of the Gospel of Christ, and the value of godliness, and the hope of eternal life—just a few of those fundamental truths, considered always in the light of the need of men's souls. Put one of these in the place of emphasis, and let the ring upon it be unmistakable. And you will be surprised to see how a sermon that contains essentially the same subject matter can grow a new soul through a mere matter of emphasis.

Let the Leaders of Unity Practice It!

Editors The Christian Century: One Sunday recently I invited a friend of mine, an Episcopal clergyman, to fill my pulpit. He gladly consented and preached a sermon which pleased and edified the people. This friend and I have had many conversations about Christian union. We agree that the Episcopal and Christian churches take the lead in the movement for Christian union. Both have established councils on Christian union, pray for Christian union and give largely for this cause.

Yet my friend and I agree, that these two great churches are inconsistent toward each other and toward other churches in their plea for union.

The Episcopal church will not recognize ministers of other churches as ministers because they are not in the "true apostolic succession;" and the Christian church will not receive most members of the Episcopal church because they have not been immersed.

My friend and I believe in the essential Christianity of each other's communion but he can not receive me into his pulpit and I can not receive him into my church without our violating the rules and traditions of our respective churches.

What a blessed thing it would be if these two great churches could come to an understanding in their leadership for Christian union! They can not be expected to be taken very seriously when one of them refuses to recognize the majority of the Christian ministry and the other refuses to recognize the majority of the Christian membership of fellow protestant churches.

A solemn and awe-inspiring bishop was examining a class of girls, and asked: "What is the best preparation for the sacrament of matrimony?" "A little coortin,' me lord!" was the unexpected reply of one of the number.

The Moral Leaders of Israel

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XLIII. Jonah and the Wider Hope

October 29. Text for Special Study, Jonah 4.

1. THE BROADER VISION.

It was noted in the last section, in connection with the study of Joel, that there were two distinct tendencies in the thought of the post-exilic community, in reference to the value and mission of the restored Israel. The first took its rise from the intense loyalty to the national idea which voiced itself in Ezekiel, and was to a large degree the chief factor in arousing the scattered fragments of Israel to the efforts which resulted in the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the restoration of some of its former importance. This feeling of the worth of Zion was intensified by the more zealous nationalists in the post-exilic period. It expressed itself in new forms of hope and self-satisfaction in the book of Joel, and went forward with increasing power in the direction of Phariseeism, such as Jesus found predominant in the Jewish life of his day.

On the other hand the prophets of the exile perceived that Israel had a value quite apart from its own national importance. Its mission was world-wide. To permit it to live merely for its own sake was of little moment. The restoration of Jerusalem was necessary in order that her people might become a prophet nation to speak the word of God to all mankind. This widening vision of Israel's prophetic responsibilities is most notably expressed in various utterances of the Evangelical Prophet. In various sections of in chapters 40-55 or the Book of Isaiah, it is distinctly affirmed that the business of the Servant of Jehovah, the ideal nation, is not merely to restore the people to their homeland and to rebuild Jerusalem, but is to become a messenger to the nation of the world in behalf of the true God.

This deeper responsibility was felt by but few of the people, if we are to judge from the developments of Judaism. But there were choice spirits who reacted against the narrow and insular tendencies of the time. Their protests were all but unheeded in the strong movement toward the strengthening of Judaism. But the protest was apparently made with vigor, and one of its literary memorials is found in the Book of Jonah.

2. THE BOOK OF JONAH.

This little volume is one of the most precious and inspiring of the shorter prophetic works. It differs from most of the books which bear the names of prophets in the fact that it is not the report of the sermons of the preacher, but rather a story based upon a prophetic life. Of the prophet Jonah very little is known. To him reference is made as a preacher in the reign of Jereboam II, shortly before the fall of the northern kingdom (2) Kings 14:25).

The literary form and content of the Book of Jonah make it clear that the work belongs to a period far later than the events of which it speaks, and it seems probable that it is to be placed in the age immediately succeeding the reforms of Ezra, and finds its motive in the protest which it so admirably registers against that false nationalism which esteemed the Jew and his institutions at a value far beyond that of any other people, and generated a vicious pride in all that was distinctively Jewish.

Whether or not the incidents recorded in the Book of Jonah are historical or merely symbolic is the problem which the reader must face as soon as the book is opened. Many modern students of the Bible regard the book as a parable, attempting to illustrate, in the person of Jonah a prophet of the distant past, the narrow prejudices of the Jewish people of the age in which the Book was written, as contrasted with the universal and tender love of God. There is no reason why a prophet living in the later times from which this Book seems to emerge, might not have employed a tradition of some prophetic journey to a heathen city, to enforce his message of the fatherhood of God and the wider hope for the heathen world.

3. THE REPENTANCE OF NINEVEH.

The story told in the Book of Jonah relates to the divine command to the prophet to take his journey to the distant and hated city of Nineveh on the Tigris, the capital of the Assyrian empire, and the cruel ruler of the world of that day. He was there to preach a message of repentance and divine forgiveness. The prophet, who shares the national feelings of vindictive hatred against everything Assyrian, determines to evade the summons, and takes his departure in precisely the opposite direction.

He goes down to the port at Joppa and embarks in a westward-sailing merchant ship, destined to the port of Tarshish in the regions of Gaul or Britain. But a terrible storm overtakes the ship in which the recreant prophet is journeying. When all other means of averting shipwreck have failed, Jonah bids the sailors cast him overboard, assuring them that he is the cause of the trouble. He is miraculously saved, however, by a great fish, and is presently set down again upon the coast of Palestine.

The call of God comes to him a second time to go Nineveh and preach the message and now the chastened prophet no longer hesitates. He perceives that it is impossible to evade his duty. He journeys to Nineveh, hoping, however that his message of warning and his summons to the city to repent may be unheeded. Hating Nineveh as he does, the last of his desires is that it should turn from its evil ways and be spared the impending destruction.

But to his utter astonishment and dismay he awakens instant response on the part of its inhabitants. From king to beggar they give attention and turn from their evil ways. The repentance of the city is universal. Everyone wears the tokens of humiliation and penitence. Even the beasts of the field are clothed in sackcloth. No such moral revolution was ever known. But the prophet, though completely successful in his mission, is unhappy because he had hoped that the city might perish.

The student must recognize in this narrative a dramatic effort to picture the state of mind in which the post-exilic community found itself in regard to all the heathen peoples about. The intensity of self-righteous hatred which Judaism bred against foreigners could only be represented in some such graphic picture as this.

The difficulties of the narrative need not prove perplexing. The story of the great fish, over which such controversies have raged, is merely a minor episode in the story. It is not impossible that the author used this feature of the story to represent in symbolic manner the swallowing up of Israel in the Babylonian exile, and its providential restoration to the soil of the holy Land.

The prayer of Jonah in the belly of the great fish is apparently taken from the literature of the Psalms, and scarcely describes the supposed condition of the prophet at the time it was uttered. Yet the author apparently found it to his liking, and employed it in this impressive way. The chief difficulty of all, the repentance of Nineveh at the preaching of a Hebrew prophet is the chief miracle of a book that is full of wonders. But all these features are subsidiary to the author's purpose, which is to enforce the principle that an alien people is often more likely to give heed to a message from God than those who have received the full disclosure of his grace, and that in the divine character there can be no narrow partiality which would lavish its affection upon one people and leave the rest of the world unloved and unforgiven.

4. THE PETULANT PROPHET.

But Jonah, who should have rejoiced beyond all expression at the triumphant success of his preaching, is only petulant and depressed. He had hoped to see Nineveh remain obdurate, assured as he was that then it would perish. Even yet he was not without hope that some turn of events might bring on the longed-for destruction.

In this mood he placed himself near the gate of the city to watch the course of events. It was very hot in the plain of the Tigris, and the sun beat down with merciless heat upon the prophet's head. Then suddenly a gourd vine grew up and sheltered him from the heat, and in this he rejoiced, blessing the leaves that gave him protection. But God cut down the gourd vine through the lowly instrument of a worm, at its roots, and the prophet again was stifled by the blazing sun. In anger and despair he cursed his evil fortune and mourned the loss of the gourd.

It is at this point that the lesson of the book is clearly revealed. God speaks to the prophet and asks him whether he has cause to complain. Jonah asserts petulantly that his anger is well justified, because the gourd was innocent of all offense and was his protection and delight. Then comes the final word of rebuke and instruction, "Thou hast had regard for the gourd, for which thou has not labored, neither madest it to grow; which came up in a night and perished in a night; and should I not have regard for Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left, and also much cattle?"

5. THE MESSAGE OF LOVE.

Thus abruptly ends the little book of the prophet Jonah. Who its author was we do not know, but its message is perfectly clear and is one of the most beautiful in the Old Testament. Its emphasis is upon the divine love which sees in Israel not the only people whom God can love, but the ones whom he has chosen to become the ministers of redemption to the rest of the world.

It is apparent that our Saviour delighted in the message of this book. More than once he referred to it, because it was familiar to the people and he could use its scenes to illustrate his own ministry. "The sign of the prophet Jonah" was used by him with telling effect in reproof of the Jewish spirit in his own day. The people would not listen to his preaching and demanded a sign. But he referred them to this Old Testament story of a wicked heathen city turning to repentance at the preaching of a prophet; and he a greater than Jonah, stood unregarded among those to whom he had been sent (Matt. 12:38-41; 16:4; Luke 11:29-32.)

In this prophet book the yearning love of God for all humanity is set forth in its most beautiful form. The minor and unimportant features of the book, such as have usually occupied the atention of interpreters, sink out of sight in comparison with this central and commanding lesson.

That there were such open-minded spirits in Judea, even in days when the narrow nationalistic impulse was hardening into Pharisaic orthodoxy, was one of the facts which provided Jesus with a little circle of willing listeners. Perhaps of that inner and precious group in Judaism, Simeon, the aged worshipper in the temple, is the best illustration. When the infant was brought for presentation by his parents, the old man received him in his arms exclaiming, "Now Lord lettest thou thy servant depart in peace according to thy word for mine eyes have seen thy salvation" (Luke 29:30). If Judaism could have received Jesus in that spirit, the whole story of the chosen race, and the history of religion in the world, might have been different.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES.

Topic October 29; A Missionary Journey Around the World. X—Missions in Europe. Acts 16:6-15.

Missions in Europe, in one respect at least, are the same as in the United States. Europe is a Christian country at least nominally. One at first flash is ready to say there is no need for missionary work there. If we think of missions in the sense in which we use it with respect to heathen missions of course that would be true. But that is a very narrow sense in which to use the term. But if we use missions in the sense of bringing individuals into vital relations to Christ, and this is the one comprehensive and true sense in which it should be used, it can very properly be used both in Christian and non-Christian countries.

Europe has all the problems incident to a highly wrought civilization. She has the large city with its attendant evils—congestion, poverty, great wealth, disease, dissipation, and over work. At bottom all these arise out of greed, appetite, ambitions—in a word selfishness. The civilization there being older, and less democratic and the territory more densely populated, many of the conditions are much more acute than in this country. All the reason that we might urge upon ourselves for missionary work in the great cities of America can, yes, must be urged in the interest of the European people. We need no better proof of the truth of this statement than to behold the standard of living of the southern European immigrant. Poor, illiterate, ignorant not only of the laws of the land but of health and sanitation. Many of them even if they are not outright criminals and vicious, either become dependent or carriers of contagious diseases. They are enemies not only to their neighbors but to themselves as well. If Christianity be an interpretation of life, as we believe it to be, there can be no more Christian work than this, besides we have the direct example of our Lord as he lived his life in Palestine ministering to the needy and the unfortunate with whom he came in contact in his earthly ministry.

But there is one other need in European missions that does not prevail so extensively in America. I refer to the fact of infidelity. The people of the Old World have rebelled in large numbers against the church. The tyranny of the Catholic Church, both Greek and Roman, has driven many of the people who have carried the budren which the church and the state have seen fit to place upon them, into rebellion. They believe that the church is the enemy of their welfare and for the privileged few. They have consequently rebelled against both the state and the church. Many others have rebelled against the church and not the state. Russia is the most striking example of the former and France of the latter. Moreover these people who have forsaken the church have made the other step and attempted to throw Christianity overboard as well. These people are infidels many of them. This is especially true of the Catholic countries. This is not true of England. The leaders in the Catholic Church in this country bear this out when they say that they lose 71 per cent of their immigrant members. The mission work to be done then is to win these people back to Christianity. A task that is doubly hard. It would be far easier to win them had they never been misinstructed in regard to the will of God as revealed in Jesus Christ.

The Closet.

The globe-trotter sometimes tells us of his admiration for the Mohammedan's public prostrations, his prayers upon the deck of a ship, at the corner of the street or amid the bustling of a sudden encampment of the caravan; but the student of spiritual phenomena realizes that worship which is needlessly open, not to say intentionally ostentatious, lacks the spirit of devotion.

Some undiscerning commentators tell us that "Private prayer is a duty because Christ commanded it." Christ commanded it because that privacy was and is in accord with its nature. Every profound emotion shrinks from public gaze, and when religion becomes personal and not merely traditional, it draws the curtain and excludes the world.

One of the hardships of poverty is that its love-making must be done in public. Who can see without a touch of pity Hans and Gretchen strolling down the street hand in hand, or Haakon and Hilda with their arms around each other in the public park? They try to forget the grinning fools who pass behind them, but they nevertheless feel the hard conditions of a lot which forces them to make public what instinct teaches them to sacredly reserve.

It is the same with sorrow. When the arrow strikes deep the wounded deer seeks the depths of the forest. When we are with our dead, we "shut to the door." The heart knoweth its own bitterness and a stranger doth not intermeddle with its joy." Grief as well as love asks to be let alone. It is a trifling hurt which can be bound up amid the garrulous comments of the passing public.

When a soul is truly religious there is therefore a certain reserve to be noted even about its quasi-public manifestations. An acceptable prayer in the temple is modeled on the closet-form. When the leader of public prayer makes it evident by his words that he is thinking of the congregation, his prayer becomes an offense. Even when surrounded by thousands, the man who prays acceptably must make manifest a certain forgetfulness of his companions in the act of supplication.

This closet-prayer is possible everywhere. "I hold many a prayer-meeting under my hat," said a parishioner to us years ago. Such walking with God is invisible to the world, but its results are evident. When Moses held converse with Jehovah the people in the camp did not see God, but they saw the face of Moses changed.

The Bible College of Missouri and Social Work

The Bible College of Missouri is carrying out the worthy ambition of becoming a living place, as well as a school, for its students. Definite plans for making it a social, as well as an educational institution, have been adopted. The purpose is that the students shall not only study Christianity, but practice its principles as well in a common life. One of the commodious rooms on the first floor has been turned into a social meeting place, and following the proverb of the old preacher who said, "A yard of boy is worth a hundred yards of carpet," the handsome carpet has remained on the floor.

Here students of both the Bible College and the University may meet. Here in social gatherings we shall study religion from the social point of view. Ministers of the other churches will be invited to come in and speak and fraternize, for we have many of their young people within our doors. The mayor of the town, who in Columbia, by the way, is a minister, will talk about the proper management of a municipality. Anti-saloon workers and reformers will enlighten us on their field of work. Thus our students will not only read books, but also study life.

Even if the Bible College of Missouri were not so ready to adopt this social activity, it would be forced upon it by the very nature of its location. The town of Columbia, with all of its schools, is a great social meeting and mixing place, and of that I shall have more to say in future lines. R. W. GENTRY, Field Secretary.

A Christmas Gift to Christ!

To the Churches of Our Brotherhood:—I wish to make an appeal and a suggestion. Our mission work on all the fields is suffering for lack of funds. Teachers cannot be employed, new schools cannot be built, new evangelists cannot be sent forth. The forces of unbelief are becoming more and more aggressive. The hour of the final struggle between Christianity and Heathenism has struck. Shall we stand or fall?

Friends in Christ, we are justly proud of the past achievements of our Brotherhood. Are we going to permit the disgrace of retracting on the mission fields to blot out that past glory? Would you not send men and money to save New York from an attack? What is New York compared to the world! Christ came to save the world. The greatest work of "The Church of Christ" is to carry out the great work which Christ came to do.

My suggestion is this: May every Church send a Christmas gift of five dollars ($5.00) to the F. M. C. S. It will mean the most blessed Christmas you ever spent. Who will start the Christmas gifts rolling—the Christmas gifts to Christ? G. E. MILLER.

A man is rich in proportion to the number of things which he can afford to let alone. —Thoreau.

Illinois Department

State Office, 24 Illinois National Bank Bldg., Springfield

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

Rochester Irwin, who preaches at Long Point, is holding a meeting at Barryton, Mich.

Robert E. Henry, pastor of Niantic Church, is holding a promising revival meeting for his home church.

Major Griffith's meeting at Rindlay har resulted in six additions during the first week.

A short meeting has recently been concluded at Calhoun by D. Logan. There were three additions, two being conversions.

During the first week in October, W. H. Waggoner, of Eureka, held a Missionary Institute at Carmi.

Edmund C. Sarchett is in a revival meeting at Bath. There were two additions by profession of faith during the first week.

H. W. Williams addressed the Hamilton County annual meeting at McLeansboro, the first Sunday in October. It was decided to hold the meeting next year at Mt. Pleasant.

John A. Sweet and the congregation at Humboldt have the help of Lew D. Hill and his singer, Clinton B. Knowles, in a revival meeting.

The pastor at Carbondale, Adam K. Adcock, is to have G. E. Crist, a singer of Ohio, to assist him in a revival meeting beginning the first Sunday in November.

A revival meeting is being held at Eaton which, notwithstanding the very unfavorable weather, at last reports, had resulted in fourteen additions.

At Arrowsmith, Joseph Gaylor, of Missouri, conducted a revival meeting, in which there were thirty additions, twenty-two of them being on confession of faith.

Allen T. Shaw is beginning his work at Macomb with an auspicious outlook. The congregation are increasing and unusual interest is being manifested.

The church at Sidell, where P. F. York preaches, very generously sent 170 quarts of canned fruit to the Orphans' Home in St. Louis.

C. R. Wolford, recently pastor at Blandinsville, and who succeeded in accomplishing a work of unusual merit in that field, has accepted the pastorate at Bement.

The church at Browns is pastorless since the resignation of D. M. Rurham, who accepted a pastorate in Minnesota after laboring with the church there for three years.

At the home-coming celebration at White Hall, Evangelist E. E. Violet delivered the chief address. The first year of Mr. Violet's ministry was spent with the church in this town.

O. C. Bolman, pastor of the church at Pekin, Ill., reports that the prospects for their revival meeting, just begun, are promising. He is holding his own meeting, being assisted by Leroy Sargent, song leader.

During the first week of a revival meeting at Vienna, in which the pastor, J. T. Alsup, is assisted by Evangelist Pickens, there were eleven additions four of whom were on confession of faith.

During the first week of the meeting at Waynesville, being held by the pastor, F. L. Davis, there were ten additions, seven being on confession of faith. The meeting is continuing.

C. B. Black, living at Centralia, has closed his ministry at Milton, where he has been accomplishing a successful work during the last two years. Mr. Black can be induced to accept another pastorate.

H. A. Davis concluded a revival meeting at Antioch, located near Rossville, which added to the church thirty-five, all but five being conversions. The pastor here is P. J. Lough.

Ancona congregation enjoyed a rally service, lasting for a week, under the leadership of E. K. Higdon. During the week there were two additions. Buy L. Zerby preaches for this church.

The church at Augusta, ministered to by Edwin T. Cornelius, held its re-dedication services last Sunday. The congregation is now being led in a meeting by Evangelists F. A. Sword and J. A. Kay.

W. W. Weedon began his new pastorate at Mt. Carmel the last Sunday in September. He finds the congregation active, and has been received most cordialy by the membership of the church and the citizens of the town.

The pastor at Mt. Vernon, J. H. Stambaugh, held two short metings in Kentucky, resulting in three additions. Mr. Stambaugh has just concluded the first year of his pastorate at Mt. Vernon and looks forward to increased results during the next year.

C. E. French began his fourth years as minister of the church of Tallula. There is co-operative spirit between pastor and church at this place, which prophesies results of even larger proportions than during the first three years of the pastorate.

Andrew Scott, district secretary of the Sixth District, held a meeting for more than two weeks at Monticello, in Piatt County. The meeting was held in the Baptist church, and an organization was effected with twenty charter members.

G. W. Ford, the minister at West Salem, is having the assistance of J. E. Moyer, of Francesville, in a revival meeting. Mr. Ford recently assisted D. M. Durham in a short meeting at West Village, which resulted in eight additions by baptism.

revival meeting was held at Darrow by A. W. Crabb and wife of Brazil, Ind. There were forty-three additions, all but eleven being on confessions of faith. The church here has been organized only a few months. A new house is being erected. Leslie Crown, of Eureka, is preaching for the congregation.

Bethany Church, in Fayette County, had the services of Wright Spurlin in a short meeting, during which there were twenty conversions and five additions otherwise to the congregation. Mr. Spurlin is the pastor of this church, having been located here only a few months, but has succeeded in infusing a new spirit in the membership.

G. W. Morton has been with the new church at Beardstown for a year, during which there were thirty-eight additions to the church, a net gain of thirty-three. All current expense bills have been met, and a small balance remains in the treasury. The congregation starts its second year in a hopeful mood.

In accordance with the wish of the state convention two Bible-school classes of the church at Jacksonville, Ill., have pledged $25 each toward the support of Miss Mildred Syester in ther work among the students of the state university at Champaign. These gifts will support Miss Syester for two months. Other Bible-school classes could do wall to imitate the worthy action of the classes of the agressive church at Jacksonville.

Charles E. Smith, new pastor at Du Quoin, writes concerning his new work as follows: "After closing my work for Bethany College I have begun service with the Main St., Christian Church of this place where a very warm welcome has been extended. Karl D. Pope, the superintendent of Sunday-school, and his helpers arranged that a Rally Day gathering extend the welcome. The attendance usually runs at 250 to 300 and their plans were to have 400 present a half hour before the regular time and $25 collection. There were 427 present and a collection of $33.75. A very fine special program was rendered and when the new minister was introduced the whole school church had supplied the parsonage with a new bath-room besides papering and painting the parsonage within and without so that Mrs. Smith and the kindergarten found very comfortable quarters arranged. Many little courtesies have shown us how much we are wanted to feel at home and it is a pleasure to record that the former minister, G. W. Wise, of DeLand, is held in warm affection here. Our first month closed with a sermon at a union of all the churches in the Presbyterian church where many were turned away for lack of room. Reception tomorrow night. One addition last Sunday."

Secretary's Letter.

W. H. Kern of Grayville is a good man and is available for another location. Write him.

The big posters and literature for "Illinois Day" were mailed to the preachers and church clerks this week with the request that the posters be hung up in the churches at once and that the literature be read carefully. The one great need of our missionary interests is the dissemination of information concerning the needs of the field and the work already accomplished. When the people know the facts they will gladly support the work our society is doing. Of this we are sure. Tell the people. Explain the work. Point out the needs. Quote the figures. Urge the claims. The good brethren and sisters will do the rest—give.

Orin L. Carle, Centralia, is available for work.

Charles D. Hougham of Arrowsmith, who has been farming a year for a rest, is now available for a good field. He was formerly the popular and successful pastor at Streator.

The church at Mt. Carmel gave their minister, W. W. Weedon, and his wife a great reception on Sept. 28. His work there begins most auspiciously.

We hear very unwelcome news from Decatur and Jacksonville this week. O. W. Lawrence, pastor of the Central Church, Decatur, has resigned and goes to North Yakima, Wash., and R. F. Thrapp, pastor of the First Church, Jacksonville, resigned last Sunday and has accepted a call to the First Church, Los Angeles, Cal. These are among the very best men in the state, both members of the Board of Directors of the I. C. M. S., Brother Thrapp being the president.

The field secretary is on the wing, visiting many places this month, in the interest of the November offering. District secretaries and evangelists are also busy in rallies and with literature pushing for a great offering. All at it and always at it. This is the only way to bring results. Teach the people and lay the obligation kindly upon their hearts and we believe they will respond generously.

This office would like to get the present address of Bro. A. H. Gamble, formerly at Dixon and Chicago. A line to us will be greatly appreciated.

Chicago

The Chicago ministerial association met in regular session Monday, October 9, at the Boston Oyster House at the noon hour, with a large group present. C. A. Pearce, of West Pullman, read a paper on "John Wesley and his Social Message." The contents of the paper were grealy appreciated, and an interesting discussion followed.

A rifle club has been organized among the men of the Jackson Boulevard Church. A target has been set up in the basement of the "annex." Much interest is manifest.

Thursday, October 12, was observed in Chicago, as a legal holiday, commemorating the 419th anniversary of the discovery of America. Mayor Harrison issued a proclamation closing all departments of the city except police, fire, electrical and health. An immense pageant stretching along the lake front, and the landing of "Columbus at Grant Park, were features in the days program.

Wm. H. Shuey's delightful story of his "Cruise around the World" was heard by a large and appreciative audience at the Memorial Church Friday evening, Oct. 13.

A regular business and social meeting of the Chicago Business Men's Association will be held Thursday evening at 6:30 p. m., in the "White Room" of the Boston Oyster House. The price of the tickets is $1. No social union banquet has been held for some time, and this occasion with its fellowship and excellent program, should be taken advantage of by many Chicago Disciples. Austin Hunter, C. G. Kindred and H. L. Willett will speak.

The quarterly assembly at Chicago Disciples was held Sunday afternoon, October 8, at the First Methodist Church. In point at attendance it was one of the best assemblies the Disciples have had for many years. Nearly every church was represented by a large delegation. About 450 were in attendance. The work among the mission churches was explained, and new ideals given for the future city work.

George B. Evans, pastor for over three years at Chagrin Falls, Ohio, has resigned his work there to accept a unanimous call to the church at North Tonawanda, N. Y. Mr. Evans begins his new work Nov. 1.

R. N. Simpson, pastor of the Central Church, New Albany, Ind., and some of his men recently assisted in the organization of a men's brotherhood at the church at Corydon. The new organization boasts of thirty-two members.

More than 200 delegates were in attendance at the annual convention of the Disciples of Virginia, assembled at the Thirteenth Church of Christ, Newport News. Miss Florence Miller addressed the C. W. B. M. session.

The annual report of the church at West Park Church, Indianapolis, Ind., shows a net gain of forty-five members during the past year. W. D. Bartle is the pastor. The West Park Church begins a meeting with Fred R. Davies of Charlestown, Ind., about Oct. 23.

L. G. Batman of Youngstown, Ohio, has begun four series of sermons on "The Man of Galilee." The church at this place is planning to coöperate in the great union revival to be conducted by Evangelist Henry Ostrom.

An "announcement extraordinary" has been received from the South Broadway Church, Denver, Colo., stating that B. B. Tyler will deliver a series of sermons on the "Book of Acts" as his part of the Men and Religion Forward Movement.

William John Minges recently closed a meeting at Herington, Kansas, with five hundred and sixteen added. He reports that the pastor, Mr. Schmidt, and his people are planning the erection of a $20,000 church building, with all the money pledged.

D. A. Wickizer has resigned his charge at Tulsa, Okla., to accept the office of secretary of the Oklahoma Christian Missionary Society. During his pastorate of about three years over 700 were added to the church. He was ever interested in civic affairs.

The sixth district convention of the Michigan Christian Missionary convened Oct. 4, at Owosso with thirty-five out-of-town delegates present. Dr. Jennie Crozier of India, spoke to the junior workers on the work in the Orient. M. H. Garrard, president of the society, and H. J. Derthick were on the program.

October 1 marked the closing of twenty-one years of service among the Dallas, Tex., churches by M. M. Davis. For eighteen years he was pastor of the Central Church, during which time 3,300 persons were received into the church and a handsome new brick edifice erected. For the last three years Mr. Davis has been pastor of the Ross Avenue Church.

Word is received from the missionaries at Bolenge, Africa, that 122 persons were baptized there July 2. The large brick tabernacle is nearing completion. Seventeen chiefs representing large towns in the interior came a few days after the baptisms to ask for teachers. One of them has already become a Disciple.

The state board of Iowa Disciples are planning for a state wide revival to be held in the several hundred churches in that state. The following secretaries have been appointed; F. E. Smith, Cedar Rapids, northeast district; S. M. Perkins, Davenport, southeast district; H. E. VanHorn, Des Moines, central district; Loren Howe, Cherokee, northwest district and B. S. Denny, Des Moines, general district.

A meeting is now in progress at Hood River, Ore., where T. S. Handsaker ministers. He is being assisted by C. L. Organ.

R. A. Long, C. M. Chilton and party, on the brotherhood tour, held sessions at Bloomington, Ind., Thursday, October 19.

A. W. Kokendoffer, pastor of First Church, Sedalia, Mo., began a series of evangelistic services on Oct. 2, at First Church, Paris, Mo., where Frank W. Allen ministers.

G. W. McQuiddy preached his last sermon for the church at Alva, Oklahoma, Sunday, Oct. 1. Mr. McQuiddy has accepted a call to Oklahoma City.

The Bible-school at Chillicothe and Brookfield, Mo., are in a contest. Thus far the Chillicothe school leads by two hundred points.

Evangelist R. W. Abberly and song leader, LeRoy St. John, are closing their meeting for the Springfield, Mo. Church. Over 120 persons joined the church.

Herbert L. Willett has been appointed by Governor Deneen as one of the Illinois delegates to the convention of the National Prison Reform Association which meets in Omaha, Neb., this month.

William Bayard Craig, who has ministered at Lenox Avenue Church, New York, for the past two years, has resigned and will remove to California where he will take up the work at Redlands.

Geo. H. Nicol, pastor at Red Oak, Iowa, held a meeting recently with twenty-one additions. Charles E. McVay assisted in the singing. Mr. McVay is now in a meeting at State Line, Ind.

The report from Hiram College is very encouraging. There is ten per cent increase in enrolment over previous years. President Bates appears on the program of the convention of the associated colleges, now convening at Des Moines.

W. A. Harp has taken up the work at Collinwood Church, Cleveland, Ohio. He reports that the church is growing and expectant. There were 483 in attendance at the Bible-school rally of the church, on a recent Sunday.

The state convention of Kansas churches, held recently at Parsons, was a notable meeting in many ways. The attendance was large and an excellent program and encouraging report will give the state work a fresh impetus.

F. F. Walters has closed his meeting at Weston, Mo., with a number of additions, and is now conducting evangelistic services at Savonburg, Kan. Mr. Walters dedicated the Grand View Church, Oct. 1. It was necessary to raise $400 to cover the indebtedness and $500 was subscribed.

The receipts of the C. W. B. M. for the year were $333,534.85 against $337,948.63 for last year. The $400,000 mark at which this organization of Christian women aimed the past year will be "aimed at" another year, and it is safe to predict that it will be hit.

M. M. Nelson, of Monte Vista, Colorado, has accepted a call to the Highlands Christian Church of Denver and will move there January 1. The church at Monte Vista is in splendid condition and can pay a salary of $1,200. Ministers desiring to make application should write J. C. Haggard, clerk. Applications should be accompanied by letters of commendation.

The members of the Brotherhood, at the First Church of Vincennes, Ind., have planned to do more substantial work. They have tabooed the banquet idea, and are planning to study the "Gospel of the Kingdom" by Josiah Strong. Dr. Stanley Coulter, of Purdue University, has been engaged by the men to deliver a series of addresses during the month of October.

Rebert M. Hopkins, American Bible-school superintendent, has prepared a missionary exercise on entirely new lines for the use of the Bible-schools on "Bible-school Day for American Missions" this fall. This program is to be used during the usual Sunday-school hour and is intended to develop the spirit of self-sacrifice among the scholars. It is hoped that their money may be more intelligently given.

A noteworthy pastorate both in length of service and accomplishment is that of George R. Rutledge who has served Third Church, Philadelphia, Pa., for the past fourteen years. The membership has grown steadily until it now numbers 600; the Sunday-school has nearly as large an enrollment with an average attendance of 400. The pastor has a class of 150 men who attend regularly. Every department of the church is manifesting harmony and activity.

The death of B. F. Coulter, the merchant preacher of Los Angeles, Calif., removes an outstanding figure. Mr. Coulter's store stands to Los Angeles as Marshall Field's to Chicago. With his own friends he built a church in his city and filled its pulpit himself for many years. His views were nonprogressive and his church has had practically no fellowship with other Disciples' churches in missionary activity. Mr. Coulter and Professor McGarvey, life long friends, passed away in the same day.

At the close of evangelistic meetings Nov. 1, J. B. Hunley will conclude his ministry of three years and two months with the Neosho, Mo. church. During his stay the church debt has been reduced by $8,000, 175 have been added to the membership and four young men have decided to enter the ministry. A strong C. W. B. M. auxiliary and a fine choir of competent musicians have been developed by Mrs. Hunley. During November he will conduct a meeting at Vinita, Okla., at the close of which he will join Chas. Reign Scoville.

The following note relating to the work of A. C. Smither at Los Angeles, Cal., is copied from the St. Louis Republic. "During my ministry an average of 125 members a year have been added to the church. The people are harmonious and the work posperous. The church gives from $2,500 to $4,000 a year for missionary work. During my stay, I have preached 1,632 sermons. The church has been a leader in co-operative work among the churches of the city."

The annual convention of the Disciples of the Wheeling district convened at the Wheeling Island Church, Oct. 4. This district comprises the churches in Hancock, Brooke, and Ohio counties of West Virginia. W. E. Pierce, of Pittsburg, delivered an address on "The One Body in Coöperation." Other addresses were delivered by W. B. Taylor, Bethany College and D. L. M. Robinson, of Cameron. The report of the district secretary, F. M. Biddle, of Wellsburg, was highly encouraging.

After five years of successful work as state superintendent of Sunday-school work in Kansas, Myron C. Settle has been called to take charge of the work in Ohio, as soon as a successor can be appointed. Mr. Settle has accomplished a great work among the Sunday-schools of Kansas. In the year just closed, this state was second in the list in the number of Front Rank schools, having 107 which had reached this standard. Under Mr. Settle's efficient organization, Ohio will doubtless make rapid advance in this line of endeavor.

P. J. Rice of El Paso, Tex., recently delivered an address in that city, in Cleveland Square, before a mass meeting of church people and the labor unions. Several thousand persons heard him. The address appealed especially to the labor men. They asked Mr. Rice to speak before them especially in a labor mass meeting at Washington Park. He was prevented doing so by other duties. This is said to be the first recognition ever given to ministers by the unions of El Paso. Beginning October 1, Mr. Rice is preaching a series of sermons on "Some Conditions Challenging the Church." The following topics are being discussed: "The Church and Public Welfare," "The Church and the Labor Movement," "The Church and the Municipality," "The Method and Message for Today" and "Co-operate or Capitulate."

Front Rank Statement for 1910-1911

Forty-two states are included in the front rank report this year. In these states, 624 schools received gold seals, and 1,334 were certificate schools. Kentucky wins the National Banner. We know this brings joy to Walter E. Frazee, and many a worker in the blue grass state, while it is not quite so welcome an announcement to Myron C. Settle and the Sunflower state. Kansas has striven valiantly however and the effort has meant more to her than a thousand banners in themselves could ever mean. The same statement applies to Illinois and Nebraska, Indiana, Iowa, Oregon, Missouri, Texas, Ohio and many others. In all 624 Bible-schools have won the gold seal for the year while 736 others have held the certificates with one or more stars upon them. In all 1,360 Bible-schools have been enrolled in the campaign for the year. Last year there were only 277.

Claude C. Jones, of Florida, writes, "exactly half of the Florida schools are in line!" Mrs. Esson calls attention to the fact that "we have twenty-nine schools out of a 109 or a little better than one in four that hold the gold seal in Oregon." Nebraska's record is also one of the best, but then we could go on and on and mention each one individually. All have worked hard, but to Kentucky we must bow the knee this year, she leads us all.

It has meant much to have schools graded, trained teachers, organized classes, owning and using Bibles, holding workers' conferences and assisting intelligently, prayerfully and liberally in the spread of the gospel everywhere. It is too early to state what the new Front Rank Standard will be, but it is safe to say that all points made this year will count uponi t. We must move our standards a little farther on, and then move the Bible-school army on to them.

We turn our first attention now to the Bible-school offering for American missions. In this we have made a special gain during the year, moving from 1,387 schools to 2,112, and from $15,687 to $22,243. Let us prepare for the greatest day in our history on Bible-school Day for American Missions, November 26. Supplies may be ordered free from the American superintendent. It is this offering that promotes all our Bible-school work in both state and national departments.

ROBT. M. HOPKINS.
American Bible-school Superintendent.

Christian Woman's Board of Missions Report

Actual receipts for September ..	$ 88,082.44
Actual receipts for the year	331,134.85
Actual receipts including real estate	333,634.85
Actual receipts in advance of last year	19,498.82

Receipts from mission stations and mission fields 36,969.82
Receipts for general fund in advance of that of last year .. 32,491.34

The deficit in the General Fund is reduced to ($15,683.47. There was $10,000 in annuity gifts for the general fund but this cannot now count to this deficit, but has been placed at interest. During the month of September, when we were making a special effort to meet the deficit of over $27,000 in the general fund, it was necessary to draw $6,000 from this fund for the purchase of property for the Japanese Christian Home in Los Angeles, California. Thus the needs of the work constantly draw on this fund. We believe the receipts for the next quarter will meet all expenses and completely annihilate the deficit.

Three hundred and twenty-three new societies were organized. Fifty-four of these are Mission Circles. The Sketch Book of Mission Stations, the Hand Book, and any thirty of the new leaflets and reprints listed in the annual report will be sent for $1.

Let the people who are at home not care to hear of successes only. We must train them that they take an interest in the struggle.

MRS. M. E. HARLAN.

Foundations of Empires

By J. W. McGarvey.

The following words of interpretation of the work of the Foreign Missionary Society were written by President McGarvey shortly before his death. They show a statesman's insight into this supreme task of the church. —THE EDITORS.

The work of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society has a worth beyond what any human being can now adequately estimate. It is planting churches of the primitive order here and there in heathen lands, as such churches were planted by the apostles and the early evangelists. And as the latter churches, with few exceptions, lived on and grew, until they finally attained such power as to control the religious sentiments of the ancient world, so the former will live and grow until the modern world will come under their spiritual dominion. But this modern world is so much greater than the so-called world of the ancients, both in its known territory, and its actual population, that there is scarcely any comparison between them. It is an incomparably greater world also in its power to glorify God by exalting all the faculties of humanity; and from this point of view more than from any other will its subjugation to the reign of Christ rise in importance about the achievements of the ancient church. The men and women who are planting these feeble churches now are really laying the foundations of spiritual empires, in which their names will be loved and remembered as now we remember the names of those who first visited with the gospel the various provinces that have since grown into the Christian nations of the modern world. The man who today endeavors to take into his comprehension the greatness and glory awaiting our great republic, is bewildered by the prospect; how much more the man who attempts to comprehend the varied glories of that coming age when all the kingdoms of the world will be the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ. With this as the outcome, an outcome that passes knowledge, what other men on earth have so much reason for courage amid their toil as those who are spending and being

Missions in Missouri

The readers of the Christian Century, in Missouri, are counted among our substantial and dependable supporters of our Home Missionary work. We believe that you are ready to advance every worthy cause and to improve on any plan that looks toward this end. We have adopted, in Missouri, the Uniform Missionary Plan as folows:

1. Adopt a missionary budget for the year, the aggregate sum of which should not be less than the sum of all the present annual missionary offerings, and should equal a minimum of one dollar per capita for the membership of the church.

2. Appoint a missionary committee in each church, who shall make an every-member canvass and endeavor to secure a weekly pledge for missions and payment through the duplex or misisonary envelopes.

3. Present the various missionary interests in all the churches on their respective days for purposes of education and to afford opportunity for offerings from those not contributing through the regular channels.

4. All missionary money should be sent promptly to the several societies and full settlement made quarterly.

The distribution of missionary offerings should be equitably apportioned among the following interests: Home Missions—state and national, Foreign Missions, Church Extension, Benevolences, Ministerial Relief, Education.

5. This plan should be inaugurated at once and the state and district boards are urged to a prompt and diligent prosecution of this plan, until it shall be made effective throughout our state.

We believe every word in this plan is of incalculable value and recommend that it be most seriously considered and adopted in every church. It combines the special feat-

The Gospel of the Kingdom

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the two years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature.

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that have ever been offered to Sunday Schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to put into their church work new zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these classes in the study of Social Reform.

ures of successful operation in the budget plan, the special day plan, and the every member canvass plan, and combines them all so that each will help to accomplish what the other may fail to do.

We are ready to mail to every church a hanger illustrating the working of this plan and a leaflet giving details and sugestions that will help in the inauguration and operation of the plan. We request correspondence from all interested in this matter to the end that we may be of largest possible service. D. Y. DONALDSON, Cor. Sec'y.

Notes From the Foreign Society

J. B. Dougherty, of Manila, P. I., is now on his way to Lexington, Ky., to prepare himself for the work in that land. He is a consecrated man and will make a strong missionary.

E. A. Long gave $7,000 September 26, for the new hospital at Laoag, P. I. This pleases Dr. C. L. Pickett.

Logansport, Ind., and the churches in that county, Cass, become a Living-link in the foreign Society. This is chiefly due to the effort of J. H. Craig, who has served the Logansport church for eight years.

The church at Niagara Falls, N. Y., becomes a Living-Link in the Foreign Society, supporting Mrs. H. A. Baker. Secretary S. J. Corey spent Sunday, October 8, with them. He was accompanied by A. E. Corey of China.

The church at Dayton, Ohio, John P. Sala, pastor, becomes a Living-link and will probably support Mrs. D. E. Dannenberg in China. This is an advance step for Dayton, and the church is to be congratulated.

The church at Richmond, Ky., enters the Living-link rank. E. B. Barnes is the minister. This good church is to be congratulated upon this advance step. This makes four new Living-link churches with which we start the new year.

Nicholas County, Ky., is an interesting county. The churches are supporting a missionary at Batang, Tibet. Every church in the county gives to Foreign Missions. It is said that the Bald Church gives more for Foreign Missions according to its wealth than any other church in America. The Negro church, of Carlisle, gave more for foreign missions than any other church of that race in our brotherhood. G. M. Brooks, a live business man, has led in bringing about this fine result.

Miss Rose Armbruster reports one more baptism at Akita, Japan.

Professor Frank Marshall of Christian University, Enid, Okla., has a mission study class of 100 members. They are using The Uplift of China. Professor Marshall has a large class in mission study each year.

A new mission study book is just being issued by the Foreign Society. It is entitled "Ten Lessons in World Conquest" and is written by Stephen J. Corey. Hundreds of classes will no doubt desire to use this handy little book. It is especially good for use in Christian Endeavor meeting and midweek prayer-meetings. It is twenty-five cents a copy, five or more copies, twenty cents each.

This has been the banner year on the mission fields. The favor of God has been upon the work and the workers. There were 2,011 baptisms on the different fields, 200 more than last year. There are now over 5,000 pupils under instruction in the ninety-five different schools and coleges of the society. There are 295 young men studying for the ministry, a gain of sixty-six over last year. There were 16,200 in the Sunday-schools in mission fields, a gain over last year of nearly 4,000. The number of patients treated in our hospitals during the

The Best

Did you know that the Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 will be in The Life of Christ? That means that you will want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition is now being prepared to meet the great demand expected this fall. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. year was 157,988. This is a great work and this alone would justify all the money and time expended. The missionaries from each field report a very hopeful outlook for the future.

No less than $500,000 must be raised this year for foreign missions. The growing work urgently demands this amount and our people are more than able to give it.

The Funeral Services of President McGarvey

In a service marked by simplicity and deep feeling, all that was mortal of President John William McGarvey was laid to rest Monday afternoon, in the Lexington cemetery, not far from the graves of three men with whom the middle period of his life was spent, President Robert Milligan and Robert Graham, and "Raccoon" John Smith; and all of them within a stone's throw of the towering shaft crowned with the heroic figure of the immortal Henry Clay. From ten o'clock in the morning until three in the afternoon, the body lay in state in the Central Church, and a continuous procession passed by to look for the last time upon the face of one who had labored longer than any of his colleagues to make the College of the Bible true to the purpose of its founders, who had gained fame as a Bible teacher in every land where the Disciples of Christ are known, and who had influenced the thinking of that people more than any man of his generation, with the possible exception of Isaac Errett, who spoke more often than he and to a larger constituency. The public schools were closed at noon, the State University dismissed the afternoon classes, together, of course, with Transylvania University and its related schools, as a mark of esteem to this distinguished citizen of Lexington. The immense congregation that filled the church to its utmost, and the hundreds who stood near the doors within and without, bore silent testimony to the passing of a great soul, while not a suggestion within gave token of the leaden skies and the drizzling rain that was falling without. Grouped near the pulpit were the faculties of Transylvania and the College of the Bible, while directly in front of the pulpit sat the family and the immediate relatives. One son in Texas was unable to be present, and the devoted wife was detained at home through illness. The flowers were there in generous profusion to say by their beauty and opulence what no lips could say, and to remind us at once of the frailty and the glory of human life. Covering the pulpit Bible was a large pillow bearing the words, "The Open Bible His Fortress."

Promptly at three o'clock, from the organ came the strains of "Nearer My God to Thee," which was sung by the choir. Rev. Mark Collins of the Broadway Church read appropriate selections from the Scriptures, after which "My Jesus as Thou Wilt," was sung. Rev. I. J. Spencer of the Central Church offered an impressive prayer. Following the hymn, "Abide with Me," Professor B. C. Deweese of the College of the Bible, spoke of the cordial relations which had always existed between the Faculty and the honored President. Rev. John S. Shouse, an intimate friend of President McGarvey's for many years, preached the funeral discourse, basing his remarks upon the paragraph in Ephesians 6:10-20. With great feeling Brother Shouse spoke of his friend as the Christian soldier, wearing the armor as few men of this age have done, standing against the enemies of scripture, piercing through and through with the sword of the Spirit, the fallacies which, under one name or another, were undermining the authority of God's Word. In his chosen field of work, the defense of the Bible, President McGarvey will be longest remembered, though that work was taken up when he was sixty years of age, and laid down when he was seventy-five. Continuing, the speaker bore eloquent testimony to President McGarvey's magnanimous spirit, to his devotion to his daily tasks, to his tenderness in his home, and his deep consecration to God. The closing words of Brother McGarvey formed a fitting climax to a sermon, chaste, sober, and beautiful in the

By Professor Herbert L. Willett

PART I, FROM MOSES TO ELISHA

This is the first of four parts, which will cover the entire field of prophetic activity in the Old Testament. In the present issue there are thirteen sections, as follows:

THE PROPHETS AND THE OLD TESTAMENT.
THE BEGINNINGS OF PROPHETIC WORK.
MOSES AND ISRAEL.
MOSES AND THE BEGINNINGS OF THE NATION.
THE RISE OF SAMUEL
SAMUEL, JUDGE AND PROPHET.
DAVID AND NATHAN.
AHIJAH OF SHILOH.
ELIJAH AND THE PROPHETS OF BAAL.
ELIJAH, DEFENDER OF POPULAR RIGHTS.
ELISHA, THE PASTOR OF ISRAEL
THE REFORMS OF ELISHA.
THE PROPHETS OF THE JUDEAN SCHOOL.

These studies and those that follow in the series have been in use in many Sunday-schools during the past year, in the weekly form in which they have appeared in The Christian Century. This first part is now thoroughly revised and published in convenient form for class work or private use.

It contains ninety-two pages, is bound in paper, and is sold at thirty-five cents the copy.

devotion of the preacher to his friend of other days, "Lord, I come, I come."

While the congregation stood, the choir sang, "Father Whate'er of Earthly Bliss," and the casket was borne from the church to its final resting place.

Among those from a distance who attended the funeral were J. H. Garrison of St. Louis, R. H. Ellett, Iola, Kan., A. McLean, I. N. McCash, and John Errett of Cincinnati, Evangelist W. T. Brooks, Bellevue, Ky., and a score or more preachers from different parts of the state. ELLIS B. BARNES.

Church Extension News

As stated in our telegram to the newspapers on September 30, the books closed for the current Missionary Year with a falling off of $700 from the churches and $17,000 in Annuities. Many of the strongest and most liberal churches did not get their money to the board before the books closed, otherwise there would have been a gain. Last year we received one gift of $12,000, another of $10,000 on the annuity plan. We also received two $5,000 bequests. This is a total of $32,000 in four gifts. This was hard to overcome in a year of financial stress. Our board feels very grateful for the help the churches and people gave us this year. Will the preachers please note that October receipts will be published with our annual report and we trust the delinquent churches will keep their collections coming in during October. The chief thing is the offering and not the date of its coming. For the whole year only $21,061.10 was received from the churches. The board feels that the annual offering should bring a larger return than that.

Since our last report an annuity of $1,000 was received from a friend in New York and $500 from a sister in Ohio. Annuity money can be used at once to great advantage in church building. Most of our large loans are made from the annuity fund. The weaker churches are helped with 4 per cent money. In the Church Extension work annuity money will build churches while it earns the annuitant an income. This is surely a blessing to the giver of annuity money.

At our board meeting on Oct. 3, the following loans were granted from our annuity fund at 6 per cent: Bonham, Tex., $5,000; Pasco, Wash., $500; Hennessey, Okla., $1,500; Auburn, Neb., $5,000; Rochester, Ind., $1,000. The following loans were granted from our 4 per cent fund: Norfolk, Neb. Park Ave. Church, $800; Vancouver, B. C. Central Church, $800; Vancouver, B. C. Central Church, $5,000; Blacksburg, Va., $1,000; Hamilton, O., Lindenwald Church, $4,000; Jennings, La., Colored, $300; Edgemont, S. D., $690; Aurora, Mo., $3,500; Salem, Ark., $700; Winslow, Ark., $500; Humboldt, Kan., $2,500; Chenoweth, N. D., $750; Arnett, Okla., $400.

During the month of September the following loans were paid to help complete buildings: Bennett, Neb., $1,250; Needles, Cal., $800; Charleston, S. C., $4,500; Truscott, Tex., $200; Durango, Colo., $2,500; Palisade, Colo., $450; Flemington, Mo., $500.

The board earnestly appeals to the churches to keep the Church Extension collection going during the month of October.

All remittances should be made to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 603 New England Building, Kansas City, Mo.

Ohio Secretary's Letter

Ohio Disciples are rejoicing in the coming to us of Myron C. Settle of Kansas, to lead our Bible School forces. In nearly five years of service he has brought the Kansas schools to a high degree of efficiency and enthusiasm. Under his leadership more than 11,000 new people have been added to the schools in the last month. 104 have qualified as front rank schools and 114 are on the honor roll. The schools of Kansas raised the past year, nearly $3,500 for state work. He has been honored with the presidency of the Interdenominational Sunday-school Association of Kansas. He is a native of Kentucky and comes to our work with years of successful experience and with great technical preparation for his work. He has been a diligent student of Bible Schools and Methods and has had splendid preparation in the Hartford School of Religious Pedagogy. Personally he is affable and attractive. He will be warmly welcomed by the Ohio Bible School workers. The better we know him the more we will love him. We will pray for him and help him and in every way work to set far forward the Bible Schools in Ohio. It is expected Brother Settle will begin his work in Ohio, Jan. 1.

There is serious insurgency in the ranks of Ohio Disciples. Sometime ago the ministers and churches received a request to reach a certain aim in their contributions for Ohio missions, Nov. 5. The Licking County people got together and overthrew these suggestions, adopting certain others of their own, whereby they set for themselves a larger aim than the one suggested. One church that has been asked for $10, is aiming to raise $40; another that was asked for $50 thought that $100 would be right. The officers of District 19 met in solemn conclave and raised their aim 30 per cent. This type of insurgency is far better than standpatism. Let the good work go on.

A good sister whose life has been devoted to the building up of the kingdom has recently given to the society $500 on the annuity plan. From this she will receive an income of $30 per year as long as she lives and when she no longer needs it, the money will be used for Christian work in Ohio. Others have expressed an interest in this form of giving and we are hoping that good results for our state work are to come from this way.

The conventions are still going. At this writing five more are to be held extending almost to the eve of Ohio Day. The secretary is making addresses on Ohio missions in two or three churches every Sunday at this season and is filling every vacant week night with dates on behalf of our work.

National Benevolent Association Activities

A. J. Bush, the veteran representative of the association in Texas, has recovered his health and is ready for work again. He has been so long identified with the benevolent work in Texas that it seems unnatural without him.

General Secretary Mohorter is meeting with much encouragement for the future of the work as a result of his visit to the conventions on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. J. L. Green and wife have succeeded J. F. Green and wife, recently resigned as superintendent and matron of the Home at Baldwin, Ga. They are starting in well. They are promising good things for the future of our Southeastern Home.

The association has recently received several small annuities. The year that has just closed was the greatest in the amount given to the annuity fund in the history of the association. The amount was $25,151. The association receives amounts from $100 up. Write for information.

All of the homes of the association used for the care of children received from infancy to twelve years. They receive mothers with their children.

The only institution in St. Louis belonging to the association, and hence responsible to the churches, is the Christian Orphans' Home. JAS. H. MOHORTER.

Indiana Preachers in Conference

Seventy-five preachers from all sections of the state except the extreme north responded to the call for a conference and met in Indianapolis on Monday, October 9, for an all day session. The fellowship was delightful, the work constructive and will, it is hoped, prove to be the beginning of a definite policy of coöperation and systematic work among our churches for greater efficiency in their own respective fields, and also in the larger field of coöperative missionary work.

Two papers were read that formed the basis for the general discussion and also for the final action taken in the form of commendatory resolutions. One by the secretary on "The Place of Missions in the Life of the Church" and the other by E. F. Daugherty on "County Organization." The former emphasized the fact that the missionary enterprise is the business of the church as distinctly as the preaching of the gospel locally and the means for carrying on missionary work should be provided by the church in the same way that she provides for the local work of the church. A missionary budget, an every member canvass and weekly contributions form the outline of the plan suggested. Brother Daugherty suggested a plan of county organization for coöperative work which, if adopted and worked, will bring our work in a few years to a state of efficiency that will count much for the influence of the church and the cause of the Master in the enlargement of his kingdom.

Resolutions embodying the suggestions of the two papers were submitted by a committee consisting of C. H. Winders, M. W. Harkins and L. C. Howe. After considerable discussion they were adopted in the form given below. On motion of J. Boyd Jones, of Anderson, the secretary was instructed to prepare and send a report of the conference to all the preachers and churches of the state. Following are the resolutions:

1. We recommend that a properly authorized missionary committee be constituted in each church to devise, with the official board, a missionary budget separate from the current expense budget. Said committee should distribute missionary literature and be responsible in connection with the official board for the distribution of the missionary funds upon the following basis: Foreign missions 40 per cent, Home missions, including state missions and church extension, 40 per cent, and 20 per cent ministerial relief and benevolences.

2. We further recommend the use of the duplex envelope and weekly offerings as the method of raising missionary money. And we request the missionary boards to recommend to all of our churches the adoption of this plan.

3. We recommend the forming of county organizations as far and as speedily as possible. The purpose of the organizations shall be, first, to increase the efficiency of every church in the county and second, to secure the coöperation of the churches with the missionary interests of the Disciples of Christ.

It is the purpose of the secretary to prepare for general distribution a leaflet setting forth in detail a uniform plan for county organization and for raising and distributing missionary money. It is hoped the action of the preachers at the conference will result in a careful study of the problems considered by other preachers and churches with a view to arriving at some uniform practice. It will help us if preachers and others will give us their judgment as to the plan of county organization and the basis of distribution of the missionary budget. We trust that the action taken will result in some formal action at our next state convention that will express the united judgment of the churches. L. E. MURRAY, Sec.

HOW DIFFERENT--EASY Put on the stove over hot fire; add water, then soap, then clothes; move knob only occasionally; in a few minutes first batch is done; the next batch same way, same water, so on till all is done. Clothes are sterilized. No chemicals—use good soap.

NOT A CLUMSY WASHING MACHINE

It has no wheels, cogs, rubbing boards; no machinery—nothing to get out of order. Easily kept clean and handled. Made of metal, strong, durable, light in weight—12 pounds. Takes but little room. Simple; made for the home

THE SHIELD The steam and hot suds do the work in the Easy Way. "Clothes were on the stove washing themselves while I was washing dishes." Mrs. M A. Brooke, S. D. "Did a big washing with it in 45 minutes." Miss Laurctta Mitchell, O. "Did a week's dirty washing in 30 minutes without feeling tired or worried." Mrs Cora J. Brown, Ky "Done a two weeks' washing in 45 minutes; clothes washed clean without any rubbing and squeezing on the old washboard; JUST A PLAY SPELL TO USE IT." Frank E. Post, Pa

INTERESTING TO WOMEN

DAINTY THINGS—Embroideries, laces, delicate dresses, shirtwaists, skirts, childrens' clothes, fine under-garments, lace curtains, are all washed in the Easy Way without injury; the dirt is dissolved in the delicate fabric; they have washed themselves. "Our washing looks the whitest in the neighborhood." Mrs. A. Hofer, Minn. "I gave it a trial on all kinds of clothes and got the desired result—good, clean, fresh clothes." Mrs. G. I. Snyder, Pa. "I can truthfully say the easiest washing I ever did; far beyond my expectations." Mrs. Amelia Cuyle, N.Y

HEAVY THINGS like woolen blankets, bed spreads, quilts, look like other things to the Easy Way. "I have washed a pair of woolen blankets, cotton ones, heavy bed spreads, woolen trousers, woolen dress skirt; things that are heavy and stubborn to handle; I have finished with practically no work; it certainly is a hard work saver," Mrs. M. D. Bates, Ills.

GREASY CLOTHES Farmers' garments and mechanics' overalls, colored clothes and flannels all go in the Easy Way; are washed the same as handkerchiefs. A lady in Kentucky says: "My husband had a pair of real dirty overalls; I was surprised how white and clean they were when they came out of the Easy Way." "Easy Way washes white clothes and colored clothes equally well, taking out all the dirt; I consider it a great Labor Saver, Time Saver and preventative of Back Ache." E. N. Curtis, Okla.

I WANT ONE

"People are tired of the old way of washing and the weekly dread: they have examined my clothes on the line and are satisfied and when I tell them I never even brought up the washboard from the cellar, they say: 'Is that so, well, I want one.'" Mrs. L.S. Siesser, Neb.

SAVES COST

Your Own Paper FREE!

A present subscriber sending us one new name for The Christian Century and $2.50 will have his own credit advanced one year and the new subscriber will receive the paper to January, 1913. If he sends two names and $3.50, or three new names and $4.50, both himself and each of the new names will be treated the same as above. One name thus makes your own paper cost you $1, two names reduces it to only 50c, and three names gives you your paper free. Please bear in mind that new names and renewal must be sent in ONE ORDER and that this offer does not include any premium. We will pay a liberal cash commission to the person sending five or more new cash subscriptions.

A great year is opening up for the BETHANY GRADED LESSONS. The publishers were delighted with the fine list of our best schools introducing them this quarter. Many more are considering them and the signs promise an unprecedented volume of orders for the New Year, January 1.

Our "acquaintance subscribers"—the ten weeks' folks—are already showing hearty interest in their paper. Some of them write us of their joyous surprise that a paper representing those ideals with which our regular readers are familiar is actually published among the Disciples.

It Takes With Everybody!

One attractive feature about THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM series is that the magazine comes in monthly form. If you did not start October 1, you can begin November 1. A fresh magazine every month—not a quarterly. Read the announcement of this course on page 22. The deep interest of our schools in the social problem is indicated in the great number of orders for this course that have been received.

Frank W. Allen, pastor at Paris, Mo., one of the most successful social service leaders of men and young men among the Disciples, thus writes concerning this series:

"I have used THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM with the Greyfriars Class since October, 1908—the first issue—and it is the only Sunday School help that is really worth while for adult classes. It has actually built visible, tangible things for this municipality."

The Literature of Religion

When Paul wrote his final message to Timothy, begging him to hurry to Rome before the winter set in, he asked him to bring from the house of Carpus at Troas the books he had left there, especially the parchments. These writings were probably portions of the Hebrew Scriptures which the Apostle had been unable to take with him on his hasty and perhaps enforced departure from that city.

The early Christians, most of whom were Jews, regarded the Hebrew writings with the greatest reverence. They were the documents which constituted the standard of authority in the Jewish church, and were accepted in the Christian community at the same value. Paul refers to the books of the Old Testament, and probably also to portions of the apocryphal literature, when he says, "All scripture inspired of God is profitable."

All the important religions have been more or less closely related to certain bodies of literature which became sacred thereby to the people confessing that particular belief. Hinduism, or Brahmanism, has its "Laws of Man," and its "Hymns of the Faith," usually called the Vedas.

Confucianism, less a religion than a system of ethics, has a body of classics widely studied and deeply revered throughout China. The five "Webs" or "Threads," and the four "Books" of Confucius and Mencius, are the standard Scriptures of four hundred millions of people.

Buddhism, the Protestantism of India, was almost driven from its native soil, but growing apace in lands further east, possesses its sacred books, the Pitikas, in the Pahti tongue.

Parseeism, the religion of Zoroaster, holds at high value the Avesta, in the Zend language, and counts the Bundehesch almost as sacred.

Judaism, gathering up its memories of the ancient Hebrew scriptures, enshrined them in the Talmud, which was partly commentary and partly tradition, and has become the holy book of the rabbinical schools.

Mohammed wrote down his meditations and instructions to his followers, and the Suras of the Koran are the authoritative word of God to the host of the Moslem world.

The messages of prophets, the institutes of priestly instruction, the philosophic reflections of wise men, the hymns of saints and the dreams of apocalyptists in Israel were committed to writing, and embodied, age by age, in the sacred collection, which Jews call the "Scriptures," and Christians, the "Old Testament."

And Christianity gave birth to a group of writings, epistles, memoirs, defenses and confident hopes, some of which were set in a body of documents which we call the New Testament, and some of which found their place in secondary and apocryphal lists.

Most, if not all of these writings, claim some sort of inspiration and authority. In the classic poems of Greece, in which the national faith is at least recognized, the singer conceives himself as inspired by a god or goddess, to speak his message. Confucius and Zoroaster speak with intimate and complete confidence, as if their words were final. "Thus said Zarathustra," is the last word with the Parsee. The Koran goes even further. The writings of the Koriesh merchant on the leaves of the sacred tree were put into a book. At first it was enough to assert that Mohammed had thus spoken. Later the tradition grew that the angel Gabriel inspired the words. And at last it was the belief of the orthodox Moslems that the whole was written in heaven, and handed down to the prophet by the messenger of Allah.

In the case of the Old Testament there was a similar growth of sentiment regarding the origin and divine character of the books. The prophetic writers conceived it to be their right and duty to gather, criticise and supersede the utterances of their predecessors in the teaching function of Israel. The literature, prophetic, priestly and philosophical, grew up with entire freedom among the Hebrews of the classic age. But when these writings were gathered into a collection by the editors of the Persian and Greek periods, they were gradually set in three categories, differing radically in importance and authority. The first of these included the five books ascribed to Moses, and called the Law. Jewish tradition gradually lifted these documents into the realm not only of inspired, but of divine writings, prepared in heaven and mediated to Moses through ranks of angels. Such New Testament expressions as "received the law by the disposition of angels." and "the word spoken by angels," reflect this view.

The second and third lists, the "prophets" and "writings," never attained the same sanctity, but were still held as the inspired oracles of God, and as such are referred to by the New Testament writers.

In contrast with this reverence for the older Hebrew scriptures, the early Christians regarded the writings produced by their leaders less as inspired scripture than as the prized utterances of the friends of the Lord. It was only by gradations that the quality of divine inspiration was affirmed of them, and their organization into a formal canon was attempted. Certainly no one in the early church held any such doctrine of verbal inspiration and inerrency as later centuries of theology developed. It was enough for these first followers of Jesus to find in the apostolic writings the expression of the spirit of the Master, and a trustworthy narrative of his life and teachings.

What, then, is the value of the claim which most of the world's sacred books make, that they are the record of the divine will? Has it any validity, and if so, how may one discriminate between the values of the different books of religion?

The answer is not difficult. All books that have helped in the achievement of higher levels of living for any part of the race, prove themselves by that fact and to that extent, to be the message of God to the world. The reality of the divine factor in the various religions and their sacred books is proved by their character and results. That is the only test which is conclusive.

Among these literatures some are of greater value than others, judged by their influence on the people who have been the subjects of their instruction. These values are not to be measured by the claims of the books to inspiration and authority—for they all make similar claims, and some of the least significant are most urgent in their affirmations as to their divine origin. The truth is only to be discovered by an examination of the effects of these literatures on life.

Judged by this standard, the Bible, particularly the New Testament, rises unique and supreme above every other writing of the centuries. Divested of every dogmatic presupposition, and stripped of every adventitious help such as the church has too often devised for its defense and support, the Book simply proves itself to be the supreme religious literature of the race and the disclosure in written form of the great ideals and imperatives of the spiritual life.

The Bible demonstrates its superiority to all other books by its record of the growth of religion from primitive and meagre beginnings to its greatest embodiment in the life of Christ.

It is the world's supreme record of personal religion, sometimes in very limited and imperfect forms, sometimes in its fuller embodiment in the lives of prophets and apostles, and once in its complete realization in the life of the Lord.

It is a collection of human books, of very various values, but collectively possessed of a supreme power to inspire human life with holy purposes and to holy conduct.

It is a book of unique authority, incomparably more urgent than any other book in the world. Its authority is not that of rules of behavior nor of commands to obedience. Rather it is the authority of divine and self-evidencing principles, taught and enforced by holy men and by the Christ.

It is the world's permanent moral and spiritual monitor. With astonishing frankness it reveals the sins to which humanity may sink. With convincing passion it urges the attainment of such holiness and purity as the world has seen realized but once. With supreme confidence it anticipates the embodiment of its ideals in a new spiritual order, progressively attaining the stature of the fulness of Christ.

This is the ground of its claim to finality. Alike to hostile charges that it is a mere collection of worthless traditions, and to extravagant claims of inerrency made on its behalf it remains silent and indifferent. Its vindication is found in its simple fidelity to its great purpose to aid in the creation of a new and divine humanity. And in the increasing success with which it realizes this purpose, it finds the growing vindication of its right to be called the Book of Books, the supreme and inspired literature of the ages, the Word of God.

English in the German Schools

Those who are firm in advocacy of the study of classical languages in American schools will be surprised that in Germany, the stronghold of study of classic literatures, a change is being made in the school system by which English is to be substituted for Greek. As a whole, the Germans have delighted in the study of Greek, and have prided themselves in their knowledge of it. The move to teach English in the schools is bitterly opposed, and it is affirmed that the change from the Greek to the English literature will cause a material falling off intellectually in coming generations. The progressive spirit is bound to triumph, however. Greek is not to be taken off the curriculum. All who wish may still take up that older literature. But the general study of English will certainly bring about a truer understanding of the aims and ideals of the English-speaking peoples, and in the long run will ameliorate the feeling of distrust existing between German and English-speaking peoples. Progressive changes are also being made in other directions in these German institutions. Recently girls were admitted to the public schools and it is noticeable that a change has been made in the curriculum to include the teaching of swimming as a compulsory part of the training of children.

Kokovtsof, Russia's New Premier

The new Russian premier, who is known by the formidable name, Vladimir Nikolaievitch Kokovtsof, has long been prominent in Russian administration, yet the nature of his work has been such that no final estimate can be made of his probable attitude in his new position. He is descended from an old Russian family, and was born in 1847. His higher education was completed in the Imperial Alexandrofski Lyceum, of St. Petersburg, and he began his public career as an attaché of the council of the empire after a short term as assistant to the chief of the prison administration. Economic and financial problems absorbed the interest of young Kokovtsof, and after a rapid advancement to the general secretaryship of the council he was appointed associate minister of finance under Count Witte. Here he showed great ability and in 1904 succeeded Count Witte, as minister of finance, when the latter became president of the council of ministers. One of the greatest successes of his career was scored during the Russo-Japanese War when, in a period of less than fifteen months, by foreign and domestic loans, he raised a sum equal to $665,000,000 at a low rate of interest. Duties as minister of finance have kept him out of the problem of bettering the economic conditions of the agricultural peasantry. He is said to be more liberal than P. A. Stolypin was, however. In support of this opinion the Outlook says, in part: "In his political views Kokovtsof is believed to be more liberal and tolerant than Stolypin was. . . . . He is susceptible, moreover, to influences and considerations that hardly affected his predecessor at all. Stolypin did not care much for the approval or disapproval of the outside world, and pursued his 'blood-and-iron' policy of repression regardless of foreign opinion. Kokovtsof, on the contrary, as minister of finance, has been forced to take that opinion into account, because he had to borrow large sums of money abroad in order to meet Russia's urgent financial needs. Public opinion in western Europe [liberal], therefore, is likely to affect his administration more than it affected the administration of Stolypin. . . . Kokovtsof never wholly approved the nationalizing policy which Stolypin favored. . . . and he is likely to assume a much more tolerant and conciliatory attitude toward the Finns and the Poles—and possibly the Jews—than that taken by his predecessor after the suppression of the revolutionary movement. His accession to power is generally regarded in Russia as a change for the better. The new premier, however, is a conservative and a monarchist, rather than a liberal. . . . . The greatest boon that the new premier could confer upon the people would be the complete and final abolition of government by martial law; but it is doubtful whether he would have power to bring it about even if he favored it. The higher bureaucratic officials of Russia have ruled for more than thirty years by means of martial law, and have become so accustomed to the free exercise of discretionary power that they would find it difficult so to change their methods as to make them conform to the provisions of the civil code. They would strenuously oppose substitution of civil for martial law, and with the aid of the reactionary party and the high nobles they might be strong enough to overthrow any prime minister who should advocate it. The attitude of the Constitutional Democrats toward the new premier is one of expectant attention."

Woman Suffrage for California

Today rejoicing fills the hearts of woman suffragists the world over, and well it may, for they have carried an equal suffrage constitutional amendment in California. Women suffragists had looked forward to 1911 as a year filled with promise and, after many disappointments, had all but given up the year's struggle as a failure. The British parliament toyed with a woman-suffrage bill until, discovering that it was playing with fire and receiving several painful burns, it pigeonholed the measure. The cause also has received rebuffs in this country, but the victory in California has turned many women to rejoicing. Like almost every other progressive movement, suffrage received its strongest support in the country precincts. San Francisco and most of the other large cities returned a heavy majority against the proposed amendment, but the country vote carried the day. It is not because the urban districts are more conservative than the rural, but because the liquor men and the city politicians were arrayed against the amendment that the city vote stood as it did. The vote was the deliberate action of a people whose average of intelligence is high. The Golden State is a commonwealth of prosperous, small landowners, men with families and good education. Here, as perhaps in no other state which now has equal suffrage, the efficiency and desirability of woman suffrage will be put to the test. In five other states—Colorado, Idaho, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming—unrestricted suffrage has been granted. In twenty-three other states women are permitted to vote for school directors, and in Kansas they may vote at all school and municipal elections. Possibly because their privileges were so limited, women have failed generally to avail themselves of the privilege of voting in school elections. It is also claimed that no great difference in the character of the vote is noticed in those states where suffrage covers all elections. Conditions in those states have frequently worked against the successful operation of suffrage and it will receive its best test in California.

An Experimental Parcels Post

Economy of operation is the slogan which is being taken up and sounded in every corner of our busy land from Key West to Puget Sound. Manufactures, business houses, railroads, all echo the same motto, even the church uniting in the chorus. Government officials are often backward in joining popular moves for better or more efficient service, but at least one departmental head at Washington cast his lot with the economists and, to the surprise and delight of the country, is putting his views into practical and valuable operation. In less than one year, Postmaster-general Hitchcock has installed a postal savings department in almost every first, second, and third class post-office in the country, and has satisfactorily proved it an unqualified success. Now he has another plan which is bound, some day, to be of even greater benefit to the country than the postal savings bank. In his official estimate for the coming year, Mr. Hitchcock has included three items of $50,000 each, intended to be used in different ways, but all to work toward the same end—the establishment of a parcels post. This method of trying out an innovation Mr. Hitchcock has found meets the approval of the people, and accordingly he proposes to expend $50,000 each in trying out a parcels post on rural routes, in the cities, and on the railways and steamboats. This will be a "feeler," and if it meets the popular approval he expects, service will be rapidly extended. It will not be necessary to draw heavily upon the treasury for the extension of parcels post, however. In the opinion of the postmaster-general, when it is started it will provide a surplus for itself which will aid in extending it. Again, Mr. Hitchcock asserts that our tremendous post-office organization is capable of performing a much larger service than it is now called upon to render, and a parcels post would, in large measure, take up this surplus, and give the people more efficient service with the equipment which they already have provided. There is little doubt that the postmaster-general will encounter much opposition from the express monopoly in this undertaking, but there is an insistent demand for it, and he should receive hearty support for his progressive aggression.

Why Do You Go to Church?

The benefit to be derived from church attendance depends in no small measure upon the motives that account for attendance. On the many motives of church going people the Universalist Leader remarks:

Some people, perhaps many people, go because they want personal gratification, and for them the pews must be comfortable, the church furnishings artistic, the music satisfactory and especially the minister must be personally all that could be desired. Verily, all such have their reward! The church is for them just like any place to which they have gone to get something; if they get it, they are happy; if they do not, they are miserable. There are other people who go to church to worship God; they go desiring to give expression to the devotion of their lives, and with them it is not a matter of church furnishings or music or even the minister altogether; they go to give, and, verily, they have their reward. There are many people who having a difference of opinion with the pastor will immediately withdraw from their usual place of worship, withdraw their support, because they have no sense of the real purpose of the church, that it is outside of the minister; he is a part of the service, but he can not destroy obligation and opportunity any more than a hard cushion or a discordant note in the music. There is a lesson for a good many of us in the story of the good old Scotchwoman who had a serious quarrel with her pastor, but to the surprise of the pastor she continued her attendance at worship. When he expressed his gratification as well as surprise at her conduct, she replied: "Oh sir, my quarrel was with you and not with the Lord."

Foreign Missions and Church Life at Home.

The only kind of religion an intelligent race can accept is one that appeals to all races. Local deities may command the loyalty of undeveloped peoples. The race that believes in a universal order must also believe in a God who is over all and in all and through all or in no God. Hence the religion of civilized man will be missionary. The case for missions is thus stated by the Universalist Leader:

A distinguished statesman recently remarked, "If the Christian ideal is worthy to be followed in America, it is worthy to be presented in every land," and therefore he argued with much power for Foreign Missions. That is a good foundation for our intellectual feet! If Christianity is good for our own people, then it is good for other peoples similarly situated. And we can go a little further and say that it can never be and do the best for our own people until it is doing its best for others. The self-respecting man who is making a noble effort to improve his own home can never reach the full measure of success, until his neighbor, imbued with a like spirit, improves the house next door. Here is the Christian obligation; any one who has received benefit from his religious faith is obligated to give that faith to another and as surely as he does not, it will be taken from him. The only way to keep the things that are worth while, is to give them away. The love which has no expression is sure to die; the friendship which has no words to speak soon becomes permanently dumb. People sometimes ask, why does not our church grow? And the reason is, simply because you do not give it away, you do not try to serve others with it; you think you cannot afford to do missionary work, the calls are so many at home; and behold! you are dying. And you will die, all people and institutions will die, if, having something worth while, they try to keep it to themselves.

A Big Church.

A big church is not a thing to frighten the disciple of the Lord. We never have too many good people associated for the work of the kingdom. Of course it is better to have a small church made up of faithful people than a large one whose members are without faith of a vital sort. But we need big churches for the big tasks before us. Of this need the Universalist Leader says:

A big church is not a sufficient object in and of itself, but if it is desirable to do a really big work, then it is proper to secure a big church as the means of doing it. We often hear men saying they do not care to build up their church, what they want to do is to increase Christianity and the number of Christians! All of which sounds very "broad and progressive," but has just about as much sense in it as is in the statement of the farmer who said he did not care to keep hens as all he wanted was a good supply of eggs! Then there are others who, being thrilled with the thought of federation of churches, lose all denominational consciousness, and wave the banner of union, when carrying their notion out would simply mean that when the time of federation came, we should come in not with a strong and mighty force of trained workers, to contribute something worth while, but with a ridiculous little band of guerillas hardly worth a welcome. We believe in the church doing a great work in individual and social life, and so we want a big church to do it with; we believe in the federation of churches, and therefore we want a big Church as our offering to the federation. Don't you?

Presbyterian

Breadth in Religion.

It is easy to be narrow and it is easy to be indifferent. To be catholic in sympathy and to be broad-minded cannot be set down as easy for many of us. The Presbyterian Banner thus defines breadth and incidentally shows why it is so hard for the average person to be broad-minded:

Breadth thus resolves itself into the truth-seeking and the truth-loving spirit. It differs from toleration, which merely permits others to hold their views—it will not fall upon them with a club—but breadth enters into their views with sympathy so as to extract the germ or essence of truth in them. Breadth is not indifference or treason to truth: it holds truth as the most fundamental and sacred possession and duty; but breadth believes that truth is broader than its own vision and fulfills itself in many minds and forms. It believes there is some truth in all creeds and some good in all men, as there are some colors of the sun in all flowers and even in weeds, and it tries to gather up and combine these various elements or colors of truth into the white light of reality. Narrowness is born of an ignorant and prejudiced mind and an ungenerous heart, it is disloyalty to the truth; but breadth is born of large faith and is loyalty and love, poise and power. A narrow mind is impatient with and suspicious of differences in others; a broad mind is hospitable and genial in its attitude and temper towards them. Narrowness broods over its own prejudices and begets an uncharitable and bitter spirit in its unhappy victim, but breadth is catholicity and generosity and ever rejoices in larger visions and broader brotherhood.

We need to be careful, however, that we do not identify other people's views and ways with narrowness and our own with breadth, and that we acquire and exercise the genuine truth-seeking and truth-loving spirit.

Church Unity.

The fact that a man preaches on church unity is no sign that he is promoting it. You must know the man before you can judge his sermon. He may have no vision and no breadth of sympathy. Denominational pronouncements on unity mean much or little, according to the ideas of unity entertained by the denomination that issues an invitation to the Christian world to unite its forces against common evils and in behalf of every righteous cause. A friendly note in the Presbyterian Banner on the movements and manners of the Protestant Episcopalians on the subject of church unity may be read with profit by some who are not Episcopalians:

It is interesting to watch the movements and manners of the Protestant Episcopalians on the subject of Church Unity. No other communion is talking so much about it and projecting so many measures to advance it, as witness their recent call for a world conference on faith and order. Many of their leading spirits are deeply in earnest in the matter and are moved by true principles of catholicity, recognizing to the full the Christian standing and rights of other communions. But others of their leaders are narrow and exclusive to the extreme in their views and mean by church unity only the surrender of all other "religious bodies," as they usually denominate other Protestant Churches, and their absorption in "The Church," by which name they always designate their own communion. The matter of church unity was a burning topic at the recent Duluth Missionary Council, which was attended by many bishops and other dignitaries of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Bishop Olmsted, of Colorado, disclosed his ideas of church unity in the declaration that "the only thing for the Church to do is to lock out all schismatics and to bid the world in all fairness and love to submit themselves to the apostolic Church." Whereupon Bishop Graves rose to his feet in protest and said: "We have tried that plan for the last thirty years. What has been the result? Three-fourths of the English-speaking people have gotten out of this Church." A correspondent of The Churchman, commenting on Bishop Olmsted's declaration, says: "Such men as the Bishop of Colorado have simply got to be converted, and such conversion can come through prayer only, and not through argument in public places. Speaking with greatest reverence and with profound respect, devils of this nature can be cast out only through prayer and fasting, and it seems to me that we, as a Church people, should be bidden to prayer and not to forensic or other discussions." The great need of the Protestant Episcopal church is to be unified in itself and then it may move for unity with other Churches. Yet we believe this influential and honored Church is being increasingly dominated by men of the broader type and better spirit.

New Testament Provisions for the Culture of the Life of the Congregation

"Think on these things." A woman who had been a vexation to herself and to the congregation of which she was a member went to her pastor one day and told him that a great book which she had just read had "taken all the kick" out of her. The book had given her a glimpse of the processes of nature and had helped her to see how senseless and insignificant her life had been. The advice of the apostle is intended to lead us away from petty mental occupations that dwarf the soul and to point the way to largeness of thought and generosity of spirit.

The things that are true, nobly serious, just, and pure are not abstractions; they have their being in the thought and conduct of men and women. The philosopher and moralist who use these terms have not imported the realities from the land of speculation; they use the terms in an effort to describe life as they find it. What they have to say will only confuse us unless we see clearly that they are interpreters of life and that we must have an abundant life before we can share the joy of the great thinkers.

The public meeting was used in New Testament times to increase the knowledge and faith of the church. Of the public meeting, Brierly says: "When we come to estimate the meeting as a factor in public life, we find an accurate and discriminating judgment to be a difficult business. Good and evil are so mingled in the part it has played. . . . The idea of discovering and authoritatively declaring truths by means of a public meeting would be scouted as in the highest degree absurd by the modern scientist; yet it is precisely in this way that the church creeds, which undertake to settle for us the profoundest questions of human life, reached their affirmations." But the influence of the public meeting has not been all of this kind, the same writer informs us. "There was a humble Baptist meeting in London in the early seventeenth century, of which Masson, in his 'Life of Milton,' thus writes: 'The obscure Baptist congregation seems to have been the repository for all England of the absolute principle of liberty of conscience. . . . It is, in short, from this little, dingy meeting-house somewhere in old London that there flashed out first in England the absolute doctrine of religious liberty.'"

The teaching ministry of the church received due attention in the Apostolic age. There was no expectation that men would do the will of God though they were never taught what that will was. If we of the present are really democratic in religion, we are bound to give prominence to the office of the teacher. Ignorant men must submit to the dictation of those who know. The success of religious mountebanks within recent years is evidence that instruction is needed. The intelligent man refuses to be bullied by charlatans who put themselves forward as authoritative representatives of the Almighty. He is a free man and no imposter can order him to give up his property and to commit himself wholly to the keeping of a human master. A successful Sunday-school undermines the power of every kind of religious dictator, local, national, or universal in his claims.

The communion service affords opportunity for meditation and self-examination. Ordinarily the words of the leader of this service should be few. The number of those who can say the right word at the table of the Lord seems to be small. The speaker who says, "You ought to confess your sins," has no business at that table. There is needed one who feels that he is like other men and that all need forgiveness. Censoriousness, which is never in place, is the worst sort of irreverence when it connects itself with the memorial of the cross of Christ. From this memorial we ought to turn away assured of the love of God.

Paul gave the Corinthians and other Gentile Christians an invitation to use their material goods for the advantage of the Jewish Christians at Jerusalem. It is sometimes said that churches are preached to death. If there is any truth in the statement, we are to understand that there has been a failure to connect the teaching of the pulpit with daily experience. The fault may be with the preacher and it may be with the people. Doubtless both are to blame. It is not worth while to preach to people who have no intention of conforming their lives to the message of the preacher. If the preacher has not in mind the deeds which ought to be done by those whom he is instructing and exhorting, he might as well stay at home on Sunday. Giving money is one form of service. Those who have a large amount of money can hardly save their souls if they do not use their money for the common good. This we understand fairly well. We need to understand also that it is death not to use any gift generously. [Midweek Service, Nov. 1. Phil. 4:8, 9; Heb. 10:25; Acts 2:46, 47; 20:7; I Cor. 16:1, 2; Eph. 4:7-16.]

The Meaning of Baptism

V—THE ORIGIN AND PRIMITIVE PRACTICE OF BAPTISM.

Thus far in our study of the meaning of baptism we have confined ourselves to the linguistic question of the meaning of the Greek word baptizo. We have found that this word in its New Testament use refers to an institution, a rite, an ordinance, and not to the physical act denoted by the primary meaning of the word baptizo. The essential meaning of the rite, as nearly as we can define it in English terms, is religious initiation or induction, carrying with it also the ideas of consecration and cleansing.

But like every institution or rite with which man has to do, baptism utilizes something physical and objective as a symbol, a sign, an expression, of the inner personal and social reality. The confounding of this inner spiritual reality with the physical symbol of it lies at the basis of the immersion dogma and explains the long and bitter controversy between Baptists and pedo-baptists. That baptism and the physical act by which it is signalized should not be confused, it is the purpose of these articles to insist upon. But it must not be inferred that there is no importance whatever attaching to the outward symbol, because forsooth it cannot be said to possess the importance inhering in the spiritual act itself. It has an importance of its own and that importance we must be willing to give it. As a further step in our study of the meaning of baptism let us, therefore, examine into the origin and early practice of the rite.

Quite outside of Christian or Hebrew influence we find that water is used for ritualistic purposes by many peoples, both savage and civilized. The ceremonial use of water is common in the case of tribal initiations of various sorts, and especially at the birth of children. Why the identical element, water, should be chosen by many unconnected races is not strange. "The animistic theory of the world which underlies all primitive religions suggested that water was a living being, which, in so far as it assisted the processes of growth and aided men in other ways, might be presumed to be beneficent."

The same magical view of water was probably arrived at also by practical experience. The cleansing and refreshing effect of water in its ordinary use made it natural for the primitive mind to impute to it also an efficacy in removing ceremonial tabu, or curing physical disease, or, in higher orders of society, freeing the soul from moral guilt. Thus certain streams and pools came to be regarded as possessing peculiar magical powers. The laver of the Hebrews is a common symbol in most religions. The various washings appointed in the Old Testament and greatly elaborated in later Judaism find their analogy in the religions of most peoples—Asiatic, early European, and most primitive races. Among the Greeks ceremonial bathing had its place in the initiatory rites of the Eleusinian Mysteries.

The detailed directions found in the Old Testament for the use of water in purifying one who had been polluted by touching a dead body or a Gentile or a leprous person or what not, may be assumed to be familiar to our readers. In the period immediately prior to the Christian era these ceremonies become yet more strict and elaborate. The Pharisees exalted these washings as possessing some inherent virtue for bringing man into favor with God. They had received them from their elders and guarded them with superstitious zeal. For example, after a visit to the market place they would not eat until they had first purified themselves by ceremonial washings lest perchance they had touched a Gentile. Their whole life was hedged about with rules for ceremonial purifications.

The attempt is often made to identify Christian baptism with these ceremonial cleansings. This is to miss the distinctive if not the essential meaning of baptism. They are alike in that both use water, and that both denote purification or cleansing. They are unlike in that baptism confers a new status upon the one baptized. Besides, purification was accomplished by various uses of water—bathing, pouring, sprinkling, etc., while baptism was administered mainly, if not always, by immersion.

The direct prototype of New Testament baptism is found not in the numerous lustrations and cleansings of Jewish daily ceremony, but in the almost unique rite by which converts to Judaism were initiated into the new politico-religious state. The Old Testament does not prescribe a form for the initiation of proselytes, for the simple reason that it was not until later Judaism that proselytizing became common. With the downfall of the secular splendor and independence of the nation its corporate enthusiasm and faith found expression in making converts to the Jewish cult. The zeal with which this propaganda was prosecuted is indicated by Jesus' saying, "Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte."

As a result of this intense evangelistic activity and its abundant fruitage a well defined ritual for the induction of converts grew up. This ritual was three-fold, consisting of circumcision, baptism and the offering of a sacrifice. Of these three, baptism came to be the distinctive item in the initiation. Sacrifice was the common duty of all Jews and was abolished in connection with proselyte induction after the temple was destroyed. Circumcision would apply to male converts only, and most of the proselytes were women. Therefore baptism came to stand out as the distinguishing act of initiation, and the term, meaning at first only the physical act of immersion in water, gathered into itself gradually the entire social and religious significance of the rite.

According to the Talmud, the procedure in proselyte baptism was as follows: Three of those who had instructed the "stranger" in the law became his "fathers" or sponsors and took him to a pool in which he stood up to his neck in water, while the great commandments of the law were recited to him. These he promised to keep, then a benediction was pronounced, and he plunged beneath the water, taking care to be entirely submerged.

This was the naturalization ceremony of Judaism, by which a Gentile became a Jew. In comparison with the divers washings to which all Jews were accustomed, it shows at once a likeness and a striking difference. All the significance of cleansing or purification which belonged to these washings was possessed also by baptism. If one who belonged to the house of Israel needed purification from specific contact with pollution, or from even the mere possibility of such contact, much more does one who has spent his whole life in the midst of Gentile uncleanness need a thorough and complete cleansing before he can enjoy the privileges of his new status. These ceremonial washings, however, were merely casual, not so grave and formal, as baptism. They rarely, if ever, involved complete submersion, though certain of them called for bathing the entire body. They were often repeated. Baptism was once for all. Purification was a specific act of a member of a particular social and religious order—Judaism. Baptism was the unique act of initiation into that order.

It is most natural, therefore, that the word baptizo, rather than bapto or any word meaning simply to wash or cleanse, should have been chosen to denote this unique, thoroughgoing, intensive act. The word as we have already seen is in the intensive form. Its psychological appropriateness to the institution for which it stands is obvious. It is rarely applied to the every day washings of the Jews, and when it is so used it is manifestly intended in its primary sense or figuratively.

This prevalence of the custom of initiating converts by immersing them in water, is the explanation of the silence in the New Testament as to the specific manner in which baptism was administered. The early readers of the New Testament did not need instruction as to the practice of baptism. The procedure was quite as well established as is the ceremony of "being sworn" among us. All men know that in this ceremony they are expected to remove their hat and raise their right hand. So John preaches baptism without once indicating to the people in what manner he intends to solemnize it, and Peter commands that the people repent and be baptized, but no word is left us to indicate by what outward form baptism was administered to the three thousand who obeyed him that day. Neither preacher nor people were thinking of the physical act by which their baptism was to be administered; they were thinking of the baptism itself, the induction into the new order.

But that immersion was the mode of baptism employed by John and by the early church, would seem to be a natural conclusion from the facts above recited concerning proselyte baptism, and also from the implications of many more or less circumstantial allusions in the New Testament. The people were accustomed to initiation by immersion. Nothing would be more natural than for a new religious movement or order to adopt, involuntarily, the established and common formality of initiating its converts. Hence we find John "baptizing in Aenon near to Salem because there was much water there." It is much more probable that the "much water" was needed for the baptismal ceremony than for drinking purposes for man and beast, as partizan defenders of affusion strive to make out.

Wherever circumstantial allusions to the administration of baptism are found in the New Testament they will be seen to fit naturally into the assumption that the form by which proselytes were baptized was carried over into the Christian church. The formality by which Jesus' baptism was solemnized was manifestly an immersion. He went down into the water, was baptized, and came up out of the water. Philip's procedure with the eunuch was the same. By association of ideas Paul sees in the outward act of immersion the symbol of the death, burial and resurrection of Christ, facts which must be matched by the Christian's inward moral experience.

It would be too much to say absolutely that baptism was not administered in New Testament times in any way save by immersion. There are two instances upon which affusionists lean heavily—one the baptism of the three thousand, the other the baptism of the Philippian jailer. These are open to conjecture, it must be admitted. Yet as to the former it is scarcely less difficult to account for the pouring or sprinkling than for the immersion of so many. And the case of the jailer presents no insuperable difficulty or improbability for the immersionist view.

There is but a single text in the New Testament whose implication seems to hint at anything save immersion. This is Peter's inquiry at the house of Cornelius, "Can any man forbid water that these should be baptized?" The natural inference from such a sentence, taken abstractly, would be that water was the movable quantity in the situation, to be brought in or forbidden, i. e., withheld, as those present might indicate. This inference, of course, would support the affusionist theory that the water was to be applied to the person, rather than the immersionist theory that the person was to be applied to the water. With respect to this text, it is not seemly to be dogmatic. Assuming, however, that immersion was the universal practice, it is still not impossible that one should speak as did Peter, intending to sharpen the antithesis between the holy spirit which they had so manifestly received and the much less important water baptism which Jewish prejudice might forbid. At any rate, with the background of pre-Christian practice in initiating proselytes and the clear implications of the remainder of the New Testament allusions, it is much more reasonable to interpret this indecisive passage on the side of immersion than to build upon so slender a foundation as it affords a theory with which the great body of our data is not in accord.

We shall continue this inquiry next week.

And, as the path of duty is made plain,
May grace be given that I may walk therein,
Not like the hireling, for his selfish gain,
With backward glances and reluctant tread,
Making a merit of his coward dread—
But, cheerful, in the light around me thrown,
Walking as one to pleasant service led;
Doing God's will as if it were my own,
Yet trusting not in min, but in his strength alone;

Unitarian Retrenchment in Cities

The inefficiency of Unitarianism to misister to the deep needs of humanity in general has long been felt not by evangelical churches alone but by many leaders of that "liberal" denomination. That their churches in general have ceased to be stirred with the zeal of propaganda is evidenced in the deliberate policy of retrenchment upon which they are entering in certain cities. The policy of having one strong center in a city seems to be preferred to several small and weak ones. Their leaders are now talking about sales of properties and consolidations in Boston, New York, Washington and Chicago. The Meadville Theological School is to be moved from the small town in northwestern Pennsylvania to Chicago, there to be the nucleus of a Unitarian headquarters for the whole west. The rebuilding of the Unitarian Church at Washington, with money contributed by some Unitarian outside of that city as well as members of the congregation, is to furnish the strong centre desired there.

The Boston consolidations have not taken shape, beyond an offer on the part of certain leaders among Unitarians to assist in negotiations if asked to do so, but in New York the proceeds to create a national Unitarian centre, larger perhaps than the Boston one in the extent to which it may reach out to other cities. The two churches mentioned are All Souls, in lower Forth Avenue, and the Messiah in lower Park Avenue. Together these properties are worth $1,500,000 to $1,700,000, All Souls having advanced much within the year, owing to the tremendous development of Fourth Avenue properties.

New Laws for the Catholic Church

Pius X has issued instructions for the speedy completion of the new code of laws by which the Catholic Church thoroughout the world is to be governed for the future. Forty of the church's most learned canonists, besides a Commission of Cardinals, have been working on this colossal task for the last eight years. They have already occupied three years beyond the time originally allotted to them, but owing to the stimulus now given by Pius X who looks upon this as the great work of his pontificate, the code will be at last ready for production during the course of the coming year. It is the first time in the history of the Papacy that a universal codification has been attempted. The result will be to eliminate an immense number of local or obsolvent laws and to establish new legislation applicable everywhere and suited to modern times. One of the important features of the new codification, which concerns the United States as well as other countries, is the abolition of some of the impediments which at present make marriage invalid between Catholics. Thus, according to the new law, marriage between third cousins will be allowed, and no obstacle to marriage will be created by sponsorship at baptism. The American Bishops will also be granted extended powers of jurisdiction in matters which they are at present obliged to refer to Rome.

The Vatican, Tripoli and Turkey

The Vatican, which is quoted by press agencies as in sympathy with Italian enterprise in Tripoli, has determined to maintain an attitude of the utmost reserve. Negotiations have been in progress for some time past for the establishment of official diplomatic relations between his Holy See and Turkey, and the Vatican has delayed completing them hitherto out of consideration to France which still claims the right to protect Christians in the Turkish dominions. But both the Pope and the secretary of the state are most anxious not to do or say anything in the present crisis which would offend Turkey. Hence there is no foundations for the stories that the Vatican has pronounced in favor of Italy.

It is now announced that the letter on peace addressed to Mgr. Falconio, the apostolic delegate to Washington, last June, is only a preliminary to an encyclical addressed to the whole world and dealing with the question of international peace. In it the pontiff, after describing what the popes down to the time of Leo XIII have done on behalf of peace between nations, will emphasize his own deep protest, not only against actual war, but against the system of armed peace which is being maintained at such on enormous cost to civilization. The publication of the document will be deferred until the burning questions of the moment have been settled, as it is felt that the present state of tension in Europe would militate against the efficacy of the pronouncement.

Methodists Putting Up New Men

Up to the middle of October 414 delegates to the next Methodist General Conference, meeting at Minneapolis in May, 1912, had been elected, and the full number, 780 to 790, will be chosen before the end of this month, when all fall conferences will have been held. The unusual showing thus far made is that out of 414 delegates only sixty-eight are ministers and twenty-four laymen. The meaning of this clean sweep, or nearly that, is said to be not that Methodist insurgents are abroad, but that Methodism is compelling old men to stand aside, and putting in young or at most middle aged men. These changes are due, it is said, to personal grounds and not to polities or principles.

With only two notable exceptions, the Rev. E. M. Randall, corresponding secretary of the Epworth League and the Rev. Dr. C. B. Spencer of the "Christian Advocate" at Kansas City, General Conference appointees of four years ago have not been returned this year, indicating it is said that Methodist officials of the last quadrennium are not likely to be retained during the next one. Methodist bishops are to meet in Oklahoma City on October 31, to appoint the presidents of the spring conferences and in November the Freedmen's Aid is to meet in Pueblo and the Home and Foreign Mission Boards in Denver.

The talk just now is that the General Conference of next spring will elect five new bishops. Discussion of names is already heard, but it is as yet too early to get anybody to make predictions. The propositions put forth by the New York Methodist laymen, in favor of districted bishops, lay representation in the annual conferences and in the bishops' cabinets, have been favorably acted upon by laymen in some conferences, and promptly turned down in others. At present it is admitted by laymen who are behind the proposition that they have enlisted no champion of first rank, and that failing such leader they are likely to accomplish little at this General Conference. Dissatisfaction with present machinery obtains in many quarters, it is said, but Methodist opinion is not sufficiently aroused to warrant expectation of changes.

New School, New Type, for the South

The Inter-Church College is the name of a quite new educational venture in the South. It is located at Nashville and will aim to train leaders in religious and social work. Theological seminaries train, it says, leaders in strictly evangelistic and pastoral work, but in the South, at any rate, seminaries are not equipped to train directors for social settlements, heads of charity bureaus, Church musicians, medical nurses, kindergartens and prison, hospital and school visitors.

The new College insists, in its announcements, upon the strategic value of the leaders in every work and in every community, and states that in the South such leadership is even more rare than in the North. Putting into effect new ideas of Christian unity, the College purposes to train for all religious bodies, and while now located in modest quarters, its ambition is to create at Nashville a great foundation. It will use educational facilities already at that centre, but will itself aim to provide teachers for sociology, missions, and other subjects that may be given in common for all religious bodies. It is the first federated school of its kind in America.

Represented on its directory are foremost Presbyterian, Disciples, Baptist and Methodist ministers and laymen, not a few of them leading educators of the South, such as President Gates of Vanderbilt University; President Washington of Tuskegee; President Landrith of Belmont College at Nashville, and President Thirkfield of Howard University at Washington. A special department is provided for the training of leaders among negroes. The general secretary is the Rev. James E. McCulloch of Nashville.

—Since publishing last week the program of the joint Congress of Baptists and Disciples, we have received the revision of the announcement which presents some changes. This latest and final program of the congress we publish on another page. It will be seen that the topics are of vital interest. Especially important is that which deals with the possible union of Baptists and Disciples. All who can attend this gathering should make sure of being there.

The Social Unrest in Europe

An Interview With Dr. Graham Taylor, of Chicago Commons

During the past summer Dr. Graham Taylor, of the Chicago Theological Seminary and head of the Chicago Commons, spent two months in Europe studying social, industrial, and religious conditions. He went by the Mediterranean route, landing at Sicily, from there going to Rome, visiting several Italian cities, thence through Austria into Germany and through Belgium to England, where he was at the time of the great railway strike, which brought the whole of England to a standstill. Dr. Taylor kindly granted an interview to a representative of The Christian Century, which we give below:

Conditions in Italy.

"I found conditions in Italy improving as far as wages were concerned," said Dr. Taylor. "Although emigration to America has drawn off the surplus labor and the best labor at that, yet because there is less work than formerly the demand for labor is no greater. I got close to the smaller community life. The average wage in Italy is from forty cents to sixty cents a day for a man, and twenty to thirty cents a day for a woman. These wages are extremely low, while the cost of living is gradually rising, although not so rapidly as in this country."

Women Beasts of Burden.

"Dr. Taylor, do the women toil, as well as the men?"

"Yes," said he, "the overburdening of women and children is simply appalling. I saw women carrying on their backs loads of saplings, which were used for stakes in the vineyards, three times higher than themselves; and others with loads of iron crowbars and pickaxes. They sweep the streets and unload gravel and coal from freight cars. They cut the grain with little hand sickles; doing the hardest work in the world for the least pay. Women's work all over Europe seems to be increasing in its variety without lessening its burdensomeness."

The Labor Movement.

"What about the labor movement in Italy?"

"It is not so strong as in Germany, but both the government and the Roman Catholic Church are attempting to win the support of the labor party. The radical wing of the trade unions is found in the socialistic party. The socialistic propaganda is very active in the cities."

"What is the Roman Catholic church doing to retain its hold over the laborers?"

"In order to overcome the influence of the socialists, the Church is attempting to do what the socialists are doing, namely, establishing banks, co-operative stores and even Catholic trade unions."

"Are the church services well attended in Italy?"

"In the country and in the villages, churches are well attended by men and women; but in the cities the church is not so well attended, especially by the men. I attended Catholic churches right along in order to find out the religious conditions."

No Windows.

"What about housing conditions in Italy?"

"They are very bad. The laborer in the city lives in a room which has no windows and only one door. And when that is shut, as it usually is, you can imagine the sanitary condition. In Italy, the land of the sun, there is less sunshine in the house than in any other place on the globe. Even in the country the Italian lives essentially under city conditions."

"What influence has the returned American Italian upon social life in his native land?"

"The returned Italian, or 'Americano' as he is called there, reverts to American standards. He puts windows in his house and dresses in American style, and in general sets a higher standard of living in the community."

"What is the government doing to improve social conditions?"

"The government is making a great effort to establish better primary and secondary schools. In many instances it has sequestered converts of the church and uses them for first-class schools, installing secular teachers in place of the monks and nuns."

Germany.

"What are the religious conditions in Germany?"

"In South Germany I found a more popular response to the worship of the Catholic Church, especially in the smaller towns, although the men were in the minority. Good Sabbath keeping was the rule. But among the Protestants, conditions are much worse as regards church attendance. In Berlin only 8 per cent of the population are connected with the church."

"I found some interesting things in Berlin. There is much poverty there, but the military and police grip is strong and things are kept well in hand. Of the two million people in Berlin 800,000 live in single rooms; and of this number, 500,000 have from three to fourteen in a room. They have a juvenile court system, but it is not as good as Chicago's."

"Did you go to Paris?"

"I did not go to France, but you know that the bread riots there are very serious. People cannot get enough to eat."

England.

"What did you find in England?"

"In England the cost of living within the last three years has increased 17 per cent, while the wages have increased but 6 per cent. In the traffic department of the railways 134,000 men receive $5 a week or less; 107,000 get $5 to $7.50 a week; and 78,000 are paid $7.50 or more."

"You were in England during the great railway strike. Will you tell us something of it?"

"I was close to the leaders during that time when England was nearer to civil war than at any time since the corn riots. I wish to say a word concerning Ramsey MacDonald, the leader of the labor party in Parliament. He was the spokesman of the labor party during the entire crisis. During the cabinet meetings of the ministers of the Crown he was the only outsider present. He attended at great personal sacrifice, for at that very time his wife lay dying. She was a great social worker. MacDonald came up from the ranks. He has a fine library. On its shelves are to be found the best works on the history of Religion, Egyptology and the Bible. He said to me, 'I have always been fond of theology.' Dr. John Clifford and Rev. F. B. Meyer are his friends and advisers."

What Will Be the Outcome?

"What do you think will be the outcome in England?"

"Conditions in England will largely depend on whether conservative men will continue to lead. Men like MacDonald must be reckoned with. The issue is safe in their hands. The rank and file, however, are restless; and if they succeed in having their way, the trade union policy of England will change. There will be a syndicate of the unions, and hence more strikes and more like Germany. Business men there and here must always take into consideration trade unionism. And it will be either conservative or radical. It will be better for them if conservative men lead the forces of labor."

"Do you think the radicals will gain the ascendency in English trade unionism?"

"Not if the Royal Commission which has been appointed to investigate industrial conditions promptly continues the inquiry now in progress. There has been too much delay. At a trade union congress after the strike the conservatives were in power and did not allow any radical action to be taken."

Brotherhood Labor Leaders.

"What part does the Brotherhood in the Free Churches play in this industrial crisis?"

"Many of the labor leaders are members of the Brotherhood. Under the leadership of Rev. F. Herbert Stead several hundred members of the Brotherhood went to France, going from town to town, advocating Christian brotherhood, and were received with open arms."

"How does the Brotherhood Movement here compare with that of England?"

"It seems very strange to me on returning to this country, after seeing the increasing growth there, to find interest in the Congregational brotherhood waning, and the general brotherhood in America not progressing. It is a strange contrast. Perhaps the homogeneous character of the people there makes progress easier than here, but there ought to be more rapid and complete assimilation of the immigrants here. They wish it even more than we do."

Spirit of Unrest.

"What struck you the hardest in Europe?"

"By all means the general, seething spirit of unrest; and the unpreparedness of the religious forces, both Catholic and Protestant, to really grapple with the situation. I say this with the utmost concern. We must get great numbers of men to see the problem and to solve it in the spirit of Jesus. The twentieth century came in with more widely prevalent and deeply seated and organized unrest than the eighteenth century went out with. Religion has given men higher aspirations; education has increased them. There is a revolt against poverty. This industrial discontent is world-wide. The extension of suffrage is its greatest safeguard; its restriction the greatest peril to peace and progress."

Attitude of Clergy.

"What is the attitude of the British clergy toward the industrial situation?"

"A quotation from Rev. F. B. Meyer will indicate their attitude. He said that the church could no longer maintain a neutral attitude. 'The essential principles of Christianity are deeply involved in the demands for higher standards of living and higher wages. We have again come to Calvary and must decide between our ideals and existing conditions.'"

"Will England be true to her ideals?"

"If such leaders as Ramsey MacDonald continue to lead and really advance, England will be true to herself and her constitutional methods in progressing by peaceful evolution and not by violent revolution. And if she does, it will be because her religion and common sense have triumphed in the grave and acute crisis which she faces in common with all industrial peoples."

The Unrecorded Christ

A Study of the "Forty Days"

BY R. E. ELMORE.

Let us investigate the unrecorded Christ of the forty days, in which "he showed himself alive after his passion, speaking the things concerning the kingdom of God." These are wonderful days. This is the golden period of his earth-life. There is mystery, and there are "many proofs." As orderly as the Lord left the linens of the sepulcher did he form and fulfill the program of the forty days. Five pens labored, and left partial record of seven days, while thirty-three days were unapproached—these hidden days perhaps more vital and full of vision than the seven outside the veil.

A Handful of Brilliants.

The eleven appearances are a handful of brilliants, a stairway of gold, living parables, the miracles of teaching. Deftly the story is told again, with new fulfillment and plainer prophecy. When the seal was broken and the stone rolled away, the Master of all comfort reveals himself to Mary of Magdala. A few affrighted women meet in the way Him who casteth out all fear. The Lord turns again and looks upon Peter, and forgives seventy times seven. He sups with the disciples in Emmaus, the Interpreter. With peaceful salutation, he breathes upon the apostles, and they receive the Holy Spirit. To Thomas he reveals his hands and his side, he who was dead and is alive forevermore, having the keys of death and of hades, the author and perfecter of faith. In the old trysting place by Tiberias he ministers again, and reads into the heart of Simon Peter the ultimate exegesis of love. He turns to the mountains again in Galilee. The noonday Christ, crystal in claim and character, moves among five hundred brethren, and invites the stare of the world. He appeared to James, and bore to him the bliss and beauty of personal friendship. At last near Bethany, close to a blood-stained cross and a broken sepulcher, he brought together his apostles again, pointed to the uttermost part of the earth, blessed them and was carried up into heaven. These days are a kaleidoscope of Christ and his kingdom. They reveal at once his own comprehensiveness and the possibility of his brethren. They seal the pledge of life and immortality.

The Standard of Risen Life.

In the full forty days the Son sets up the perfect standard of the Risen life. In the appearances to Mary, to the women, to the seven, is made manifest the ministry of amelioration. With Peter, the two, the ten Thomas, five hundred, James, he practices and gives precedent for the ministry of confirmation. To Mary, to the women, in Galilee, on the Mount of Olives, the Anointed one proclaims the ministry of evangelization. In the thirty-three hidden days the man of the midnight mountains calls from out the boundless deep to the ministry of the unseen and eternal.

The Ascendancy of the Spiritual.

In the remarkable ratio, 33 to 7, does not Christ make emphatic ruling on the relative importance of spiritual and material things? From the beginning Jehovah has trained his men in the school of reverence. The altars of Abraham are the oracles of a century's faith and friendship. The burning bush, unconsumed, lighted the way from Horeb to Pisgah, and there was holy ground. The cloud covered "the tent of meeting," and the glory of Jehovah filled the tabernacle. Israel felt the lure of the pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night. Only Luke looked into the sacred solitude of Nazareth and wrote a fugitive word of the little heaven of the boy's home, the mother, the shop, the Book, the synagogue. No one has recorded the paths and prayers of Jesus alone all night in the mountains. There is no diary of the desert life. At the first and at the last, Christ scourged materialism from the courts of the temple. The spiritual is the splendor of the teacher's prayer: "Thy name be hallowed, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done; give us, forgive us, lead us, deliver us." God first—this is vital in Christ's program. Truth is practical, not academic and impersonal. Is this proportion being guarded in the church today? Are we conserving reverence for sacred things, and thus keeping open the conduits to the unseen fountains?

Is Bible Honored?

With no superstitious fetichism for a mere book or bible, still, are the living oracles honored in the actual life of men today? Again, are the portals of the church guarded? Is the temple kept inviolable, filled with the glory of Jehovah? Do fakirs crowd the gates of Jerusalem? Has the world made the temple courts a market-place, and is the din destroying the creative silences of the house of God? Is the church being accomodated to popular whims? Have the leaders, with false hopes of prestige, succumbed to the sirens, and for popularity led the church into the lap of the world? Have we sacrificed the reverence and repentance of men for their companionship and emoluments? Is the temple becoming a club-house, empty of the morning and the evening sacrifices? Is the pulpit sharply guarding the great ratio? Do we make relevant to men the cross and the unseen Christ? Do we tug at the hearts of men till the gates open? Do we lift up the sky-line? Do we pull men near the altar, do we lead them inside the veil, and watch and pray while Jehovah speaks and their spirits are caught and bound by his grace? Oh, for the unseen paths, the choir invisible, the heavenly confines!

"There's a pathway to the sunset shines across the sea I love,
There's the milky-way of heaven that the angels ford above,
There's a pageant on the wheatfield when,
the shadows flung aside,
Morning lights a lane of poppies in a narrow scarlet tide."

The Apartness of the Preacher.

The law of ministerial efficiency was stated by Jesus when he called his first followers, "Come ye after me and I will make you fishers of men." Discipleship is prerequisite to apostleship. They two are then, through all life, mutually supplemental and essential. God trains his leaders apart. Peter and James and John, pillars in later life, were in the high mountain in the transfiguration. They heard the voice of God. The nine preachers in the valley were powerless before the demon-possessed. Can Christ's men ever forget the ford of Jabbok; and Jacob's wrestling, and the face of God? Lest he forget, the Risen Christ at the same seaside of his calling, renewed the covenant with Simon Peter, "Follow thou me," effective through the full mystery of forty days, and for all the future: for, "I have given you an example that you should follow in my steps." Who fails in the thirty-three days following pays the price of a powerless ministry. Forty days in the wilderness, "the angels ministered unto him." Parted from them in Gethsemane, "there appeared unto him an angel from heaven strengthening him." The gift-bearing angels of the Unseen await him whose life is stamped with a holy apartness. They send him back as the new-named man from Arabia, to light strange altar fires in Greek and Roman temples. When Christ would "turn again" Simon Peter, he drew him apart in the exquisite scenes of a single and separate appearance. Here was the print of the nails again, forgiveness seventy times seven, and the chemistry of sequestered souls. Cephas gave himself utterly to Christ.

Real Though Unrecorded.

That is real which is un-recorded in this appearance. What touch of his hand, what whispered word, what look of his, played on the soul of this plastic man. What unrecorded struggles and longings. What new births and baptisms. What new resurrection. What endowment of faith. What opening of beautiful gates of heaven everywhere.

I would not be counted with those who criticise the pulpit today as professional and not sacramental, as politic and powerless. Preaching is today the greatest thing in the world. There is no power comparable to the gospel. There is no man more princely than the preacher—the preacher who has "striven with God and with men, and has prevailed." Only as the pulpit fails in approach to the original sources, does it suffer loss, and weaken its grip on the soul of the world. The preacher is as strong as he will allow himself to be. He must not allow the world to dictate the terms of his gospel, nor the length of his sermon, nor hold the key to his oratory, nor degrade to meaner levels his holy calling. He is not a pack-horse on which the church may heap its load of paltry, trivial things. He is not a business manager, a social superintendent, a money-raiser. The preacher is not the conservator of credal theology. He is the spokesman of a living Christ. The Bible is the preacher's textbook, the unrecorded Christ his teacher.

A majestic river flows deep and clear giving grace to strong trees, creating fertile meadows, breathing into life beautiful flowers. We love its music, we listen to its prayers, we follow its onward call. Then for its mystery we trace it from the prairies to the mountain, through dark canyon, and over rugged crag, until we kneel at its source in the chaste snows at the crest of the continent.

The Real Presence of the Unseen Christ.

Geikie has written this strang word: "He vouchsafed them only intermitted appearances; that, on the one hand, they might be in no doubt of his really having risen from the dead; and, on the other, that they might become familiar with the idea of his leaving them. He showed himself as one about to quit the world." The teaching is wholly different. The forty days significantly emphasize the Lord's perpetual presence. The seven days are in confirmation of the thirty-three. Midway between the days of resurrection and ascension, Jesus reassured his disciples in Galilee with the un-annulled word: "I am with you all the days," seven and thirty-three, and even unto the end of the age. He vanished from before their faces and returned again, vanished again, and came again, that the disciples might learn to practice his presence. In later years he stood unveiled in the presence of Paul and talked with him in the way to Damascus. Contrary to the popular view, this conversation was not conducted by long distance, wireless system, Paul shouting from earth to heaven. They conversed in the big sunlit highway. The vital element in the vision was Christ's charge and promise, the inseparable call and equipment: "I appeared unto thee to appoint thee a minister and a witness, both of the things which thou hast seen and the things wherein I will appear unto thee." Later, in Corinth, the Lord stood by him, saying, "Be not afraid, for I am with thee." Again, in a Roman castle in Jerusalem, the Lord stood by him and said, "Be of good cheer." And again, in the Mediterranean, the angel of God stood by him in the storm and said, "Fear not, for thou must stand before Cæsar." Then, how grandly Paul, the aged, in prison steadies the timid heart of the young preacher, Timothy: "At my first defense all forsook me, but the Lord stood by me and strengthened me." Following his argument of the resurrection, Paul announced to Corinth that he had known the Risen Lord in the physical body, "in the flesh;" and then, with suppressed exultation, made the veiled affirmation that he would no more thus know him, but would walk henceforth with him in the spirit, which was far better.

Most Potent Fact of Gospel.

The heart of the church is slow in receiving this most potent fact of the kingdom, the real presence of the Risen Christ. The unseen Captain is often unrealized in the intervention of mere mortal leadership. If we would but feel forth to him who walks upon the sea, and touch his right hand in the darkness, the storm tossed waves would lie down in calm. If we would lift our eyes and see his morning face in the midst of our failures, and at his word launch out again with him into the deep, the church's net would break for the abundance of its success. Would faith fail, or hope lose heart, or love forget, if we knew these things? When we come to practice the immanence of Christ, the church will be saved. A touch of his hand on ours will shake down Chinese walls. If we would listen, he would laugh away our tears and fears. If the church would turn that he might look on her, her heart would break in penitence, and her rekindled incense fires would sweeten the life of all peoples. If we today would hear him say, face to face with us, "Follow me," every hilltop would be ablaze, the world would roll into light, and there would be daybreak everywhere.

At the stupid command of a prince Michael Angelo wrought an image from the snow. Then the prince laughed as the sculptor's work vanished in a day. A still small voice from the Unseen spoke, and the artist strove with the rejected marble. From the dreams of the night, and the toil of the long, full days, in tears and sweat and blood, was brought forth "David."

A Roman galley was being pulled against the storm. The men quaked. The ship tossed, uncontrolled. Suddenly a man stepped from from behind a curtain, looked with scorn upon the trembling sailors, and thundered, "Coward! do you not carry Cæsar?"

The Anonymous Writer of the Fifth Gospel.

Finally, and of first importance, the hidden days endow the writer of the Fifth Gospel. Revelation is progressive and perpetual. The Bible was an evolution, its ultimate perfection being manifested in the Pauline writings, "the work of faith," and in the Johannine, "the labor of love." But this side St. Paul's last benediction and the seal of the apocalypse, is he who walks among the golden candlesticks, the increasing fragrance of ever-opening flowers, the rich fruit of the maturing gardens. The canon of Scripture is not complete, nor is Palestine the fifth Gospel. The Church is the fifth Gospel, and the Christian is the final biographer of Christ. Our master speaks to us in the records of Moses and Paul and John. But more than this, sensitized souls withdrawn with Jesus, wait like unrecorded cylinders to become new records of the Unseen. They come back to men speaking the things which they have seen and heard, bearing branded in their bodies the marks of the Lord Jesus. The record of the post-apostolic Christ is the big task of the church, making way for him, in-breathed from him, the interpretation of him. Paul's statement is unequivocal: "Ye are an epistle of Christ," a new record, an enacted gospel. The new cannot abridge the old, nor infringe upon it. The field and force is from springtime's blossom to the ripe rich grain of the harvest.

"By old sluices, weirs and channels, and deserted torrent ways,
By processions and their incense, like a scented summer haze,
By the lovely lakes of lilies, where the fairy woodlands are,
By the light that rends the heaven at the falling of a star,
By the Bosporus and Jordan, by all Pagan streams and Frank,
By the Dogrose and the myrtle, and the wild flowers on their brink,
By the spring song of the rivers when their life is treasured snow,
By the waterfalls of all the world—my stream's the best I know.
You shall one day see my river where the pines and willows meet,
Find a shallow filled with sunlight, let it sparkle round your feet.
When I watch your face reflected in the stillness of the pool,
I shall call my river still more dear, O Thou most beautiful!"

The Fifth Gospel is the incarnation of the Four, the re-incarnation of the Christ of the Four, loosed from his grave-clothes, the hidden days unveiled. Creeds are not gospels. They are hindrances. Christ left our skyline rising, and our feet free. The credal horizon is static, and the creed-maker schedules our march to the drum-beat of our fathers. God sent no creed-making astrologers when Christ was born. The birth was under all the stars. The horoscope is the perfect cycle of the world's life. Who can define Him? Who can name his new book about him "Finis?"

This Christ will pass thrugh the wheatfields again. He will hurl down to naught the new Pharisaism. He will yet again gather the children in his arms, all children. He will still be breaking false standards. He will yet commend the world's widow and curse the unmerciful tither of mint and cummin. He has still a word for Nicodemus, and an un-recorded prayer for Simon Peter. He is with us these days, Alpha and Omega, the Logos, and he still speaks to him who hath ears to hear, and whose sacramental life will interpret his message to men.

R. A. LONG AT EUREKA

BY H. H. PETERS.

The tour of Mr. R. A. Long and Rev. C. M. Chilton, president of the American Missionary Society, is an event of much significance. That Mr. Long should take from his business the time and energy necessary to prosecute this campaign in the interest of men's work reveals the depth and intensity of his feeling for the Brotherhood of which he is president. Everywhere he and his party, including Mr. Shellenberger, the secretary, are being received with enthusiasm. The following story of the Eureka meetings is typical of all the rest.— EDITORS.

Monday, October 16, was one of the great days in the life of Eureka College. Sometime ago it was announced through the church papers that R. A. Long, of Kansas City, President of the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ, accompanied by a group of helpers, would visit two points in Illinois, in a tour of the Brotherhood in the interest of that very important work. We were disappointed at first because Eureka was not included in that list; but it was very fortunate for us that Springfield was not prepared to receive the committee. About a week before the time for the meeting, the office secretary of the Brotherhood of Disciples notified us that we could have Mr. Long and party for Monday, Oct. 16. Arrangements were quickly made for an afternoon meeting in the college chapel and for an evening banquet and meeting of the men in the Christian Church.

Personnel of Party.

The party consists of R. A. Long, president of the Brotherhood of Disciples; C. M. Chilton, pastor of the Christian Church of St. Joseph, Mo., president of the American Christian Missionary Society, and one of the directors of the Brotherhood; J. K. Shellenberger, secretary of the Brotherhood; W. E. M. Hackleman, of the Hackleman Music Co., Indianapolis, Ind., and Mr. Long's physician.

The party arrived on the early morning train from Peoria and spent the forenoon in conference with some of the Eureka workers in the interest of the Brotherhood work. The resident members of the board of trustees of Eureka College and their wives, the faculty and their wives, and the visiting party took dinner together at Lida's Wood. Following the dinner, a tour of inspection was made of the building and grounds of Eureka College. At 2:30 a large crowd gathered at the college chapel, to listen to the inspiring music and addresses of the afternoon. Mr. Hackleman led the music and was at his best. Secretary Shellenberger spoke first and outlined the work of the Brotherhood of Disciples. It was a telling address and to the point. It started the campaign in good style. Following this R. A. Long made one of his uplifting addresses. I have been acquainted with Eureka College for a dozen years, and I never attended a more inspiring address than came from Mr. Long on this occasion. The students are enthusiastic over the matter and many of the young people will date the embracing of new ideals, in business affairs especially, from this hour. Following the address of Mr. Long, C. M. Chilton, one of the most eloquent men of our Brotherhood, made an earnest appeal in behalf of the masculine forces of our churches. After listening to Mr. Chilton, everybody felt that a new era had dawned on us in the matter of Brotherhood work, and from this time on we would deal with the problem in a more vital and serious way. He stirred us deeply, and especially the men of his congregation. All the party commented on the afternoon meeting, stating among other things, that it was the most inspiring and largest afternoon meeting they had held during the entire trip.

The Evening Session.

But the big meeting of the day, from the standpoint of business for the Brotherhood, was held in the evening. Eureka has had a Men's Club for several years. But it has not been affiliated with the national organization. Many of our men have felt for a long time that this ought to be done; but it seemed a little difficult to get the matter started in the right way. Promptly at 6:30, 250 men met in the auditorium of the Christian Church. The president of the Men's Club, D. Puterbaugh, announced that there had been some talk of turning the Men's Club into a Brotherhood subordinate to the Brotherhood of Diciples of Christ. He announced that the president was ready to entertain a motion to that effect. Professor R. E. Hieronymus introduced such a motion. A committee was appointed to report at the close of the meeting. Then came the banquet. It was served by thirteen young ladies from Eureka College. It was done quickly and tastily, and elicited special comment on the part of the Brotherhood workers.

Mr. Chilton's Address.

Several preachers were present: J. G. Waggoner, of Canton; H. C. Hands, of Fairbury; J. A. Barnett, of Galesburg; Oceola McNemar, of El Paso; W. F. Turner, of Peoria. These men made three minute speeches and brought greetings from their respective places. Mr. Chilton delivered the first address of the evening. Those who had heard him in the afternoon were prepared for a great message, but he went so far beyond the message of the afternoon, and even of the expectations of the people, that he completely captured the men. Mr. Chilton laid emphasis upon a Brotherhood that would not sweep our communion like a cyclone; but would grow up in the hearts of our people as a mighty inpelling force, moving men into larger and greater things for the Kingdom of God. He maintained that a Brotherhood of this character was possible in every church; and he convinced us to the extent that, in my judgment, there will be organized within a radius of fifty miles of Eureka College a large number of strong, vigorous and spiritual Brotherhoods.

Believes Disciples Are Only Beginning.

Mr. Long spoke next. It was an address of intense devotion as well as eloquence. He added many things to the address he had made in the afternoon and launched out upon the financial phases of the Kingdom of God. Mr. Long has given more than a million dollars to our cause. He spoke of a few of his large gifts very modestly, but just enough to give us his view of the matter of giving. He believes our brethren have not even commenced to begin to give. He proposes to make every gift he makes conditioned upon larger and greater things on the part of our men. This is sound business judgment and the best kind of religion. The Brotherhood is emphasizing two things on this campaign. First: The organization of new Brotherhoods. Second; the raising of money to support the work. It is a shame, and the Disciples ought to admit it with shamefacedness, that of the $54,000 expended in promoting the Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ, Mr. Long has given something like $48,000 of the money. Personally I believe it is one of the best investments he has made; but for a man of his business ability and training, it cannot help being a disappointment that he has put so much money into a movement with so little response from the brethren. Mr. Shellenberger's speech following the address of Mr. Long was for the purpose of raising money.

Mr. Long's Proposition.

During the afternoon Mr. Long had worked out a plan but had not mentioned it to anybody in Eureka. During his address he announced that if Illinois raised $2,000, the amount of money the committee had decided Illinois ought to give for the Brotherhood work, he would give one-fourth as much to the Illinois Christian Missionary Society and three-fourths as much to Eureka College. In other words, he was perfectly willing to make a personal gift to our cause in Illinois equal to the amount of money that the brethren in Illinois put into the Brotherhood work. He further promised to continue this ratio for any amount that we might raise up to $10,000; and from remarks he made, I feel sure he would be glad to go even beyond that. When this proposition was submitted by Mr. Long, some of us felt a great weakness come over us. We had just closed an endowment campaign of $135,00 for Eureka College and more than $20,000 of this had come from Eureka people. Besides, Eureka and vicinity had given in times past at least $100,000 to Eureka College. We were a little afraid of the proposition, but Mr. Long's heroic giving and faith in the Brotherhood movement inspired some of us to do our best. Within less than twenty-five minutes $2,200 had been subscribed, and there are enough people interested to increase the amount to $25,000. Everybody was blessed by the meeting, and no one rejoiced more over the victory than Mr. Long and his party of workers. At the conclusion of the meeting, the Men's Club, by a series of resolutions, was converted into a Brotherhood and the matter of securing members for the new Brotherhood is being prosecuted with vigor.

A Great Day.

We unhesitatingly say that, from the standpoint of the Brotherhood movement and of Eureka College, this was one of the greatest days for our cause in this state. It would be impossible in our brotherhood to select a group of men better equipped to inspire and lead an audience into great things. Hackleman, with his music; Chilton, with his eloquence; Shellenberger, with his secretarial ability; and Long, with his deep interest in our entire movement and Christian philanthropy; certainly constitute a team capable of great things in any community. This is the first time Mr. Long had been in Eureka, and our people were so enthusiastic over his visit, and he was so deeply interested in our work, that we are confident, sometime in the future, Mr. Long will be glad to visit us again, when the pressure is not so heavy and when he can have a little more time to come into complete harmony with this great small college.

A Tragedy of the Alps

One of the most noted Alpine climbers, Edward Whymper, recently died, at Chamonix, Switzerland. Mr. Whymper was the first man to reach the summit of Matterhorn, after many failures. But the descent was attended by a most serious tragedy, which is now recalled by the explorer's death. It was in 1865 that the successful ascent was made, the party consisted of four travelers—Whymper himself, the Rev. Charles Hudson, vicar of Skillington, in Lincolnshire, who was reckoned to be one of the best mountaineers of his time, and two younger men, Mr. Hadow and Lord Francis Douglas —and of three guides, Michel Croz, of Chamonix, together with Peter Taugwalder, a well-known Zermatt guide, and his son, also named Peter. The ascent was accomplished on July 14, 1865, by the eastern face, and only one portion of it was found to present any very exceptional difficulty or danger, and this took the party an hour and a half to traverse. On the descent Michel Croz took the lead, and was followed by Hadow, who was the least experienced mountaineer of the party, Lord Francis Douglas, though of the same age, having already won his spurs. Next followed Hudson, almost the equal of a guide for mountain skill and sureness of foot, then came Lord Francis Douglas followed by the elder Taugwalder, Whymper and the younger Taugwalder bringing up the rear in the order named. All were roped together, but it was afterwards ascertained that the rope joining Taugwalder to Lord Francis Douglas was of inferior quality, being older than the rest, and, as the event showed dangerously weakened by wear. All went well until the dangerous portion of the climb was reached. While traversing this portion the party was halted for a moment in order that Croz, who had laid aside his axe, might afford assistance to Hadow. At this critical moment Hadow slipped, fell against Croz, and knocked him over. Their weight dragged over Hudson and Lord Francis Douglas, and, though the Taugwalders and Whymper held their ground, the rope broke between the elder Taugwalder and Lord Francis Douglas, and the four who had fallen were precipitated to their doom. The bodies of Croz, Hudson, and Hadow were subsequently found at the foot of the precipice over which they had fallen, but that of Lord Francis Douglas was never found.

The Social Unrest in Europe

The Situation Here.

"What do you think of the situation in this country, as regards the church and labor?"

"Very hopeful, I think, as seen in the organization of the Congregational and Presbyterian departments of labor. Also in the Federated Church Council, which through its social department has issued the greatest expression as to the creed of the churches, in their belief in the industrial crisis, which is the best utterance that has ever been made. It is a problem of industry rather than a problem of the employe. I say industry, for the employer is just as needy as the employe."

Men and Religion And Industry.

"What effect do you think the Men and Religion Movement will have upon this problem?"

"It is a most hopeful effort to recruit men into the services of the community and if it is followed up as well as it has been prepared for, it will bring a great number of men to see the problem and to mediate it in the spirit of Jesus. Christian men have a great responsibility in the industrial crisis. If the present movement is to be led by men devoid of Christian spirit and method, I think it will result in spasms of blood and tears; but if conservative men imbued with the spirit of Jesus and his peaceful methods lead, there will be a radical evolution realizing real progress, rather than a destructive revolution which may retard it for a generation. My only concern is, whether the church will rally soon enough to assume real leadership."

"After your observation abroad, what have you to say to the ministers of America?"

"They should study the industrial problem. They should fearlessly preach the ethics of Jesus, and apply them practically to the issues now on hand."

When you love one another as brothers and treat each other reciprocally as such, and each one, seeking his own good in the good of all, shall identify his own life with the life of all, and shall always be ready to sacrifice himself for all the members of the common family, and they equally ready to sacrifice themselves for him, most of the ills which weigh to-day upon the human race will vanish like the thick mists gathered upon the horizon vanish at the rising of the sun: since it is His will that Love shall unite little by little, and ever more closely, the scattered elements of Humanity and order them in a single body, and Humanity be one, as He is one.—Joseph Mazzini.

The Moral Leaders of Israel

BY PROFESSOR HERBERT L. WILLETT

Section XLIV. Later Voices in Judah

November 5. Text for Special Study, Zechariah 9.

1. ALEXANDER AND AFTERWARD.

The Persian empire fell into decay before the advancing power of Macedonia, represented by Alexander the Great, and the Persian period of Jewish history was succeeded by the Greek and Syrian. Alexander's conquest of the oriental world was rapid and spectacular. After his victory over Darius at Issus in 333 B. C. he entered Syria and came down the Mediterranean coast, gathering the riches of Damascus and Tyre, though in the latter case only after a prolonged siege. The Jewish people, not forgetful of the punishments they had received for their failure to remain loyal at all times to the Persian rule, were slow to offer their allegiance to the new conqueror, but seem to have been treated with clemency by him.

Alexander passed on southward, meeting active resistance at Gaza, and then entered Egypt, where he spent a brief time in founding the city that was to bear his name. In 333 B. C. he again went eastward to complete his conquest of Persia, which was accomplished at the battle of Arbela in the same year. He then extended his rule as far as the Indus. In 323 he died, leaving no heir to succeed him, and bringing to an end the most remarkable military career in history. Tradition says that when Alexander lay dying his courtiers asked him, "To whom do you leave your empire?" and he replied, "To the strongest."

It was not strange that this great fabric should swiftly be rent into fragments. Of these, two were of great importance to the little state of Judah. They were the kingdom of Syria with its capital at Antioch on the Orontes, and Egypt with Alexandria as its metropolis. In these two kingdoms ruled the Seleucids and the Ptolemies. Seleuchus I. founded Antioch about 300 B. C., and Ptolemy I. (Soter), son of Lagus, was the first of the Egyptian line. Between these rival dynasties there was almo t constant war during the generations that followed. And since Palestine lay between the two capitals, it was frequently the scene of conflict and always the object of jealous regard.

At first the Ptolemies were the stronger, but with the accession of Ptolemy IV. (Philopator), the decline of the Egyptian power began. The victories of Antiochus III. who came to the throne of Syria in 224 B. C., brought Palestine into submission to the northern state. And this condition continued during the reigns of his son, Seleuchus IV. and his grandson, Antiochus Epiphanes, who became king in 176 B. C. It is with this last named monarch that the romantic narratives of the Maccabean age have most to do.

2. PROPHETIC FRAGMENTS.

Certain portions of the Old Testament literature appear to have their origin in this period. Among them are the books of Chronicles with their supplements in the fragments of Ezra and Nehemiah, which must date from a period as late as the times of Alexander, for they name Jaddua, the high priest, who was a contemporary of the Macedonian conqueror; the book of Esther; the little philosophical work, Ecclesiastes; the apocryphal book of the Wisdom of Jesus, the son of Sirach, popularly known as Ecclesiasticus; and the apocalyptic books of Daniel and Enoch find their setting in this age.

But there were some works of a prophetic nature which also took form at this time. And among them the most important are the two later sections of the Book of Zechariah (9-11 and 12-14). Earlier Bible students drew from references to Ephraim, Damascus, Assyria and Egypt in the first of these two works, the conclusion that it must have been pre-exilic in its date. But closer investigation has revealed abundant reasons for the assignment of both these later parts of the book to the Greek period. How they came to be attached to the eight authentic chapters of Zechariah is not known. The indifference to authorship in most ancient writings must be the explanation for the large amount of anonymous material found in the Old Testament. Considerable sections of the Book of Isaiah, such as 13, 14, 24-27, 34, 35, 40-55 and 56-66, have already been pointed out as of this class. Such floating materials as are found in the second and third sections of Zechariah and in Malachi could not have been unusual.

3. PROPHETIC EXPECTATIONS. (Zech. 9.)

The first of these two sections of Zechariah (9-11) seems to fall in the period soon after Alexander's wars and death. Apparently Egypt and Syria are struggling for Palestine. Perhaps the references to cities of the north and the sea coast that have recently passed through distress or are still to suffer, refer to the campaign of Alexander which stripped those districts from the Lebanons to the desert of Egypt. (9:1-8.)

Then comes a highly significant passage, probably the most familiar in the whole of this part of the book. It is the well-known reference to the coming of Judah's expected king. In an age when the province was only moderately prosperous, after the long depression of its slow revival, when Judah alone survived of the ancient united kingdom of Israel and Judah, when there was no king upon the throne but a Greek deputy in charge, when still there came from time to time groups of returning pilgrims from the distant lands of Egypt and Assyria whither their fathers had been carried, and when religious and political leadership was likely to be prostituted to selfish ends, such hopes as those which these later and unknown prophets cherished were of value to the community.

Verses 9 and 10 describe the coming of Judah's ideal king, who will approach, not in the garb of a warrior nor riding a war horse, but as a minister of peace. Jerusalem should rejoice at the coming of her king, for with his advent the weapons of war were to perish from the land, and his broad authority should be promotive only of quiet and safety.

It was not strange that the writer of the First Gospel felt that in this word there was a picture too impressive not to be applied to Jesus at the moment of his triumphal entry into the city (Matt. 21:5). And perhaps Jesus himself was mindful of the words of the prophet when he chose the lowly animal of peace on which to make his final journey to the city.

Out of the experience of prisoner-hood the people of Judah were soon to emerge. They were to find in Zion a stronghold. Judah and Ephraim, conceived now as ideally one again, even as they had been in earlier times, are ready for warfare against whatever foes may approach, particularly against Greece, the new mistress of the world, whose sons the Syrians have plundered the fair land. God will be a leader and defender of his people, for his goodness is great and he is a Savior of those who trust in him.

Thus in broken utterance the prophet gives expression to his word of hope for the future of the city.

4. JUDAH'S WORTHLESS LEADERS.

Chapters 10 and 11 are less hopeful in their tone. Drought has made the blessing of rain the most desirable of gifts, but superstitious practices such as the worship of teraphim and the consultation of diviners are common. All such practices are valueless. Then the prophet proceeds to reprove the shepherds or teachers who have betrayed their trust and left the people without their direction. In such an emergency God himself must intervene to strengthen his people, Judah and Israel. He will gather the scattered ones from Egypt and Assyria, and these nations that have devastated Israel shall be punished.

Danger is at hand from the north. The weak shepherds raise the cry of alarm, but in them there is no help. An enemy approaches. The flock of Israel is doomed to slaughter. The prophet himself must try the task of a true shepherd. He takes to himself two staves, "graciousness" and "unity," but these seem of no value. There is no favor for Israel from her enemies, nor is there any unity among the people. He gives up his task in despair and turns over the people to their fate. And when he asks if his services have been worth anything he is insulted by being offered thirty pieces of silver, the price of the cheapest slave. It is evident that he is accounted only as the rest of the leaders, worthless and selfish.

In this enigmatical passage one seems to hear the echo of earnest efforts made by some true-hearted leader in Judah to stem the tide of apostasy and to correct the evil manners of the time. The reference to the price of our Lord's betrayal (Matt. 27:9), is of course merely a coincidence of words, but again the writer of the Gospel narrative felt that the passage was significant, if only by reason of the similar low esteem in which a true leader was held.

5. APOCALYPTIC DREAMS.

The second section (12-14) is an admirable illustration of that apocalyptic literature which by this time had become familiar through such writings as Zephaniah, Ezekial, Joel, and the first section of Zechariah. The troublous nature of the times made proper the description of religious conditions in terms of a conflict to be decided between Judah and her enemies in the vicinity of Jerusalem. Throughout this section there prevails the spirit of hope. Jerusalem is to be too strong for her enemies. There is even a disposition to draw a distinction between the country districts of Judah and the metropolis as rivals for leadership in the new time of crisis.

Upon the people the divine spirit is to be poured out, and in humility and penitence they are to mourn over their past sins of forgetfulness of God. A fountain is to be opened for the cleansing of sin, and the false prophets, the idols and the implements of sorcery are to be destroyed. The men who practice upon the credulity of the people through the arts of the prophet are quite discredited.

Discipline and chastisement must fall upon Zion. Her people are to be cut down in numbers, but she cannot perish. Refined as silver she will endure.

In chapter 14 the final crisis and deliverance are reached. The Day of the Lord comes. The nations fight against Jerusalem in the valley outside the city. Jerusalem is taken and her people are in anguish of spirit. But Jehovah appearing at the moment of greatest danger intervenes in behalf of his chosen ones. He stands on Mount Olivet in this great apocalyptic scene, and the mountain splits in two at his touch. Such an earthquake as had not been known since the days of Uzziah cleaves the hills. Out of the clefts of Zion come living waters as in the dream of Ezekiel, only they flow both east and west. From twilight darkness there comes a new day. The land is enriched, Jerusalem is restored, her foes are chastised, the nations are brought to conviction of Jehovah's power, and the city purified becomes a place of holiness where even the bells of the horses and the pots and bowls of sanctuary and palace are inscribed with holy mottoes. No longer is Judah the faring-place of strangers and traffickers. Her peace has come; her future is sure.

In such words the confident expectation of dreamers of the dawn attempted to uphold the hearts of the weary in days of gloom. But Judah was to see even more desperate distresses than those through which she had gone, for the Maccabean age of persecution and heroism was just ahead.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

BY W. D. ENDRES.

Topic Nov. 5. Lessons from Great Lives. XI. John. Jno. 21:20-25. (Consecration Meeting.)

Tradition gives us some very interesting accounts of incidents in the life of John. These for the most part are borne out in the scriptures we have concerning him. In it all we have a fine example of the growth and development of one who has come under the refining and hallowing influences of the Nazarene.

In the earlier days he was vehement, tenacious, and ambitious. He would have called down fire out of heaven upon the Samaritan village which denied him and James shelter (Lk. 9:51.) He through his mother sought a special place of dignity in the kingdom (Mk. 10:35.) Ireneaus tells us that he fiercely combated the heresy of Cerinthus, even refusing to be under the same roof with the heretic, and that he wrote his gospel to refute such heretical teachings. This all seems very appropriate to the title given him and his brother, James, "sons of thunder."

Notwithstanding all this he was not only called to be an Apostle of Jesus Christ (Lk. 5:8-11,) but he had a prominent place in that college. He was one of the three who was permitted to see the raising of Jairus' daughter, (Mk. 5:37.) He again was present on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mt. 17:1.) He was nearest his Lord at the time of His agony in Gethsemane, (Lk. 14:33.) He was intimate with the Lord and felt free to inquire as to the time of the fulfillment of his prophecies. He was one of the two commissioned to prepare the place to eat the last supper, (Lk. 22:8.) These qualities to which reference was made above were not objectionable to the Saviour when he was looking for men to whom he desired to his great work. Is this not a hint to us that today there is quite as much need and possibilities in such men in religious work as in the days of Jesus?

But John is the best known as the "beloved apostle." And that too is true. His gospel is the gospel of love. He tells us, "God so loved the world," etc., (Jno. 3:16.) He it was whom Jesus loved, who leaned back upon his Lord's breast and inquired who it was that should betray him. His interpretation of the gospel was that it was a salvation by love and that love alone would save us. "He that loves is begotten of God." Moved by this spirit of love Clement tells us that he journeyed far into a forest to reclaim a convert who had fallen into bad ways and joined a band of robbers. And tradition tells us that when he was old and could not speak long at a time he was carried into the church and in addressing the congregation he would simply repeat the old commandment, "Little children, love one another."

Here is a splendid example of the power of the gospel to take the proud spirit of man and soften, and mellow and direct it in channels of usefulness for mankind and the glory of the Father. Can we do better than to let the same hallowing influence enter our lives and make them like unto him in all good things?

Cotner University

The faculty has had somechanges in it. Two new professors are in the science department. Prof. R. L. Hoff, of the chair of biology, and Prof. Hubert D. Shellenberger, of Wooster, Ohio, of the chair of chemistry.

The summer saw many improvements made. Some new rooms were opened on the fifth floor of the main building. New floors were put in in some of the halls. Many of the walls were treated with paint and varnish. New furniture was also placed in a goodly number of the rooms. The business department greatly added to its equipment. This department is one of the best equipped in the west. It is in charge of Prof. John Walker, and three able assistants. Two lovely studios for the music department were furnished during the summer.

The Medical School has been reorganized, or rather, a new medical school was organized. The Old Lincoln Medical School was allowed to die. In its place the Cotner University Medical College was organizel. It is under the complete control of the university. No can can teach on the faculty without the approval of the Board of Trustees of the University. The school has opened with much promise. High standards will be maintained. Our fall opening was most auspicious. We have a fine student body.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is a national religious paper published by the Disciples of Christ in the interests of Christian unity and the Kingdom of God. While its circulation is nation-wide and impartially distributed among all the states, it recognizes a special obligation to the State of Illinois in which it is published. It desires particularly to serve the cause of Christ in Illinois by publishing its significant church news, by interpreting its religious life and by promoting the ideals of the Disciples within its borders. To this end the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY maintain a state office at Springfield, the capital and central city. It is the purpose of the state editor to study the whole field of Illinois, visiting all the churches, reporting his observations and pointing the churches to ever higher ideals. Pastors and church workers are requested to co-operate by regularly sending items of news, clippings from local papers, parish papers, weekly leaflets, occasional paragraphs of sermons and any other information that will give to the state editor all the data for reporting and interpreting the progress of Christian work in the state. All communications to the editor may be addressed, 24 Illinois National Bank Building, Springfield. All business communications should be addressed to the Chicago office.

The congregation of Saybrook is in a meeting led by Herbert Yeuell.

E. M. Smith is holding a revival meeting for the congregation of Tabernacle Church, Decatur, of which he is pastor.

J, H. Wright, pastor at Harristown, is holding a meeting for his home congregation, being assisted by Frank McDonald.

F. L. Davis' meeting with his home church, at Wawnesville, had resulted in seventeen additions, fourteen by baptism, at last report.

Lincoln Church has planned a revival meeting to be held beginning the latter part of October, with the pastor, E. A. Gilliland, doing the preaching.

The congregation at Newman, where H. J. Hostetler preaches, will have S. S. Jones of Danville in a revival meeting during the winter season.

E. W. Murch, of Rantoul, has been called to succeed H. M. Hall at Athens, Ohio. It has not been learned whether Mr. Murch has accepted the call.

The revival meeting at Humboldt, conducted by Hill and Knowles, is receiving assistance from the other churches of the community. At last report, there had been three additions.

In a revival meeting at Hutsonville with W. I. Griffin as evangelist, there were four additions the first week, with indications pointing to a meeting of much larger proportions.

Theo. F. Hall entered the third year of his pastorate at Benton, in September. The work so far this year promises to more than duplicate the excellent results of the first two years.

Princeton Church is being led in a revival meeting by Vawter and Marty. There were nineteen additions on the day the first invitation was extended. The pastor is Cecil C. Carpenter.

Evangelist A. W. Crabb is holding a stirring revival meeting at Harvel with unusually large congregations, and seven additions by baptism at last report. The pastor is S. R. Lewis.

The meeting at Pekin, conducted by the pastor, O. C. Bolman, assisted by Leroy F. Sargent, started with nine additions the first day and unusually bright prospects for other accessions immediately.

A union revival meeting will be held at Palestine, conducted by John S. Hamilton. All the churches of the city will co-operate in the campaign. D. W. Conner is minister of the church of the Disciples.

J. A. Clemens, of Casey, is holding a meeting in Frankfort for C. W. Freeman. This is an exchange meeting for one held by Mr. Freeman at Casey in which there were five additions on profession of faith.

A tent meeting is being held in the country near Caldwell, in which three churches are co-operating. The evangelist is Harold E. Monser who is assisted by Ralph C. Varner and wife as singers.

C. R. Piety, who is conducting a revival meeting at Secor, suffered an attack of appendicitis, which necessitated discontinuance of the meeting. Mr. Piety is improving and is anticipating removal to Indiana after recovery.

David D. Dick was assisted in a meeting at Rossville by Charles H. Bloom of New York. The meeting lasted three weeks, during which there were seven additions, and by far more good accomplished for the church and community than can be tabulated.

The meeting at Mt. Erie, in Wayne County, conducted by O. M. Eaton, closed the first week in October, having resulted in fifty-one additions, all of whom were adults. A preacher has been called and money is being solicited for a new edifice.

Danville First Church and its pastor, William E. Adams, will have the assistance of T. L. Lowe, of Columbus, Ohio, in a series of meetings to be held in February. In exchange Mr. Adams will conduct a meeting for Mr. Lowe in his Ohio church.

Guy B. Williamson, who preaches at Waverly, is having the assistance of Charles H. Bloom, of New York, in a revival meeting. The other churches of the community are assisting in a cordial way. The Baptist pastor brought his entire congregation to attend the Sunday night service.

The pastor of Lincoln Church, E. A. Gilliland, assisted H. A. Davis in a meeting at Waynestown, Ind., in which there were about thirty additions, twenty-four being on profession of faith. A tent was used for the meeting and large congregations were in attendance. The method of the revival and its results have been highly commended.

Batavia Church, for which Edward A. Henry preaches, reported all debts paid at the end of its fiscal year, and an offering to missions and benevolence more than double that of any former year. The excellent financial condition of the church is accounted for by the use of the Duplex System, which has been employed for a year.

The Galesburg pastor, J. A. Barnett, has concluded four years of ministry with this church. His ministry here has been unusually fruitful. There have been 650 additions, of which number 343 were added without the aid of an evangelist. The Sunday-school has increased to the point where its average attendance is about 100 more than the average at the time the pastorate was begun. It is hoped that a new building will be erected soon, for which purpose a choice building lot has been purchased. This is one of the several congregations in Illinois that is a living-link in the Foreign Missionary Society.

H. H. Peters, who preaches at Arthur, writes: "I have been preaching half time at Arthur, Illinois, in connection with my work as Endowment Secretary of Eureka College, since the first of last July. I find this one of the most delightful churches for which I have ever preached. There is a membership of about 140, with a Bible-school ranging from 125 to 150, and with at least a dozen men who are working at the job. There have been twelve additions to the church and an indebtedness of $1,000 has been paid off. This was the balance on the new church and a small paving bill. This is the first time, since I was a boy preacher, that I have done work of this character. While I am not a believer in what we commonly call "railroad preaching," I sincerely believe many of our churches would be better off with half time preaching, provided they paid for it what they should, and let the responsibility for directing the church rest upon the shoulders of the men in the church. I shall continue with the church for a year any way."

Eureka College

At the meeting of the Board of Trustees of Eureka College, held Wednesday, October 11, the matter of a new campaign came up among the first things on the program.

The present endowment of the college is, in round figures, $150,000. The success of the recent campaign encourages us in the belief that the putting of Eureka College upon a firm financial basis is within the scope of reasonable probability.

The Endowment Committee, therefore, recommended the inauguration of a new increased endowment campaign, beginning January 1, 1912, the pledges on the same to be taken conditioned upon the increase of the endowment fund to the total of $250,000, and to become payable whenever said endowment fund shall attain the said sum, increase from every source to be included; the time limit of said campaign to be January 1, 1915.

The Committee on Buildings and Grounds refused to be outdone in the matter of recommendations, and reported in favor of a campaign for at least $45,000 for the purpose of remodeling the middle building into a science hall, costing about $15,000 for work and equipment and about $30,000 for a gymnasium.

The Board immediately appointed a committee to consider both propositions. That committee in consultation with the endowment secretary prepared a definite program and reported favorably on both.

The campaign is on and the endowment secretary is at work. We are making no promises except to do our best. But we expect to win. In fact, we have no doubt about it. The emphasis will be placed on the building enterprise for the present. We will begin on the gymnasium just as soon as the pledges to the building fund amount to $25,000. By the time the gymnasium is completed we will have the last $20,000 for the equipment of our middle building for a science hall and for other improvements.

The endowment feature of the campaign will be inaugurated Jan. 1, 1912. It will take a short time to get this started in good shape. But by the time the building enterprise is completed the enthusiasm over the prospect of increasing our endowment to $250,000 will be such that we shall have no difficulty in winding up the campaign with the same success of our recent one. Every friend of Eureka College ought to begin at once and in dead earnest.

H. H. Peters,
Endowment Secretary.

Chicago

After a long period of inaction the Disciples' Social Union came into life again last week in the form of a banquet promoted by the Christian Business Men's Association. This latter is a voluntary organization of the leading men of our churches with the simple and elastic program of doing what needs to be done to advance the interests of the Disciples in this big town. They are not content with the fine social fellowship that has grown up among themselves; they wish to get behind important projects in an informal way and boost them. Many are the achievements recent history puts to their credit. And last Thursday adds yet one more. The Douglas Park Church has been holding on to life by the tip of its fingers for the last ten years. Recently under the leadership of Vaughan Dabney, a Bethany College graduate, it has taken on new and susprising life, entirely nonplussing those who a year or two ago would have voted to abandon the work at that point. They are now worshiping in a Congregational church with their Congregational brethren and have been for some months considering a proposition to purchase the property and unite the two churches. With characteristic grace the business men put their association behind the enterprise and insisted upon raising enough money from their members at the banquet to clinch the purchase. The church has $4,200 on hand. They will carry a mortgage of $2,800. The cost of the property is $8,000. One thousand dollars was needed. It was raised that night. H. L. Willett, Austin Hunter and C. G. Kindred made speeches. Mr. Thomas, the president of the association, asked for pledges following an explanation by Mr. Dabney. The prospect before the Douglas Park Church is very hopeful. Under Mr. Dabney's leadership it bids fair to become soon an entirely self-supporting and efficient congregation.

An Important Announcement to Chicago Ministers.

The following notice from Professor Allen Hoben of the University of Chicago ought to be of interest to all our ministers in this city. The Juvenile Protective Association has been one of the most effective agencies for child redemption and welfare in the history of Chicago philanthropic efforts. Some of the facts connected with the work of this organization are of the most startling and disquieting character, but they are the kind that every minister ought to understand in order rightly to direct the forces of his church as aids in social betterment. Professor Hoben's note speaks for itself.

"I am very anxious that Chicago ministers of all denominations attend the annual meeting of the Juvenile Protective Association, and that they bring delegates from their churches. At considerable expense we have gathered facts as to the conditions that menace and destroy child life in our city, and all who attend our annual meeting will receive enough reliable information to compensate them for the effort. There will be no attempt to raise funds—but we do need intelligent coöperation on the part of all religious bodies.

"There is a suspicion that the churches are not interested in these vital problems. I want the ministers and other representatives to come and show that they are.

"The meeting will be held in Northwestern University Assembly Hall, 31 West Lake St., Friday, Oct. 27, 2:30 p. m. Mrs. Bowen will preside. Allan Hoben.

John L. Brandt has taken the pastorate of First Church, St. Louis, Mo.

William G. Eldred has accepted a call to continue as pastor of the church at Carlisle, Ky. This will be Mr. Eldred's fourth year with this church.

A union meeting is in progress at the church at Sullivan, Ind. The congregations of the Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist churches are uniting in these services.

S. M. Hawthorne, pastor at Gwynneville, Ind., has tendered his resignation there. A new church building has been completed during Mr. Hawthorne's pastorate.

The new church at Lynchburg, Va., was dedicated on Sunday, October 22. Earle Wilfley of Washington, D. C., delivered the sermon.

The church at Lawrence, Kans., has received an additional gift of $500 from R. A. Long. Mr. Long had previously given $1000 to this church.

E. D. Murch has resigned at Rantoul, Ill., after a pastorate of fifteen months, and will take up the work at Athens, Ohio. He will succeed H. Maxwell Hall.

Leland W. Porter, who was recently ordained to the ministry by A. D. Harmon at First Church, St. Paul, Minn., has taken the pastorate of First Church, Helena, Mont.

Benjamin L. Smith, who has served the church at Salina, Kan., has accepted a unanimous call to the pastorate of Central Church, Moberly, Mo. Mr. Smith will probably begin his work about the middle of November.

W. S. Irvin has received a unanimous call from his congregation at Nicholasville, Ky., to ermain with them another year. Mr. Irvin has occupied this pastorate for the past five years.

Roger T. Nooe, for several years pastor of Crescent Hill Church, Louisville, Ky., has accepted a call to Frankfort, Ky., where he will succeed C. R. Hudson. He will take up the work there early in November.

Otis Hawkins of Dallas, Tex., has accepted the pastorate of First Church, Cleburne, Tex. This church has been without a pastor some weeks, since the resignation of H. E. Luck.

A successful Sunday-school rally was held October 21-22 at Central Church, Waterloo, Iowa, by Clarence L. Depew and W. T. Fisher, who are conducting a number of rallies in Illinois and Iowa.

Work has been resumed on the East Dallas, Tex., Church. This building, which will cost $40,000, will be one of the most complete structures in Dallas. Of this amount $15,000 has already been paid.

C. O. McMullen, who resigned as pastor of Woodsun Church, St. Joseph, Mo., to accept a call to Montgomery City, Ill., has returned to his former charge in response to a strong appeal from the congregation.

J. L. Keevil, pastor of Central Church, Sherman, Tex., has accepted a call to Central Church, Knoxville, Tenn. He will continue to serve the Sherman church until his successor is secured.

Robert Sellers, of Elwood, Ind., is conducting a meeting at Bengal, Ind. Lowell C. McPherson is conducting a meeting at First Church, Quincy, Ill. The services are being attended by large audiences.

C. H. DeVoe has returned to his pastorate at Mason City, Iowa, after an absence of two months. A series of evangelistic meetings will begin November 5 under the leadership of James Small of Kansas City, Mo.

The members of the Brotherhood party visited Hiram, Ohio, on October 22, enroute from Cleveland to Pittsburg. H. R. Baker, State Brotherhood president, joined the party at Cincinnati for the tour through the state.

E. J. Emmons has concluded a successful meeting at Jefferson, Iowa, with about fifty accessions. On Sunday, October 15, Mr. Emmons rededicated the building, which has been undergoing extensive improvements.

The annual report of First Church, Lincoln, Neb., H. H. Harmon, pastor, shows a good growth in all its activities. The amount of $1658.86 which was raised for missions and benevolences indicates the steady, progressive work being done here.

Robert Graham Frank, pastor at Liberty, Mo., has concluded his meeting with G. L. Bush at Carrollton, Mo., and is now in a meeting with his own congregation. He is assisted by W. N. Briney of Louisville, Ky., and Miss Una Dell Berry.

L. B. Haskins has resigned the pastorate of Twenty-fifth Street Church, Baltimore, and will close his work at the end of the year. Mr. Haskins will be available for an other pulpit at that time and should be called to some promising field.

The church at Rochester, Ind., where E. S. Farmer ministers, will celebrate its twenty-fifth anniversary and rededicate its house of worship November 12. Evangelist Roy L. Brown will have charge of the services.

R. W. Abberley and Leroy St. John, who recently closed a successful meeting at Central Church, Springfield, Mo., with 134 additions, are now in St. Louis, Mo., assisting in the simultaneous religious campaign being held by the fourteen churches of that city.

F. D. Macy has resigned his pastorate at Bartlesville, Okla., and will probably locate at Ardmore, Okla. Mr. Macy has been with the Bartlesville church for two and one-half years and in this time a $40,000 church has been erected and the membership increased more than 100.

J. Stuart Mills and T. E. Winter of Fulton, Mo., have concluded a two weeks' campaign of church extension work, visiting a number of churches in the county and giving illustrated lectures on mission work. They will conduct another week's campaign in November.

W. H. Hampton, pastor at Liberty, Ind., has closed a successful meeting at Andersonville, Ind. The church there had been abandoned, but Mr. Hampton finished the meetings with large audiences attending, a number of accessions and many reconsecrated to the work. It was the best meeting ever held in this vicinity.

About 1000 persons attended the meeting held at Joplin, Mo., by the Brotherhood party now touring the country. The speeches of R. A. Long, C. M. Chilton and G. A. Chapman were enthusiastically received and $700 was subscribed toward the development of Brotherhood work in Missouri. A large number were present from out of the city, delegates being sent from nearly all towns within a radius of fifty miles.

Two of our Kansas City churches have received large bequests recently, by the will of Mrs. Mary Atkins, who left the sum of $100,000 to Linwood Boulevard Church and $25,000 to First Church, of which she had been a member many years. This gift will aid materially in solving the problem which First Church, like all down town churches, has had to meet. Plans are now under consideration for the erection of a $40,000 addition to the church, which will give an opportunity for the development of institutional work.

A new church has been organized at Vermont Square, Los Angeles, Calif., as a result of the meeting held there recently by Bruce Brown of Fullerton, Calif. An excellent corner has been purchased and a tabernacle will be erected within a few weeks. I. E. West will supply the pulpit for the present and it is hoped that by January 1 a permanent pastor may be located. The church begins with sixty-two members and encouraging prospects, being in the most rapidly growing section of Los Angeles.

The cornerstone of the new building being erected by the congregation of Hillside church, Indianapolis, Ind., was laid on Sunday, October 15, with appropriate ceremonies. The pastor, Charles Fillmore, was assisted in the services by Cecil Sharp, of Hammond, Harry G. Hill, C. H. Winders, Clay Trusty, J. M. Canfield, who organized the church nineteen years ago, and Raymond A. Smith, a former pastor. The new church will be of brick veneer and will cost $20,000. There will be reading rooms and a gymnasium in the basement for the use of the young men of the neighborhood. The congregation has been doubled in the last year and continues to increase.

The Call of the Empire State

The state of New York is an empire of itself. It is the greatest mission field in the world. Every missionary appeal is applicable in New York with a peculiar emphasis.

The appeal of a great non-Christian population fits here. There are 1,900,624 foreigners in New York, and a very large majority of them are practically heathen. We must Christianize them or they will heathenize us.

Patriotism demands an earnest effort to save our state, and turn its mighty moral and political influence to the side of right. A very large percentage of each year's million immigrants find their way into the United States through this "gateway of the nation," and all too many of them stay here. These must be Americanized.

The love of home and family applies here. No greater legacy can be left to the oncoming generations than a devoutly Christian civilization. Intemperance and foreign ideals destroy our homes.

The heroic spirit finds here a strong appeal. It is a monstrous task to plant churches in our great cities, where building sites and buildings are so costly, and where business and pleasure appeal on every hand. Some one says the song should read:

"I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord,
"I'll stay where you want me to stay."

The field is big. One-tenth of the population of the United States are within our borders. One of our cities has as many people as all Canada, and our state has as many people as fourteen of our Western states all counted together.

Rapid growth presents inviting opportunities. The increase of New York in the past ten years was as much as that of eleven of our Western states and the total present population of Nevada thrown in.

New York should be considered the strategic state in religious work as she is in politics, commerce and in the publishing business.

The Macedonian cry of need applies here. There is one Disciple in the state for every 959 of the population, and one Disciple preacher for each 182,000. Each of our preachers may have a parish as large as Syracuse, Elmira and Tonawanda put together.

Our plea wins in New York wherever the Disciples are loyal and where enough force can be put back of it to make it heard.

Every church planted in this soil is a base of supplies for all our missionary and benevolent enterprises. We have no anti-missionary churches in the state.

Give us men and give us means for this greatest of all mission fields.

R. STEWART, Acting Cor. Sec.
Rochester, N. Y.

African Mission Station Granted by the Belgian Government

Monieka is granted—the station that we have prayed and waited for so long. But do you know, that Monieka like Longa and Lotumbe, has been granted because of medical service rendered and upon the promise to keep a doctor there? Do you know that we have no legal right to these stations unless we fulfill our promise? Shall we give back Lotumbe station to the state and admit that we cannot open Monieka because we have no physician in our great brotherhood who will consecrate his life to this work? Shall we now give up this promising field where our native evangelists have built up a church of nearly four hundred members? This field where the evangelists have labored so hard, suffered persecution and been misrepresented by the Catholics, and cast into prison where they have spent months in chains? Sixty-five evangelists are now out from Monieka in the surrounding villages. We have promised this church from the beginning that as soon as the state would permit we would come to them. This promise has helped to hold them together and helped them to endure persecution, for the heathen and Catholics have tried repeatedly to drive the Christians out. Shall we be compelled to break faith with this church and turn this field over to Rome who is fighting so hard for it?

Brethren, shall we who boast of being second to none in loyalty to Christ and evangelism say to the world by not answering this call that we have not one physician who will consecrate himself to this work, and not one man of means or a single church that will stand behind him. This is not a call to a life of wealth and ease but a call to work and hardships, to service in God's most needy field.

Crucial Time in Our Sunday-school Work

Never before in the history of the American Christian Missionary Society has so much depended upon the offering of the Sunday-schools in November. It will be remembered that a little over a year ago the National Sunday-school interests of the Disciples of Christ were merged with the American Christian Missionary Society. Since that time it is to this American Mission offering that we must look not only for the general home missionary work, but for the promotion of our organized Sunday-school work in both state and national departments. It will be of interest to know something of the special fields, the solution of whose Sunday-school problems lies in this November offering.

Ohio has recently called Myron C. Settle of Kansas to the office of state Sunday-school superintendent. Ohio has had Sunday-school superintendents in the past, but the work was discontinued because of financial reasons. Last year Ohio schools gave $1,999.40 for American Missions, half of which was used to support the Sunday-school department. It will take an offering of not less than $3,000 this year to meet the demands here, and Ohio schools are able to give it and are expected to do so.

West Virginia has called John R. Clark to a like position in this little mountain state. Mr. Clark will give only Sundays to the work in connection with his school duties at Bethany during the winter. If the offering justifies the state board however in doing so, he will spend all his time in the field beginning with the spring. The West Virginia schools gave only about two hundred dollars last year, they must give at least a thousand this year. Wheeling always gives one hundred of this, and the others can easily make up the remainder.

Michigan has had a man for full time service since June 1, Walter G. Hopkins, of Ann Arbor. It was hoped the schools would raise last year $400 and so support the work in a special contract with the American Society. They gave only $173.80, and this was six times what they gave the year befort. The state board awaits the returns from Michigan schools before deciding whether the service may be continued.

The Maryland-District of Columbia Convention recently voted unanimously that their entire offering from the Sunday-schools should be used to employ a Sunday-school specialist for the Atlantic Coast.

Last year they gave $671.77 and if to this is added Eastern Pennsylvania and New Jersey offerings, we have a little over one thousand dollars. They must reach two thousand this year if the specialist is to be located in this extremely important district.

New York state has recently called C. A. Brady to become both state evangelist and state Sunday-school superintendent after January 1. The schools are expected to support Mr. Brady for the portion of his time that he will devote to the Bible-school interests. Last year their offerings afforded less than $300 for this purpose, they must at least double their offerings this year if the schools are to receive anything like an adequate attention.

L. C. Oberlies, the genial state superintendent of Nebraska, has been asked to represent the American Society among the Sunday-schools of the Dakotas and Wyoming. If their offerings permit the expenses of the trips, he will attend the state conventions and visit some individual schools, making one trip to each state during the year. Of course he cannot go if the offerings do not enable the society to send him to these needy fields.

Wisconsin has been doing splendid work during the year with J. Harry Bullock as state superintendent. Their support of him has been too meager to permit even his attendance upon district conventions. By combining the state and national work, it is hoped the Wisconsin schools will double their offerings of $150 last year, in which case the work planned for will be executed and every Wisconsin school will be helped.

Virginia is seeking to put a man for full time among the Sunday-schools of the old dominion. Some suggestions have been made about Virginia Christian College coöperating in this. In any event the larger part of the support for such a man must come in this November offering. Last year Virginia schools actually gave less than they did the year before. They must set their stakes for a round thousand dollars this year and they can raise it.

New Mexico has a fine state superintendent, J. Wilburn Rose. Under his leadership this new state made the largest proportionate gain of any state in the union in the offering of last year.

Alabama, Georgia and Florida have been endeavoring to unite and with the aid of the American Society, put a man at work among the Sunday-schools.

The call of the northwest is heard in many departments, but in none more imperatively than the Sunday-school. With hundreds of towns that have no Sunday-school at all, it is imperative that a missionary work be done in this growing part of the land, as well as to care for and develop the schools already in existence. The answer to the appeal from Washington, Idaho and Montana is dependent solely upon the response that the schools of those states, and the states of the stronghold, make on Sunday-school day for American Missions.

These are the chief new needs appearing in the Sunday-school work of our people. There remains the carrying on and enlargement of the work already in operation in both the states' and national department. In addition are the general appeals from the workers among the immigrants and all other mission work in America. This is indeed a crucial hour. Will our Sunday-schools respond to the demands upon them? We have faith to believe that they will.

True Economy

The difference in cost between an alum baking powder and the highest-class cream of tartar baking powder would not amount for a family's supply to one dollar a year.

Dr. Price's is the standard cream of tartar baking powder. It makes the food delicious and healthful.

NOTE.—You cannot, if you value good health, afford to use cheap, low-grade, alum baking powders. They are apt to spoil the food; they do endanger the health. All physicians will tell you that alum in food is deleterious.

Send for your supplies, divide your apportionment among the various classes, strive to go beyond the goal if possible, add the birthday gifts, solicit the cradle roll and home department for aid, get some friends to help you. Let us raise not less than $40,000 to use in the service of the Lord in the home land. Write us for help in any way.

ROBT. M. HOPKINS,
American Bible-school superintendent.

Floods Are Rising in China

Doctor Paul Wakefield writing from Wuhu, China, to the North China Daily News reports the flood conditions of that section as growing rapidly worse. As has been stated in these columns, the missionaries of the Disciples and our Chinese churches are situated in the very heart of the stricken region. Doctor Wakefield's communication follows:

Wuhu, Aug. 29: The conditions at Wuhu have been growing rapidly worse in the last few days. The water mark as recorded at the Customs is thirty feet two inches, which is ten inches higher than any previously recorded. There have been heavy rains for the last three days. The whole foreign road from the Wuhu Hospital to the city is now under water and the water is still rising. The wall around the Customs has been washed away. The new Bund has disappeared, and the water is filling in the land around the Butterfield godown though it has not reached its foundations as yet. Two big rice godowns at the Customs, belonging to Yung Yueung, of Canton, have collapsed. The only way to travel at all is in tubs and sampans. The main streets of the city are all flooded and all business is at a standstill. The Taotai has been flooded out of his yamen. Practically all the city is under water. In some of the main streets it is quite six feet deep. Many of the houses are falling in, and a high wind has been blowing the last twelve hours that has aided in the destruction.

Sickness Beginning.

A large part of the city has been flooded for the past six weeks, and the sewage of the whole place has floated from one house to another. On warm days the odor is very bad. Fish are beginning to come to the surface. Considering these conditions there is little sickness so far. The flies, however, are becoming very numerous, and typhoid is common. The people are in a condition to pick up any passing infection, and if cholera should start in the city it would be frightful.

The conditions to the north of the river are even worse than here. All rice from here to Wuweichow and Chaohsien and beyond is reported lost. Every day brings report of dykes, farther inland, that have given way. The Yangtze is dotted over with wreckage of houses and farm utensils and floating grain, which crowds of natives are raking in when it comes along the shore. When the storm goes down we hope to get inland and shall be able to report with accuracy conditions there.

A Word To Our Indiana Churches

The first Sunday of November is by general agreement devoted to State Missions. It should be observed in all of our churches. It should be a time for special prayer for our state work. Pray for the nine struggling mission churches we have been helping with our means. They need our prayers as well as our financial support. Whiting, Indiana Harbor, Gary, Tolleston, Glen Park, Mongo, Orland, Greentown and Graysville have all received financial assistance and will need continued support with one or two exceptions. Pray for the weak and discouraged churches that are anxiously waiting for our assistance, Trinity Springs, Monroe City, Wallace, Arrow Avenue, and others that have asked in vain for help. Pray for our faithful evangelist, T. J. Legg, whose work is with these weak churches. Pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth laborers into his harvest. We need more preachers who are willing to go into these needy fields at some sacrifice and who are competent for the work.

Let special prayer be made for the church in Indiana. Then, brethren, give as you pray. Take a special offering for State Missions. If you have not yet sent in your offering for Home and State missions, take the offering on the first Sunday of November and send it in promptly. If you have made a combined offering for Home and State work, cannot you take a special offering for our Indiana missions? We need $1,200 to continue the support of Gary, Tolleston, Whiting, Mongo and Orland. We must also provide for regular and continuous support of Indiana Harbor. $300 will be needed for this field. We need $1,000 for other fields that are equally worthy and that are asking for help in evangelistic meetings, some of which are named above.

We should have offerings from 150 more churches this fall. Most of our strong churches have already contributed. But there are more than 300 of the smaller churches that have not given anything. No church is too weak to give something. Remember that the way to grow strong is to exercise. The preacher that seeks to save his church from opportunities to give to the larger work of the kingdom is depriving them of the opportunity for growth and will contribute to their decline and loss of power. Remember the Lord hath said "Give and it shall be given unto you." Send for supplies, envelopes and literature, and take the offering.

College Leaders Confer

The third meeting of the Association of Colleges of the Disciples of Christ was held in Des Moines, Thursday and Friday, October 12 and 13, with President Bell presiding. Co-operation, Standardization, and Publicity were the themes. Thursday morning was given to the first. The program consisted of: Report of standing committee on co-operation, Wm. Oeschger, Cotner; The Advisability of a Great Concert Campaign for Education, Minor Lee Bates, Hiram; When to Commence the Campaign and How Long to Continue It, H. H. Peters, Eureka; The Objective of Such a Campaign, General and Particular, Lewis S. Cupp, Christian University; Co-operation and Comity in Such a Campaign, O. N. Roth, Oklahoma Christian University.

On Thursday afternoon a joint session was held with the National Bible School Field Workers' Association, when the following program was carried out: The Message from the Bible School Department of the American Christian Missionary Society, Robert M. Hopkins, Supt.; The College and Religious Education, Walter S. Athearn, Drake. Opportunities of the Bible Schools Among the Colleges, R. H. Crossfield, Transylvania; Opportunities of the Colleges Among the Bible Schools, R. P. Shepherd, Christian Board of Publications; Our Plans in Indiana, Garry L. Cook, Indiana State Bible School Supt.; A Suggestion from Virginia, S. T. Willis, Virginia Christian College; The Proposed Front Rank Standard for 1912, Myron C. Settle, National Secretary.

Thursday evening was given to standardization. Report of committee was read by A. C. Gray, chairman, and discussed by Silas Jones, Eureka; College Entrance Requirements, Prescribed and Elective, Martin L. Pierce, Kimberlin Heights; Report of the Educational Session at Portland Convention, A. M. Haggard, Drake. The informal discussion of standardization, participated in by many and continued until nearly midnight, resulted in a very profitable meeting.

Friday morning was devoted to Publicity. In the absence of Fred'k D. Kershner, chairman, his report was read by Prof. Allman. The topics considered were: Publicity from the Point of View of the Press, Charles E. Underwood, Columbia; Publicity from the Point of View of Correspondence, S. T. Willis; Publicity from the Point of View of Public Address, Herbert Martin, Drake.

The afternoon session was given over to reports of committees and to a somewhat informal conference in matters vital to the educational interests of the Disciples. Among other things the matter of annuities was considered. The fact that some of our organizations outbid one another for annuities was greatly deplored. The payment of a six per cent rate, especially to annuitants under forty years of age, as is done in some cases, and in the face of a gradually decreasing money rate, cannot but spell disaster to such an enterprise. President Bates was named to confer with the other organizations in the hope of taking a uniform and business-like policy in the matter.

The spirit of this annual meeting was reassuring. "Red-fire" methods in education were condemned. Earnestness and sanity marked the deliberations. Gallery play was at a minimum. Centralization schemes were accorded no favor. Co-operation was the word. A concerted campaign for endowment beginning next June and continuing for three years was decided upon, the amount to be determined upon and announced by the next meeting at Butler College, May 8 and 9. Greater uniformity in entrance requirements and in standards of scholarship was felt desirable though recognized as difficult of attainment. The need of and tendency toward the expert in education as in other fields, found frequent expression. The importance of religious education and its right to larger recognition in our curricula were emphasized. This was indeed a helpful meeting. Realizing the need of co-operative effort the men got together and became sympathetically acquainted. As a result each college knows better the others. The new officers are: President, T. C. Howe, Butler; vice-president, S. T. Willis, Virginia Christian College; recording secretary, Minor Lee Bates, Hiram; secretary and treasurer, J. W. Putnam, Butler.

Facts That Tell

The following interesting items have been gleaned from the last Annual Report of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, that is, for the missionary year ending September 30, 1911:

BASE OF SUPPLIES—HOME FIELD.

Large Gains.—The receipts of the past year amounted to $379,082, a gain of $18,369. The gain in 1909 was $76,360; in 1910, $10,026; and in 1911, $18,369; or a total gain in three years of $104,755. This gain in three years is about equal to the total receipts in 1897, or fourteen years ago. The total gain in the past ten years is $207,184, or an average of $20,718 per year.

Churches.—Contributing 3,023, or a loss of 204. The churches, as churches gave $139.501, a gain of $1,402. Averaged $46.14 each, a gain of $11.85 in five years. The churches are the chief source of income. They are growing in liberality.

Sunday-school.—Contributing Sunday-schools 3,787, a loss of 77. The receipts were $83,041, a loss of $7,210. The Sunday-schools averaged $21.92.

Endeavor Societies.—Contributing Societies 939, a gain of 74. The amount contributed is $11,287, an average of $12. The societies in Ohio led with gifts amounting to $1,492; Illinois is next with $1,468. Watch all the societies do better this year.

Individual Gifts.—Number 1,381, a gain of 223. Amount $55,178, a gain of $25,730, or more than 100 per cent. The gifts averaged $39.95. This is the largest amount ever received from personal gifts. We are hoping for still more this year from this source.

Bequests.—The amount received from this source is $8,319, a gain of $7,263. This is a gratifying gain, but the total received is not as much as it should be. Will you not remember the Foreign Christian Missionary Society in your last will and testament?

Annuities.—There were 48 annuity gifts during the year, which amounted to $46,790, a loss of $7,944. Amount received on this plan in the past fourteen years is $428,215. The society pays 6 per cent interest to those fifty years of age. Number of annuitants from the first is 242, who have made 489 gifts. There has never been a word of dissatisfaction from an annuitant. One has given sixteen times; four have given twelve times; three have made nine gifts, and eighty-nine have given more than once.

Total Receipts.—Since the organization of the society in Louisville, Ky., in 1875, it has received $4,439,136. World-wide results at a small outlay. The receipts ought to be a million annually. They will be some day.

Leading States.—The six leading states in gifts are the following: Ohio, $46,462; Missouri, $39,219; Kentucky, $31,954; Illinois, $27,225; Indiana, $24,619; Nebraska, $21,765. Missouri gained $14,083; Nebraska $14,558. Missouri led in the number of contributing churches, 306; Ohio next, 293; Illinois next, 286; Indiana, 282; Kentucky, 262; Iowa, 175.

Living-links.—Eighteen new Living-links were enrolled. These churches give $600 a year, or more, and support their own missionary. Some churches support three or more missionaries each. A number of individuals support a missionary. Sunday-schools also are Living-links.

Leading Churches.—The ten leading churches, including Sunday-school and Christian Endeavor gifts, for the year in their offerings for Foreign Missions are: Akron (1st or High St.) Ohio, $1,966.09; Richmond, Va., (Seventh St.), $1,835; Des Moines, Ia., (University Place), $1,615.68; Cleveland, Ohio, (Euclid Ave., $1,435.24; Los Angeles, Cal., (First), $1,212; Beatrice, Neb., $1,200; Chicago, Ill., (Hyde Park), $1,190; Chicago, Ill., (Englewood), $1,104; Hopkinsville, Ky., $1,086.31; Cincinnati, Ohio, (Central), $1,021.15.

Literature.—About 12,000 volumes of missionary books were sold. Cash for same $4,434, profits about $500. The Missionary Intelligencer has grown in favor. More than 400 mission study classes were organized. Tracts, leaflets, circulars, etc., were distributed.

Deficit.—The deficit of the Central Fund is $58,443, an increase over last year of $19,230. The regular work on the fields by natural growth has gone beyond our income. Special funds and the annuity fund have been overdrawn for current expenses. The regular income must be increased.

OUT ON THE FOREIGN FIELD.

Fields.—The society does work in Japan, China, Philippine Islands, India, Africa, Cuba, Norway, Sweden, Denmark and England.

Many-sided.—The work of the foreign society is of wide scope—evangelistic, educational, medical, literary, benevolent. This society seeks to do for 800,000,000 what all of our other societies and churches and colleges aim to do for 90,000,000 at home. Its work embraces church extension, orphanages, hospitals, printing presses, pastoral care and evangelistic campaigns.

Missionary Staff.—Consists of 169 missionaries, 759 native evangelists, teachers, helpers, or a total force of 928, a gain of 13. This is our standing army on the frontier of the world.

Fees.—Medical fees raised on the field amounted to $10,003, a gain of $4,108. School fee amounted to $9,121, a gain of $3,507. Government grants in aid in India amounted to $1,372.

Missionary Contributions.—These amounted to $5,650 on the fields, a gain of $917. This is a most hopeful sign.

Self-Support.—The mission stations on the fields raised $27,804 for self-support, a gain of $7,499. Total raised on the fields last year $52,579, a gain of $15,978. This is one of the most encouraging gains of the year.

Educational.—The society supports 9.

schools, a gain of 32, with 5,096 students, a gain of 212. This is more than one-half as many pupils as we have in all our schools in America. They are helping to revolutionize the countries where they exist.

Medical.—Hospitals and dispensaries 24, a gain of 3. Patients treated, 157,988. This work alone more than justifies all of our expenditures of time and money.

Sunday-schools.—248, again of 43; number in Sunday-schools, 16,200; a gain over last year of 3,269. A child leads to the Kingdom of God in the Orient as it does in America.

Churches.—Organized 141, a gain of 15; additions during the year 2,011.

Ministrial.—There are 295 students preparing for the ministry on foreign fields, a gain of 65. This is a most encouraging feature.

National Benevolent Association Activities

The Christian Orphans' Home, St. Louis, has just come into possession of a legacy of $1,300. It comes just in time to meet an urgent need. It is a good thing for people to share with the Lord by leaving a part of their substance to His poor.

A good Missouri brother has just taken out his third $1,000 annuity bond with the association. He has taken them out at the rate of about one in two years, a good habit to form.

The Association has just leased a large building in Atlanta (West End), Ga., to which it will remove the children of the Southeastern Home at an early date. The home has been located in Baldwin for the last seven years. On account of the inaccessibility of Baldwin, the home has been placed at a great disadvantage.

The National Benevolent Association is the only organization through which the Christian churches are carrying on their benevolent activities. It is set for the triumph of our plea in the return to primitive Christianity by diligently seeking the restoration of the spirit and practice of apostolic benev-

THE Moral Leaders OF Israel

By Professor Herbert L. Willett

PART I, FROM MOSES TO ELISHA

This is the first of four parts, which will cover the entire field of prophetic activity in the Old Testament. In the present issue there are thirteen sections, as follows:

THE PROPHETS AND THE OLD TESTAMENT.
THE BEGINNINGS OF PROPHETIC WORK.
MOSES AND ISRAEL.
MOSES AND THE BEGINNINGS OF THE NATION.
THE RISE OF SAMUEL
SAMUEL, JUDGE AND PROPHET.
DAVID AND NATHAN.
AHIJAH OF SHILOH
ELIJAH AND THE PROPHETS OF BAAL.
ELIJAH, DEFENDER OF POPULAR RIGHTS.
ELISHA, THE PASTOR OF ISRAEL
THE REFORMS OF ELISHA.
THE PROPHETS OF THE JUDEAN SCHOOL.

These studies and those that follow in the series have been in use in many Sunday-schools during the past year, in the weekly form in which they have appeared in The Christian Century. This first part is now thoroughly revised and published in convenient form for class work or private use.

It contains ninety-two pages, is bound in paper, and is sold at thirty-five cents the copy.

The Best

Did you know that the Uniform Sunday School lessons for 1912 will be in The Life of Christ? That means that you will want the very best text for your young people's and adult classes that can be found. Even though your school is graded, up to the Intermediate department, you may still find it desirable to follow the Uniform lessons for the older classes. This is simply to remind you that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is a new book. A second large edition is now being prepared to meet the great demand expected this fall. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

Christian College

Christian College has enrolled up to date 230 students, 142 being in the boarding department. This number, with the large faculty and staff of officials, fills the dormitory to overflowing.

The Conservatory of Music is continuing to show steady and normal growth, both in number of matriculates and in standards of work. With five teachers of piano, two in voice, one in violin, and two teachers of theory excellent results are being accomplished by the more than two hundred students. A large orchestra and a full chorus class are planning for some strong public programs. The excellence of the musical standards in the Conservatory is shown in the fact that all the church choirs, but one, in Columbia are in charge of Christian College talent.

The strong appeal to thoughtful parents in the opportunities offered by the Junior-college course is evidenced in the enrollment of forty-seven students in the first year of this affiliation. The sentiment for the segregation of girl students through the freshman and sophomore years is rapidly gaining ground among parents who have given the important question of a college education for a daughter serious attention. With its ideal situation in the state university town Christian College has every opportunity to develop along the best lines of college work.

All alumnæ, former students and friends of Christian College are interested in the announcement of the approaching marriage of President Luella W. St. Clair to Dr. Woodson Moss, University physician and professor of medicine in the Medical Sschool of Missouri. University. The marriage will occur Wednesday, Nov. 22. The "Columbia Daily Tribune" in a recent announcement of Mrs. St. Clair's marriage comments, in part, as follows: "The wedding ceremony will be solemnized at high noon in the chapel of Dorsey Memorial Hall. A large number of invitations are being issued and the nuptial affair is being looked forward to with interest by the many friends of the principals in Columbia and all over the state. Mrs. St. Clair is one of the brilliant women of the Central West. Her intellectual attainments and her executive ability are vouchsafed to but few, and to them is due the present high standing of Christian College as an educational institution for women. In addition to her arduous labors in the educational field she has found time for other activities in the Federation of Women's clubs and in work otherwise uplifting. Mrs. St. Clair is one of the most gracious and charming of women, consideration for others and an unselfish devotion to duty being distinquishing characteristics of her strong, but gentle character. Dr. Woodson Moss, the prospective groom, is a member of the faculty of the medical department of the university, a position he has held for a number of years. He is one of

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the two years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature.

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that have ever been offered to Sunday Schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to put into their church work new zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these classes in the study of Social Reform.

the ablest and best known physicians in Missouri and no member of the profession he has honored for so long stands higher than he. His work in the medical department has been one of its mainstays for years, and all through Missouri and the West are prominent and well-known members of the medical profession who received the ground work of their calling from him."

It will be good news to all who are interested in the college to know that Mrs. St. Clair will continue in the presidency and that she is actively engaged in the furthering of plans for its immediate advancement, chief among these being the endowment fund of $25,000 to be raised by the alumnæ.

Church Extension News

The Church Extension offerings are coming in nicely during the month of October, 181 churches having sent offerings up to the 16th. Thus far 1,258 churches have contributed a little over $23,000 in the annual offering. In order to do justice to the church extension offering, congregations should keep the collections coming during the entire month of October in order to get proper results.

Applications for aid still continue to come. Since September 1, thirty-one churches have been pleading for help to build. The following is the list of applicants: Barryton, Mich; Vancouver, B. C.; Humboldt, Kan.; Compton Heights, St. Louis, Mo.; Pasco, Wash.; Hennessey, Okla.; Louisville, Ky., West End Church; Brooklyn, N. Y., Second Church; Estacodo, Ore; Blackburg, Va.; Romney, W. Va.; Winslow, Ark.; Roanoke City, Va.; Vermont Square, Los Angeles, Calif.; Coldwater, Mich.; Castle Rock, Wash.; Jennings, La.; Hamilton, O., Lindenwald Church; Oney, Okla.; London, Ky.; Edgemont, S. D.; Aurora, Mo.; San Dimas, Calif.; Vernon, Tex.; College Hill, O.; Syracuse, N. Y., South Park Church; Brownsville, Tex.; Rockport, Ill.; Hazelwood, Ind.; Ruleville, Miss.; and Hanford, Wash.

Since our last report we have received an annuity of $300 from a friend in Illinois and another of $2,000 from a friend in North Carolina. Other annuities have been promised to the board and yet we lack $52,000 of being able to pay the loans we have promised. A great many of these loans we have promised are from the annuity fund. If those who have annuity money to give could understand the good uses to which the church extension board can put their money, annuities would pour in by the hundreds.

It ought to be a very interesting thing to the brotherhood in general to read some of the letters when churches apply for help. The church at Hanford, Wash., for example, had been promised a loan of $500 on the basis of a $1,800 building, but when they came to get an estimate on the cost of the building, with present prices of material, they found they could not build their house for less than $3,000. Brother Norman Anglin writes as follows: "Our reasons for putting up such a building was because we wanted to be in on the ground floor. And we are, as there is only one other church in this place. Also there are great possibilities for a future. Hanford is only a young town, but there are twenty thousand acres of irrigable land tributary to this place, which I believe I am safe in saying will all be under irrigation in the next five years. The power plant here at present is one hundred thousand horse power, but is estimated when completed, (must be completed in five years under government franchise) at one million horse power. We that are building the church at present, have to carry the larger part of the load, financially, but we believe it to be the Lord's work and are doing it in his name, with an eye for the future church. And we are sure we will be more than repaid in a spiritual way."

Howard T. Cree of Augusta, Ga., writes concerning an opportunity for our people at Madison, Ga., as follows: "The particular point to which I wish to call your attention now is that of Madison, Ga., the best town on the Georgia R. R. and about seventy miles from Atlanta. We have a few people there whom I understand are anxious to get a building and some three or four of them are people of means. They can put about one thousand dollars into a proposition but as they have no organization and no preacher that is about the best they could do at the present. The Methodists have a splendid building well located, built of brick, electric lighted, seated with pews, from which they wish to move that they may have larger quarters. The lot is about 120 x 150 and in an excellent residence section of this very cultured and growing town. Their present location will be for sale. They will take something like $3,000 for it and we could almost immediately form an organization, hold a meeting, get the Woman's Society for Georgia Missions to get behind the proposition for a preacher and start right off with good assurance of a successful work in a little while."

In the old state of New York, the city of Syracuse, we have an opportunity to help establish a splendid work if our board can make a loan to South Park Church, which was organized last May with twenty-six charter members. C. R. Stauffer writes as follows. "I am writing you today to see what the prospects are for the securing of a loan to build a mission chapel for the South Park Church of Syracuse which was organized last May with twenty-six charter members. This church is the only church in a new settlement opened up three years ago about five miles out from the center of Syracuse on a five cent car line. There is at the present time about 100 families within a half mile of where we expect to locate this church and it looks now as though there would be 500 families there within a couple of years. It is in the direct line with the city's most rapid growth. We organized a Bible-school there two years ago this fall and are the only ones doing work there. For once we are in on the ground floor in this Eastern Territory. Some of our religious neighbors are looking on jealously only waiting for our work to fail or for us to give them some pretext to begin a work there, but we intend that this work shall be equipped and taken care of in such a manner that there shall be no excuse for any other church being organized there for some time to come."

And so the appeals are coming continually to your board of church extension, which a great brotherhood has entrusted for the housing of our homeless churches. Other equally interesting letters might be published from other churches that have made application.
